PREFACE

Long centuries ago when the children of Israel had passed dry-shod over the river Jordan, intent upon invading and subduing the promised land, their young leader, whose reputation was then unmade, commanded that there be taken out of the river twelve stones and that they be set up in monument form in the first camping place. "And it shall come to pass," he said, "when your children shall say to you, 'What mean these stones?' ye shall answer them that the waters of the Jordan were cut off before the Ark of the Covenant of the Lord when it passed over Jordan, and these stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel forever."

The contents of this volume are given to the public to serve exactly the same purpose for the people of Custer county that those stones which Joshua caused to be carried from the river and set up in the land of milk and honey served for the children of Israel. We have gone to the river of forty years ago and from under the waters of the past have brought up stones with which to build a monument to another set of pioneers who at a later date invaded another promised land. We have attempted to establish a few landmarks, to erect an enduring monument and to embalm the traditions of the early pioneers for the benefit of the next succeeding generations. We claim for the work no literary merit. It has no distinguishing marks of genius to parade. We claim only that it is a simple recital of a comparatively few things which took place in this county since the exit of the Indian and the coming of the white man. In addition to this, we claim that it is a roster of heroic names that should be preserved, and contains life sketches of some of those indomitable spirits whose early achievements were the foundation stones of our present-day homes and public institutions.

There was a great demand for a volume of this kind. Only a limited number of the first settlers who actually had to do with the beginning of things were alive, and if their story was to be preserved, first-handed, the time to write it had come. Any history that laid any claim to accuracy must be written under their direction. For this reason we yielded to the pressure of the prominent citizens of the county and attempted the work. How well we have succeeded, the readers must judge. In the compilation we have encountered innumerable difficulties which have been accumulating for forty years. The records of early-day events and public transactions are few and meager. The memory of man is exceedingly treacherous. Traditions are always contradictory, but with the material at hand we have done the best we could to give an accurate account of those early days which will never return.. We lay no claim to infallibility. There are doubtless errors and omissions. It could hardly be otherwise. When records failed us we depended upon the memory and statements of those who had best opportunity to know. When there was a conflict of statements and records, we gave preference to the records, and when there was a conflict of statements, without records, we made reconciliation by careful analysis of known conditions and turned upon the mooted question the light of probabilities in connection with general events.

We acknowledge with deep gratitude the valuable service rendered by people from all parts of the county, who contributed much valuable information and in every way assisted the compilation of this volume. The newspapers gave us free access to their files. The county officials were exceedingly courteous, and explored for us the dusty volumes of early records in the county vaults. Pioneers who had long since left the country wrote valuable contributions, and so much help has been extended that we can lay no claim to originality. We have gathered from other men's flowers and claim only the poor form into which we have woven them.

Very sincerely,

W. L. GASTON

"In the beginning God made Custer county." That is a famous old Hebrew declaration, with a localism attached — a localism which does no violence to the text, nor sins against the truth. In that far off morning when creation was the order, the Great Creator seems to have inspected the product of his hand and in each case, so far as the record goes, pronounced it good. So it is taken for granted that after he made Custer county, he pronounced it good, and there is little doubt in the minds of the thirty thousand people who have their homes in this western county that he was right.

If God made it good in the beginning, he expected the ages to improve it. He seems to have blended soil and climate into splendid conditions for human life and happiness. When, after the lapse of ages, he turned loose upon its virgin prairies the sturdy, progressive young manhood and womanhood who came, red-blooded, from the homes of Iowa, Illinois, Wisconsin, Ohio, and all the rest of the older states, it was charged and surcharged with natural resources and opportunity. They were a tribe of men and women in whose veins flowed the warm blood of energy, and whose characters massed the traits of virtue, strength, and progress. They came to subdue a soil in which opportunity lay in the surface strata, or protruded in ledges from the hillsides. They came to find, in fine assortment, the elements of life and growth, a place where energy and thrift could subdue the unplowed sod and find the place for home and sanctuary.

THE FIRST OWNER

France was the first owner of record. It came to France by right of exploration, if not discovery. All that part of North America known as the Middle West, came without dispute or protest to the royal house of the Louises. Through the process of some barter, not vital to this story, the Louises ceded it to Spain in 1763. It was some land transaction. A vast wedge of territory, bounded on the east by the Mississippi and ranging irregularly westward until it reached the Oregon shore of the Pacific, went from French to Spanish possession. So far as the territory itself is concerned it profited little by exchange of owners. It should go unnoticed but that Custer county, then unnamed and unmarked, was in this territory, and represented then the equity of its present inhabitants. In 1802 Spain and France again became swappers, and possession went back to France. This prepared the way for the transaction of 1803, when Thomas Jefferson shied his young republic into the auction ring, from which it emerged with the Louisiana Purchase. If former transactions were big land deals, this outranked them all. The extent of land in the Louisiana Purchase was vastly more than the original transaction of 1763. Custer county was in it, however,—it had survived the shuffles and now and for all time it is in the possession of, and is an integral part of, the United States of America.

IN FAR OFF DAYS

Imagination runs, always, back into the far off days and asks a thousand times the questions: "Who was the first human being to see that spot of earth now known as Custer county? Whose eyes first beheld its hills and valleys or swept across its plain, or were there any hills and valleys when the first human eye beheld this region? Was its land exhibiting naught but barren waste, or were its fields green robed and grassed? Did the scene present anything that is familiar to this modern day? Or was it water covered, a part of an inland sea, in which was housed the mastodonic life of some far off amphibious day? Or had the waves subsided, leaving exposed to sun and wind flats of silt, and dunes of sand?" All these questions, and a thousand others, come surging into the mind that contemplates the ancient days of the formative period. The great majority of these questions will never be answered. Neither the historian nor the geologist brings any message from that distant age.

Did the primitive inhabitants of North America ever traverse Custer county? Did the descendants of the cliff dwellers ever look for building sites along our river bluffs or canyon breaks? Did the Algonquin Indians of the far east New England ever drift as far west as central Nebraska, or did the Myas and the Aztecs graze their cattle here before they immigrated to Mexico and Yucatan? When the tribe, to which now the famous Calaveras man belonged, was delighting in a higher civilization farther west, were any of his kinsmen located in Nebraska? All these questions are hard to answer and it may be that the world will have to wait the results of the archeologists' long search.

THE PRE-HISTORIC TRIBES WERE HERE

Though no traditions came down from the hoary centuries of the past there is abundant evidence of occupancy by a pre-historic race. Rich discoveries of broken pottery, stone implements and many other relics of a forgotten people have rewarded the Nebraska ethnologists and archeologists. Nebraska was once the home of a people who either antedate the American Indian by uncounted centuries or else were the far off ancestors from which he both descended and degenerated.

Nebraska archeology is still in the morning twilight of commencement, yet twenty-four village sites have been discovered, explored, and charted. Along almost every Nebraska stream, stone implements and weapons have been found. Some scientists declare that the possessors of these stone implements had no pottery and belonged to a race which antedates the molders of earthen vessels. These are not questions to be settled here. We pass them along to the student and the scientist.

THE FINDING OF POTTERY

The possessors of pottery once lived in Custer county, how long ago no man can tell, but the fact is not disputed. Many stone implements, such as stone hammers, stone tomahawks, battle axes, stone knives, and arrow heads have been found.

Al. Morgan, one of the early settlers, in the vicinity of Cumro, has gathered many curious implements, many of which were produced and used by Indians who inhabited Custer county, perhaps generations before the tribes of a later day were found here by the white man.

The molders of pottery once roamed these hills and drank from these springs and streams. It is presumed that this pottery was manufactured by the remote ancestors of later-day Indians. If it is argued that the molders of the pottery and the makers of the flint implements indicate a higher civilization than that of the modern red man, the ethnologists reply that these plains and hills were not always covered with buffaloes and elk, and that some time in the remote past the ancestors of the noble red man were grain eaters. Grain eaters rise to a higher degree of intelligence and civilization than meat eaters. When the Indian was compelled to find his bread in the soil and gather the harvest of fields and forests he was more enlightened and civilized than his descendants, who found life easy when the buffalo and the elk made it too easy for him to subsist.

The grain eaters needed stone implements with which to grind and dig, and vessels in which to conserve and retain. It required mental effort, as well as physical, so evidences of a creditable mentality are found in the vessels and implements they have left behind.

The citizens of Callaway attest the finding of broken pottery on the South Loup hills north of the river.

A few years ago Frank Kelley and others found fragments of pottery, each piece clearly defined, on the Ed. Neth farm some eight or ten miles west of Broken Bow. All this testifies to the fact of former inhabitants.

In 1916 H. M. Bentley, who lives in section 32, township 20 north, range 17 west, which is located approximately four miles northeast of Sargent in this county, while plowing on a hill top, uncovered some thirty or forty pieces of gray pottery. This pottery had evidently been made by weaving grass baskets and daubing clay mud or slime on the inside and then burning them in some kind of an improvised kiln. This process left the pottery with the imprint of the grass basket embossed on the exterior.

The material of the pottery resembles a form of hard gray-blue stone. Two or three of the pieces found are of good size, and one is from the rim of the vessel of which is was once a part, and describes an arc of at least one-fourth of the circumference of the vessel. At the same time and in the same place Mr. Bentley uncovered parts of human bones, among which, still clinging to a fragment of a human jaw-bone, was a well preserved human tooth.

The size of the tooth and the bones indicates that they belonged to a child of twelve or thirteen years, or else to some diminutive adult. Drs. Bass, Beck, and Mullins, all reputable dentists of Broken Bow, have examined the tooth and declare it to be the upper first molar of the right side. They believe it to be the first or baby tooth, but in this they are not certain, as the tooth gives evidence of much wear, perhaps more wear than a child's tooth would have received. The wear indicates that the tooth belonged to a grain eater and, if so, its owner lived at a time when the ancestors of the present Indian families were grain eaters, and a higher intelligence made them manufacturers of ware and implements. Other pieces of pottery and similar relics left by an ancient tribe were found on a high hill on the farm of J. E. Grint, some two or three miles south of the Bentley farm.

Not long since Professor Elmer E. Blackman, curator of the Nebraska Historical Society, visited the scene of these finds and spent some time in making examinations. On this tour of inspection he was accompanied by Judge Humphrey, associate editor of this publication. Professor Blackman believes that these relics were deposited by the far-off ancestors of the present Pawnee Indians. He further believes that these Indians were not permanent occupants of the region, but that they came here on summer hunting trips, during a period when the elk and buffaloes were numerous. This would place this particular people, who have so kindly left us the relics, in the transition period between grain-eating and meat-eating Indians. In support of his theory he submits the following statements:

"In relation to the Indian remains in Custer county which I inspected with Judge Humphrey, August 20, 1918, I may offer the following conclusions:

"A little preliminary study of the situation shows that the area of Custer county was part of the land ceded to the United States by the Pawnees on the 24th of September, 1857. The treaty was signed at Table Creek, Nebraska Territory. Table Creek is near Nebraska City, and we have in the museum of the Nebraska Historical Society a photograph of the signing of this treaty, the same showing Pe-ta-Le-Sharu, Samuel Allis, J. "The Republican Pawnees once lived south of the Platte — Pike says he was at their village in 1806. I find the ruins of their habitat along the Republican river, even west of Orleans. From the banks of the Republican they chiefly secured the flint which was used for implements. This was easy to get, splendid in quality, and was probably the cause of their residence there. This implement-making material became the direct cause of the supremacy which this tribe gained over their neighbors, and which they held until the whites came with firearms and 'fire-water.'

"The area now occupied by Custer county was the abundant buffalo plains over which the Pawnees hunted during the time preceding contact with the whites, as well as later; but the site explored does not show contact with white men, and antedates firearms — hence the reference to the earlier date.

"Both the sites visited may be classed as one. Due east of Sargent are evidences that show this to be the point where the hunting party probably left the Middle Loup river, and thence was afforded an easy trail to the location farther north and west of this point, which I determine as the location of the camp.

"In the hill-encircled valley near where the farm house stands is a beautiful, level expanse upon which the summer tepees were set up. This was an ideal spot, protected from observation by the hills which separate this sheltered valley from the Middle Loup river. There was ample timber for fuel, and water from springs. Probably year after year the same tribe came here to secure the meat supply. Doubtless small game was abundant. We know that vast herds of buffaloes roamed this region, and from here the hunters sallied forth to capture the winter supply of meat and hides, while the squaws remained in the sheltered valley, to dry the meat and dress the hides.

"Some of their people died from sickness or accident, and the surrounding hill-tops (especially west of the camp) were the sites for the final resting places of the noble dead.

"The pottery found on the hill-top indicates that these Indians had a custom of placing food and water in the graves, for the use of the departed on their journey to the happy hunting-ground. Many tribes observed the custom. The Pawnees practiced it.

"I believe this site antedates contact with the whites. This is proven by the absence of any white man's artifacts. I believe it is one of the sites used soon after the Pawnees migrated to the plains region, because the chips of flint found on this site are from the flint found in the Texas region from which they migrated. I do not doubt but this summer camp was occupied by the Pawnees. First, because the specimens of pottery found are identical with the pottery made by the Pawnees, and, second, because the flint chips are from nodules which originally were found in the vicinity of the Brazos river in Texas, the land from which the Pawnees originally came.

"The implement-making material brought with them on their migrations north, would be exhausted in time, so, finding the chips from these nodules leads us to believe the camp was used at an early date.

"The small, flint arrow-heads found on the same hill-top as were the pottery and bones, are not so crude or large as those used by the modern red man. They give evidence of a skill and workmanship the latter did not possess. The workmanship declares a degree of civilization, while the barbed flint itself tells the story of the battle and chase in that unknown time. The bow and arrow constituted the equipment of both the warrior and the hunter of this primitive race. The flint-head, well formed, well edged, and sharply outlined, would argue that the arrow to which it was attached, with thong or grass, was skill-fashioned and high-grade, and likewise that the bow would be designed and modeled with more skill than those used by the later Indians.

"The utility of the implement depends upon the degree of intelligence of the user. In the hands of keen intelligence it does better execution and is more deadly than in the hands of the untutored savage. And then, as the workmanship declares the degree of skill and intelligence, we must conclude that these arrows were once used by a people who in some degree outranked in civilization the Indians of the present century, and were very effective in their hands. They served their owners well and were the Winchesters of their day. This race used the arrow for the hunt, and if, like their civilized brethren of to-day, they slaughtered each other, they relied for victory over their enemy, upon the same implement, which, like the vendor's liniment, was made for man or beast. This is all we know—it would be useless to add more. Their past is sealed. Their centuries are dead."

THE INDIANS OF SIXTY YEARS AGO

Coming down to the day of maps and records, we know something about the Indian tribes which inhabited Custer county in the generations next preceding the white man's advent.

The ethnological traces of the red man's genealogy, divide our North American Indians into five great families, and with glib tongue rattle off the names "Caddoan family, Siouan family, Algonkain family, Shoshonean family, and the Kiowan family."

At least four of these families were represented in the tribal relations of the red man who once hunted and haunted the wild game herds of these prairies.

The Pawnees were here. This was their treaty reservation. It was their legal home. They were owners, in fee simple, and claimants by possession. If Professor Blackman is right, they were here for a thousand years before the white man bothered them. The Pawnees belong to the Caddoan family. The Omahas, the Poncas, and the Otoes hunted these plains and here warred with the Pawnees. These tribes belonged to the Siouan family. An Indian authority says that the domain of the Omahas lay north of the Platte river. That might include Custer county or at least a part of it. If they never lived here they were oftentimes visitors and long-time campers on these hills and river valleys.

Fremont records the Cheyenne Indians as located on the Platte above Grand Island. From this location the buffalo chase would often take them over the South Loup country. The Cheyennes held their family membership with the Algonkains. Mooney, in his eighteenth annual report to the bureau of ethnology, says that the Comanches, who have sometimes been called by the Siouan name of Padoucas, once had a permanent home on the north fork of the Platte river and that their ordinary range over the plains was from five to eight hundred miles. A range of less than half that circle would center their hunting field in Custer county. The Comanche belonged to the Shoshonean family.

This is all that is known about our Indian predecessors. Their tepees are down, their camp fires are out, and the bronzed master of the wild herds is gone. When any of his descendants come to Custer county now they wear the white man's garb,—pants, white collar, and a red necktie, or, if the gender is more favorable, a calico skirt, of wall paper pattern, and a silk handkerchief over plaited hair. The Indian pony and the Indian dog live only in the pictures of the past; their bones and poverty are forgotten; with hoof beats and yelps they follow the herds no more.

NO INDIAN ATROCITIES IN CUSTER COUNTY

Beyond doubt the early trappers and hunters in Custer county had many exciting times and several of them may have been killed by the Indians, but concerning tragedies of this time we have no records. John Wilmouth, who will be mentioned later, claims to have been engaged in an Indian battle in the year 1860, somewhere in the vicinity of Milburn. He makes the claim that three or four white men were killed at this time. Mr. Wilmouth is ninety years of age and his memory hardly accurate.

Aside from this there is no statement made, by any one who pretends to know, to the effect that any settlers were disturbed.

PROBABLE BATTLES

Beyond doubt, several battles were fought within the confines of the county during the days when these prairies were ranged by scouting parties from the United States forts at Kearney and Hartseff. Old settlers claim that several battle fields have been found in the county: one is located near the present town site of Berwyn, and one on the Forsythe farm near New Helena. On both of these fields arrow-heads, human bones, and other relics of conflict have been found.

WELL MARKED RIFLE PITS

Perhaps the most clearly defined of any battle field in Custer county is the one located in section 16, township 17, range 18, which location is in the school section owned by and this helped, of course, to form an improvised breastwork. These pits with their accompanying mounds vary in length from six to sixty feet and if they were ever fully manned, at least four or five hundred white men or soldiers must have been engaged.

In the center of the enclosed area is a depression which early settlers say was a water hole when they came to the country. If a stand was to be made by a company of soldiers on ground of their own choosing there would naturally be some provisions for water.

It is claimed that in an early day another such system of breastworks and pits was found near the mouth of Spring creek, on the farm

CUSTER COUNTY'S FIRST DRYING PLANT

Allen brothers and lies three miles north and one-half mile west of the present Westerville store.

After much investigation, in which the services of the state historian, Professor A. E. Sheldon, and Curator E. E. Blackman have been rendered, it can be stated positively that here a battle of some importance has been fought. Here a line of rifle pits, clearly demarked, encloses an area of perhaps six or eight acres, the line conforming more nearly to an ellipse than a circle. The pits were probably three feet deep at the time they were dug. The dirt was thrown to the outside, now owned by Judge A. R. Humphrey. J. J. Douglass, who saw this field, says that originally a well had been dug in the center of the enclosure. Talking with a former United States soldier who served in the regular army in the days of the early '60s and who for a number of years, during the '60s, was stationed at Kearney, Mr. Douglass learned that the soldiers of the fort had located in a number of places what they called outposts, where they dug pits, threw up breastworks made in circle form, enclosing water, and marked them, so that in case they were too hotly pressed by the Indians they could make a run for the nearest of these outposts and find there some protection in making a stand.

It is altogether probable that the Allen field was one of these outposts, and was probably attached to Fort Kearney. It will be noted in another place that State Surveyor Robert Harvey finds an old wagon trail coming out of Valley county through Mira valley and entering Custer county in the vicinity of Woods Park. This trail came from the north-east and led in a southwest direction directly in line with the rifle pits described. It is in the battle was in evidence when the first settlers came to the country. A skull which belonged to an Indian was found by the Allen brothers near the battle ground, where it had probably been exhumed by wind or coyotes from a shallow grave.

As late as August 18, 1918, Judge A. R. Humphrey found on the ground within the circle the stock of an old carbine.

Excavations made in the bottom of some of the pits disclosed deposits of charcoal which, no doubt, was the remains of fires built in possible that this trail is connected in some way with the battle field.

THE SIGNS OF BATTLE

Accepting the theory that this was an outpost, it is also evident that it was the scene of a battle. Arrow-heads in abundance have been picked up. This would show that Indians were the parties engaged on one side, while broken guns, bullets, and parts of a sabre, would indicate that white men and soldiers were the occupants of the pits. A mound supposed to be a field grave for soldiers killed the pits, and might indicate that the stand was made in the fall of the year, when the weather was cold, but before the ground had frozen.

This is all that we know positively. There is a tradition that in an early day a band of Indians attacked a party of gold miners, returning from the Black Hills, and robbed them of a large amount of gold dust, that the soldiers followed them to recover the gold and that here they overtook the Indians and made their stand. Tradition also has it that a large number of Indians were killed and only a few of the soldiers engaged survived. But the tradition lacks confirmation.

A FORT IN CUSTER COUNTY

To guard against the depredations of Indians, the citizens of Douglas Grove built, in 1876, a fort which, at first, they named Fort Garber, in honor of the governor, but later, because no Indians came and the scare did not materialize in war whoops, tomahawks, and scalps, it was called Fort Disappointment.

It was built with bastioned corners, so that the Indians could not scale the walls from without, and was large enough to hold all the settlers. A well was dug inside for water supply, forty stands of arms were obtained from the government, and a company of state militia organized, called the Garber County Regulars. W. H. Comstock was made captain and from that time forth the genial pioneer was known as Captain Comstock.

NEW HELENA FRIGHTENED

About the same time, rumors of an Indian outbreak and massacre further north frightened the people of New Helena or Victoria Creek. The Omaha Bee published an account of the massacre of settlers in the Middle Loup valley. J. N. Dryden, now of Kearney, then sent the following note addressed to the surviving citizens of Victoria Creek:

Douglas Grove, May 27, 1876.
To the Surviving Citizens of Victoria Creek:

My Dear Friends: I send you all the information relative to the movements of the Indians I am able to procure and think is reliable.

The clippings are from the late Omaha and Chicago dailies. Saw Mr. Merchant's folks off all right on the 6:45 train Thursday morning. They were very uneasy about Mr. Merchant. Truly, J. N. D.

This general uprising of the Sioux, who resented the intrusion of miners pushing into the Black Hills territory, so frightened the people of New Helena that when they received the Dryden note, they rallied the settlers and built a fort of cedar logs on the Forsythe place, but some of the families were so frightened that they fled the country. After the fort was built Judge Mathews applied to the state for arms and received fourteen rifles and two thousand rounds of cartridges. Most of the people who had fled for safety returned to their claims. Their fears proved groundless. No Indians came. So it can be stated on the best authority that no settlers of Custer county were ever seriously molested by Indians.

FACSIMILE OF LETTER OF J. N. DRYDEN

AN INDIAN BATTLE

On the 4th day of July, 1918, A. K. Holmes, editor and publisher of the Taylor Clarion, published the following account of an early battle, which took place in Custer county, between a surveying party of twelve men and a marauding tribe of Indians. The article here appended has been submitted to the old settlers of the northeast corner of the county and, according to their testimony, the Clarion account is authentic. Mr. Holmes writes a personal letter in which he states that the William Stevens mentioned in the article is a very reliable and trustworthy citizen and absolute dependence can be placed upon his word. C. E. Gibbons, of Comstock, also bears testimony to the standing and character of William Stevens, and he, with others, locates the scene of battle close to the junction of Spring creek, which heads on Gibbons' place three or four miles southwest of Comstock and almost directly south of Comstock forms its junction with the Middle Loup river. This locates the battle ground approximately three and one-half miles south of Comstock.

THE CLARION ARTICLE

The following article, under the caption "A no man's land of early days," is the one referred to above:

Like all the pioneer settlers of forty years ago, William Stevens depended on Central City and Grand Island as his railroad points. The road down the valley, as then traveled, was long and wearisome. It was sometimes on one side of the Loup river, and then on the other, just as the exigencies of the breaks and soils and untamed wilds demanded. The trips were not always free from dangers, nor were the drivers always care free as to the safety of families and properties left at home during the week or more of absence. There was no rapid transit of message in those days, and the valley never echoed the chug of the auto bringing help in case of unanticipated distress or Indian visitation.

But the trips were frequently enlivened by impressive incident, experiences related, or traditions and tales told over, which now stand out in the memory of the pioneer as a pleasurable and cherished reminiscence. It has been so always, and everywhere. In taming the wilds of every country the pioneers enacted the scenes which subsequently became the play puppets of the retrospective hour.

Mr. Stevens occasionally hauled loads of cedar posts to Central City. Small and few as were his financial transactions in those days, some were certain to come, and the posts offered one of the very few solutions to the incoming revenue problem.

Stopping at nightfall with some lone settler on the endless prairie, who was trying to develop a home amidst the haunts of the coyotes, the owls, and the rattlesnakes, the driver could get his night's lodging and hay for the team for twenty-five cents. The quarter looked very big and very welcome to the owners of the soddies on the claims down the valley.

On one of those trips, Mr. Stevens found the bridge at St. Paul washed away, and so he proceeded to Fullerton, in the hope that he might be able to get across, perhaps over the ferry. It was while there that Mr. Stevens met a resident of the town who had in previous years been a member of a United States surveying party of twelve which made the original federal survey of this country. And thence we get this little tale.

Like in many such instances, there are no positive means of identifying locations. Distances were not accurately known. But from the surveyor's minute description of the creek, its bank, another draw to the southward, separated from the creek by a level prairie, the upward slope to the south of the draw, and the hills and canyons beyond,—these, and other minutiae, enabled Mr. Stevens to feel satisfied that the location lay upon the land he had subsequently homesteaded. He has another proof—which is quite conclusive. In the field and pastured hills on the up-slope south of the draw, he has since picked up perhaps half a hundred of rifle balls, which had in the after years lain where they struck or fell. Their numbers indicated an old-time battle-field.

The surveying party was engaged along the creek near its mouth, one morning, when a band of Indians came out of the canyon to the south and advanced northward. It didn't matter to what tribe they belonged, for they were warlike in manner and too numerous to justify a parley for negotiations. The surveyors dropped below the creek bank for shelter, feeling that such situation would offer means for an advantageous resistance. The government had provided them with the old-time, long-range "Needle-guns"—and it was now time to use them.

Before the Indians got to the draw the surveyors began to pick them off as best they could. So it was but natural that the redskins should crouch in the draw for their own protection. Their guns were of the short-range class, and they could not reach the surveyors. They were safe in the draw, but they dare not venture across the level toward the surveyors. Both parties were safe where they were, but neither dared to show itself in open, and neither cared to assert claim to the expanse between—for it was a "No Man's Land" of another day.

Yet neither could get away without taking chances. So they kept up their spasmodic exchange of compliments through all that by-gone day, both waiting for the welcome cloak of the night-time to cover their strategic designs.

When darkness came, as an encompassing friend, the plans that were evolved during the day were set in motion, and the surveying they came. That would have been the romance of history.

The same hills that reverberated o'er the valley the desultory crack of the defender's rifle that day are still sitting guard at the valley's brink, but they now send back the echoes of agricultural and pastoral pursuit—for the "No Man's Land" of that pioneer day is a field in the "one man's land" of the present, sending its corn from the ditches and dairy products from the herd,—all as silent testimony of the changes of time.

The same creek (now known as Spring creek) wanders through the same crooks, and party began its "strategic withdrawal." Slipping along under the bank of the creek to the river, they were soon quietly going with the stream to surroundings that promised greater safety. But there was no further conflict.

[From Butcher History of Custer County]

Such is the story as it was outlined to us. The original relator went no further. The next chapter, if any, was not revealed. And why did the Indians not follow? It is everybody's guess. They could have harassed—but they did not. Possibly they, too, were strategists. Perhaps they also longed for the cover of darkness, in order that they might likewise resort to a "strategic retreat," and go slinking back to the canyon from whence the same banks to-day afford tempting playgrounds for the romping children of anglers who cast hook or seine in the quiet little channel.

More rifle balls lie plugged in the slope and the hill sides, waiting to be picked up by some wandering stroller who will stand and wonder. He may not have even the shadowy tradition of the two belligerent parties—each sneaking away in a strategic retreat—to give direction to his imaginative tread.

WHO WAS THE FIRST WHITE MAN?

Coming now to the days in which men made records and wrote history—who was the first white man that ever set eyes on Custer county? Who, among all the explorers of early days, had opportunity to camp in this region? Following Columbus came the Cabots, Vespuccius, and Magellan, DeSoto, Balboa, Ponce de Leon, Coronado, Drake, and a dozen such kindred spirits. They tramped the continent and sought for gold, for territory, for hot springs of youth and any form of wealth the new land might possess, but did they ever see Nebraska? Did their expeditions ever extend so far west or so far east, did any of them come up from the south or drop down from the north into our central Nebraska? Suspicion attaches to none of them unless it be to Coronado.

DID CORONADO FIND US

If we can believe his biographers, some of his exploring party may have been the first Europeans to have seen Custer county. In July of 1541 this Spanish general and explorer, bent on exploring the country he called Quivera, came out of New Mexico from the south and west and penetrated into the region of Nebraska as far north as the Platte river, and how much farther we do not know. From the Coronado camp on the Platte, it is not unlikely that the hunters rode out in all directions and, if so, perhaps they might have touched the south part of our young dominion. If Coronado did not find us then, perhaps we were discovered a few years later by Padilla, a Franciscan friar, who was one of the Coronado party and who returned to do missionary work among the Indians in the Platte region. According to tradition, Padilla not only labored for several months among a powerful tribe of Nebraska Indians, but it was here that he lost his life and in Nebraska soil, perhaps not far removed from Custer county, his bones went back to virgin dust. During his operations he had with him perhaps a dozen men, mostly friars and body-servants, and imagination need not labor hard to believe that some of them wandered far enough north to reach this county and to have been among the first, if not the first, to set foot on Custer county soil, or walk the green carpet of Custer prairies.

PLENTY OF WILD GAME

Perhaps here they hunted the buffaloes or other denizens of the new land. The country then must have been a hunters' paradise. Buffaloes ranged in such numbers that stampeding herds made the ground tremble, while the sound of their treading resembled distant thunder. Elk and deer were plentiful in those days. Antelope and wild turkeys, with goose and grouse, added variety to the hunters' menu and fattened the red man on savory meats that kings could not buy.

Since Coronado and Padilla may have found our location and looked it over full centuries before this generation fell heir to its possessions, we will list their advent as among the possibilities, and for want of better record, let it go at that.

OTHER EXPEDITIONS

The Lewis and Clark expedition of 1803 passed by so far to the north and east, that it is not likely that any side expeditions were made into the Custer county region. They followed the Missouri river from their Council Bluff's camp to where it crosses the state line, a route that missed the Custer portion of the state by nearly a hundred miles.

There is still another chance that we may have been exposed to the survey of an early expedition. A party of French Canadians, eight or ten in number, in charge of Pierre and Paul Mallet spent one winter at the junction of the Niobrara and Missouri rivers and from there journeyed south until they discovered and named the Platte river. As the river course seemed to lead in the direction they wished to go, they followed it sourceward for seventy miles and then traversed a woodless plain. Some of their side expeditions or hunting parties might have visited some of the places now in the confines of this county, and have been the first or second white party to behold it.

Zebulon M. Pike missed a mighty good chance to pay us a visit as long ago as 1806, when he conducted his expedition from eastern Missouri to the Colorado mountains, where he nailed his name to the high, bald mountain now known as Pike's Peak. Some writers claim that he traveled through parts of southern and central Nebraska. But Kansas is selfish, and down four miles south of Hardy, Nebraska, and at least three miles south of the Nebraska-Kansas state line, it has erected a monument and marked it "The northern limit of the Pike route." Unless that stone comes as wide of the truth as tombstones often do, Lieutenant Pike never saw our territory, unless he had unusually long vision when he looked north and east from the tip-top rocks of his mountain namesake.

In the winter time of 1812, one Robert Stuart, a Scotchman, who went west in the year before, in an expedition headed by himself and Wilson Price Hunt, wandered back with a few of his party to the headwater of the Platte river, where they undertook to winter.

The Indians routed them out of their winter quarters, and they journeyed east three hundred and thirty miles down the river, when they were stopped by heavy snows and, not finding comfortable winter quarters, they turned back toward what is now Scotts Bluff county, where they remained for the rest of the winter. It may be that they invaded Custer county.

Captain Henry Dodge, with an expedition of soldiers, came out of the southeast in 1835 and must have penetrated almost, if not quite, to the Custer county line.

GENERAL WARREN WAS HERE IN 1855

In 1855 or 1856 Lieutenant G. K. Warren, a major-general in the Civil war, conducted a military exploring expedition up the Loup valley in search of the most suitable route for a transcontinental railway. His route was along the north side of the Loup river, through the Pawnee Indian village, forded the North Fork and crossed the present townsite of St. Paul, as later shown by his wagon tracks, thence along the north side of the Middle Loup to its source. This road was very plain in 1872 when Robert Harvey made the government survey on the north side of the river. It was made by an old military expedition as shown by the uniform wide-gauge and grass-covered wagon tracks, and was the only wagon train in the Loup valley. There was also an old, wide-gauge, grass-covered wagon trail through Woods Park, leading out of Mira valley in Valley county. These trails cross each other on the north side of the Middle Loup river in the Woods Park vicinity. Mr. Harvey mentions in his surveyor's field notes the point where the trails cross.

JOHN WILMOUTH THE FIRST MAN HERE

One of the questions of burning interest for the purposes of this history is: Who was the first white man to come into the county on any pretext whatsoever, is now alive, and of whom there is a definite record? If information obtained is correct the question can be answered. In the hills seven miles northeast of Merna is the home of Uncle John Wilmouth. Uncle John lives on the same homestead upon which he settled in the spring of 1883 and which has been his home continuously since that time. He has never mortgaged it nor offered it for sale. He lives in a sod house, which has been repaired as the occasion required, and as the years passed. His good wife lives with him and although they are advancing in years they are in comfortable circumstances.

If the story that Uncle John tells is correct, beyond any doubt he is the first white man to have seen Custer county and who is still living.

UNCLE JOHN'S STORY

Uncle John does not know his age but thinks that he was born probably in 1831 or 1832. His brother, George Wilmouth, who lives in Broken Bow, is sixty-six years of age, and George is the youngest of eleven children, while John is the oldest. Naturally that would substantiate the dates Uncle John gives for his birth. He says that when he was a boy of sixteen or seventeen he ran away from his home in Virginia, with another boy about the same age, and that they made their way down the Ohio and Mississippi rivers to St. Louis, where they joined a caravan of Mormons en route for Salt Lake; that with them he passed over the Platte river trail through Nebraska in 1851. He claims to have spent nine very exciting years in Utah and the mountain region, during which he had many startling encounters with Indians. He claims to have been captured by Indians two or three times and exhibits knots and scars on his wrists and hands which show the Indians tied him with sharp thongs that cut through the skin into the flesh. In the early spring of 1860, in company with twenty or twenty-five other men, he started on the return trip to the states. They made their way through Wyoming and into the region of the Bad Lands and the south line of the Dakotas. Here Uncle John gives a graphic description of a rendezvous of thieves whom they found in this locality and with whom he and one or two others of the party had an exciting adventure. From this place the party headed south in an endeavor to reach Fort Kearney. Members of the party fell out along the route or were killed by Indians until there were only eight or nine left in the company that turned south through Nebraska. Uncle John thinks that his party struck the Middle Loup river and followed it down into the region of Custer county and that they were probably in Custer county when surrounded by a band of Indians with whom they had a hard fight. Their horses got away from them but were not captured by the Indians, and after Uncle John and three or four of the survivors succeeded in crawling away from the Indians under cover of night they were fortunate enough to find their horses in a canyon pocket next morning. They succeeded in catching the horses and started south in the direction of Kearney with all possible haste. They crossed the South Loup river, Uncle John thinks, somewhere near the present site of Oconto and in about a day's ride from that place they came in sight of the United States flag and in a short time after they sighted the flag they met United States soldiers. They were none too soon, however, for a cloud of dust rising from the plains back along the way they had come showed plainly that the Indians were pursuing them.

This is Uncle John's story. It has to be taken, analyzed, and examined in the light of every possibility. Could it be true? Is it possible that it is true? Is it probably true? All these are questions to be considered. It must be taken into consideration that Uncle John is old, and memory is treacherous. Uncle John's neighbors are inclined to believe that approaching old age makes suggestions and fancies personal realities. This is one of the caprices of old age and halting memory. On the other hand the story could have been true. The dates fixed make it all possible if not probable. Seven years ago Uncle John recited to a creditable witness the same story, with the same details, which he recites now to Judge A. R. Humphrey and the recorder of this story. Uncle John's description of conditions in Utah and western Colorado is true to conditions that prevailed at the time he says he was there. His account of the thieves encountered in Dakota and description of their rendezvous tallies exactly with the underground railroad story related by Robert Harvey in another chapter of this volume. The United States flag which he claims to have seen at or near Fort Kearney helps to corroborate his story, for there was at that time a tall flag pole from which the flag continually floated, standing on a prominence in front of the fort. A portion of this flag pole is now in the historical museum in the state library at Lincoln.

It is altogether probable that Uncle John's stimulated imagination may account for some of the details he recites, yet we think it altogether possible and probable that he made the trip he claims to have made, at or near the time he claims to have made it, and as none can dispute the story it becomes creditable history and accordingly we make the statement that Uncle John Wilmouth is the first man to have seen Custer county who is still alive.

If Nebraska is the central state of the Union, Custer county is the central county of the state. If Nebraska is the heart of the nation, Custer county is the heart of Nebraska, and in its relation to the entire country is the heart of the heart. All that Nebraska is in rank and place to the United States, Custer county is to other counties of the state. If there are advantages in a central location, they accrue, in the whole, to Custer county. So far as north and south are concerned the north line of the county is eighty-three miles south of the north line of the state, while the south line of the county is seventy-two miles north of the south line of the state. In its relation to east and west, the east line of the county is one hundred and seventy-four miles west of the average east line of the state, and the west line of the county is one hundred and sixty-two miles east of the average west line of the state. This places the geographical center of the state well into the heart of Custer county. As nearly as can be ascertained by map measurements, the northwest corner of township 18, range 23 west, township 18 north, is the geographical center of Nebraska. This falls in Custer county and is approximately four miles south of Anselmo.

But since it is best, perhaps, to trace its boundaries so as to record size as well as location, drive a stake down on the northeast corner of section 1, township 20 north, range 17 west, 6th principal meridian, then run a straight line west fifty-four miles over hills and valleys to the northwest corner of section 6, township 20 north, range 25 west, thence south in a straight line forty-eight miles to the southwest corner of section 31, township 13 north, thence east in a line straight and true to the southeast corner of section 36, township 13 north, range 17 west, thence north forty-eight miles, as the surveyor would say, to the place of beginning. Now we have run the boundaries of the county. We have enclosed seventy-two townships of thirty-six sections each or a tract of land containing 2,592 square miles. The average man can perhaps best understand the extent of territory if it is described in acres. Custer county contains 1,658,880 acres of land.

TABLE LANDS AND VALLEYS

The general topography of the county might be described as rolling or undulating, ranging from precipitous and broken cliffs along the rivers to the level lands of tables and valleys. There are several plateaus which are commonly called table land, and accordingly have received their respective cognomens. In the central part of the county is the celebrated "West" table, a very fertile, productive soil region and the largest table in the county. Directly east across on the eastern side of the dale or Merna valley is the "East" table.

Over in the northeast section of the county the "French" table and "Boggs" table have prominent place and are celebrated for their productive farm lands. South of the center of the county is the "Ryno" table. In the southeast corner there is a large tract of table land that is called "Blackhill Basin." Let no man think because this table is called the "Blackhill Basin" that it is not table land. All plateaus or tables are higher at their outer edge or rim than in the center. The southwest corner of the county has a monopty, nine miles west of the southeast corner. The Middle Loup valley is approximately forty-eight miles long and from three to eight miles wide. It comes in from the north, crossing the county line in the exact center of the county east and west, and runs out through the east line of the county eighteen miles south of the northeast corner. In addition to these major valleys there are smaller valleys, along the creeks and smaller streams, that are unnamed. Other well defined valleys have been given place and name on the

Along with the tables go the valleys, and if the county is celebrated for its table-land it is also noted for its extensive and fertile valleys. The South Loup valley leads all the valleys of the county in size. It is approximately sixty miles long and from three to five miles wide. It enters the county at the west line, west and north of Arnold, and runs out through the south line of the coun-

Custer county map and demand a place and name in this volume. In the northwest section of the county are Dale valley, Ortello valley, Eureka valley, Sand valley, Hoosier valley, and Muddy Creek valley. Over in the northeast the valleys are dignified by the name of parks, accordingly we have Cummings Park, Woods Park, Lee's Park, and Spencer Park. Roten valley is over in the southeast corner of the county. All these valleys are generally level, deep-soiled, and well-watered and in an early day were very attractive to home-seekers. They were the first lands to be settled and accordingly are to-day the sites of the oldest farms.

In addition to the two forks of the Loup river which flow through the county there are several other small streams which affect more or less the topography of the county,—Clear creek, in the east portion of the county, the Muddy, originating in the center of the county and flowing down toward the southeast corner; Deer creek, Spring creek, Ash creek, and Wood river are all in the south half of the county. Over in the north, Victoria creek, Lillian creek, and Rifle creek are the principal water courses, outside of the rivers. The lineal measurements of Custer county's rivers and creeks are more than two hundred and fifty miles. In the early days many of these streams were well wooded with ash, box-elder, jack oak, willow, elm, and other varieties, among which red cedar figured prominently.

UNDULATIONS TABULATED

A more detailed description of the topography of the county given by townships and ranges as displayed in the records of the state office of the surveyor general is as follows:

Township 13. Rolling; black loam; fine grass land.

Township 14. Rolling; black loam; smooth valley along Muddy creek.

Township 15. Rolling; black loam; smooth valley along Muddy creek.

Township 16. Fine valley along Clear creek; balance rolling.

Township 17. All rolling; black loam; fine grass land.

Township 18. East of Middle Loup; quite sandy; west, fine, irrigation ditch in operation.

Township 19. Sandy in Loup valley, fertile; balance rolling, grass land.

Township 20. Rolling, fine black loam, good grass land.

Township 13. Rolling; fine black loam; fine farms in Elk creek valley, rest grazing.

Township 14. Good farms along Elk creek; balance rolling, fertile.

Township 15. Muddy creek valley, fertile; balance rolling.

Township 16. Rolling, except in Clear and Muddy creek valleys.

Township 17. Fine valley land along creek, with rolling, grass land between.

Township 18. Fine valley, surrounded by rolling, grass land.

Township 19. Middle Loup valley, fertile, some sand; rolling south of river.

Township 20. Nearly all rolling; some rather rough, good grass land.

Township 13. Fine ranches along South Loup; balance rolling; black soil.

Township 14. Rolling; black loam; good valleys.

Township 15. Rolling; black loam; good valleys.

Township 16. Fine valleys along Muddy and Dutchman creeks; balance rolling, good.

Township 17. Good valley along Clear creek; balance rolling, good land.

Township 18. Several small valleys, very fertile; balance rolling.

Township 19. Good valley north of Middle Loup, south, sandy; balance rolling, with good valleys.

Township 20. Rolling, but good land.

Township 13. Rolling; black loam; fine valley along Loup.

Township 14. Good valley along Loup; balance rolling.

Township 15. Rolling; rough in north part.

Township 16. Good along Muddy creek; balance rolling, rough in south.

Township 17. Good along Muddy and Clear creeks; balance rolling.

Township 18. Rolling with good valleys.

Township 19. Good valleys along Middle Loup river and Lillian creek; rolling in south part with good valleys; Lillian irrigation ditch.

Township 20. Good valley along Middle Loup; balance rolling.

Township 13. Very fine land along Wood river; balance rolling.

Township 14. Rolling, except along Loup river.

Township 15. Rolling; fine grass land.

Township 16. Fine level land in southwest; some sand in northeast; balance rolling.

Township 17. Fine valley in northwest; table-land in northeast; balance rolling, some sand.

Township 18. Table-land in south; fine valley in center; balance rolling.

Township 19. Fine valley along Victoria creek; balance rolling, some sand.

Township 20. Middle Loup valley; balance rolling and sandy.

Township 13. Rolling; good valleys and grass land.

Township 14. Wood river valley, fertile; balance rolling.

Township 15. South Loup river and Spring creek valleys, good; balance rolling, rough.

Township 16. Rolling with good valleys; good soil; grass land.

Township 17. Northwest part fine table-land; northeast part good valley; east, sandy.

Township 18. East part fine valley; balance rolling, with good valleys.

Township 19. Southeast good valley; balance sandy and rolling.

Township 20. Sandy, rolling land; good ranches.

Township 14. South part fine table-land; balance rolling, good valleys.

Township 15. South part rough; large valley; Loup valley and west of township sandy loam.

Township 16. Good valley along South Loup; balance rough, rolling.

Township 17. North and east parts fine table-lands; rest rolling, rough.

Township 18. Southwest fine table; Ortel-lo valley, fertile; north part sandy, rolling.

Township 19. Rolling, sandy land; good ranches.

Township 20. Rolling, sandy land, good ranches.

Township 13. Rolling land with good valleys.

Township 14. Some fine table-land; balance rolling.

Township 15. South third rolling; central third valley, sandy; north third sandy and rough.

Township 16. Good valley along Loup; balance rolling and rough.

Township 17. Rolling and rough grazing land; northeast table-land.

Township 18. South part fine table-land; balance rolling; north some sand.

Township 19. Rolling, sandy, grass land.

Township 13. Rolling lands with good valleys.

Township 14. Rolling lands with good valleys and table-lands.

Township 15. Fine table-land; valley in eastern part.

Township 16. Rolling land; some sand in north part.

Township 17. Good valley along South Loup; balance rolling, rough.

Township 18. Rough, rolling, grazing lands.

Township 19. Rolling, sandy; grass lands; ranches.

Township 20. Rolling, sandy; grass lands; ranches.

Custer county has a deep, rich soil, well suited to all kinds of agriculture and grass production. In the north and west part of the county is a region known as the sand hills, but these hills are well grassed and produce continually a nutritious crop of more than forty different kinds of grasses. These grasses are very nutritious and make splendid grazing for cattle. Many of the valleys in the sand hill region have a mixture of clay or black loam in the sand composition which makes them profitable for farming or agricultural purposes. In all other sections of the county the hills are generally clay sub-soil and in addition to producing luxuriant grasses produce in abundance all kinds of agricultural products. The table lands and valleys are adapted to all kinds of grains and especially to the growth of alfalfa.

NO TECHNICAL TERMS

In the description of soil, it does not serve the purpose to be technical. This is not a scientific treatise. Geologists tell us that the soils of the county that are tillable are of cretaceous rock formation, or in other words decomposed rock. When decomposition was complete the soil thus formed was distributed over the lower levels by the action of wind and water. A recent soil survey of central Nebraska west of Hall and Howard counties, made by the United States government, designates the soil of Custer county generally as "Colby silt." Silt is defined as mud and fine earth deposited by water, and in its distribution, if not in its production, the water has always been aided and abetted by the wind. Generally speaking, the soil is from a few feet to many feet in depth and may be divided into three principal kinds. The alluvial soils of the creeks and river valleys are called Lincoln loams. The hills or upland table soils are called "Colby silt" and the sandy silt, ranging from a good sandy soil to almost pure sand, is found on top of the sand dunes. All these soils have value in the propagation of plant life. The soil character so far as the valleys are concerned is generally uniform. For miles on either side of the streams the alluvial soil belongs to the Lincoln silt series and is rich in humus and very productive. This silt has a strata of Colby silt, washed from the hills and higher ground in the formative periods. The Colby silt of the hills or upland tables is also uniform and exceedingly productive when climatic conditions are favorable. Like the soils of the valley it contains nitrogen, potash, and phos-phorate in sufficient amounts to produce abundant plant life.

For a full three dozen years the soils of Custer county have been in cultivation, and during these years, when rainfall was sufficient, have justified the claim that they are well adapted to agricultural purposes.

Underneath the soil stratum lies a deep bed of glacial gravel, through which flows an inexhaustible quantity of purest water, very soft, and free from mineral compositions. All deep wells in the county go down into this gravel stratum and are thus guaranteed the finest kind of water, in absolutely inexhaustible quantities.

HARVEY'S CONTRIBUTION

[Robert Harvey, the man who ran the lines of Custer county survey and who has been Nebraska state surveyor for many years, makes the following contribution to this volume]:

The territory embraced within the limits of my exterior lines was a tract thirty-six miles north and south and forty-eight miles east and west, and during the progress of the work there naturally occurred incidents of trivial moment at the time and few of them found a mention in the field notes of surveys or in the reports to the surveyor general; but as the years pass and the generations succeed each other on the stage of action their thoughts turn back to the first things, first happenings and the first movements toward planting a new civilization.

In all new countries a certain line of alleged incidents becomes current, stock stories and traditions, and some have found their way into published histories as historic facts.

I will endeavor in the following pages briefly to tell the story of some of the incidents which occurred in connection with my party and progress of the work and observations made, some of which are of record and some of memory.

BRIDGING CLEAR CREEK

The party was organized and outfitted at St. Paul, Howard county, and on going to the work I proceeded up the south side of the Middle Loup and over the table land to Clear creek, which I found to be about ten feet wide and five feet deep, near the north line of section 1, township 15 north, range 17 west. The banks were soft and there was no timber within five or six miles, except a small clump of box-elders near our camp. I cut steps in the banks and on these set four ten-gallon water casks, two on each bank, and upon these we placed the empty wagon-box. For approaches, the end-gates and the box-elders were used. The supplies were carried over and the four mules led through, all within two hours. A few days afterward two surveying parties of about eighteen men spent half a day building a bridge six miles below, of cottonwood logs, cut in a nearby canyon.

A MUTINY

After reaching our initial, which was the corner of townships 14 and 15 north, ranges 17 and 18 west, on the south side of Muddy creek, I ran north six miles, when, upon reaching camp, I found that the camp men, unused to conserving the water supply, had nearly exhausted it, so after a late dinner I told the men we would hitch up and run the line a mile or two north to where I supposed the creek to be, and camp for the night. Two of the men revolted, struck, said they had done their day's work and would go no farther. I had not known these men before they were engaged, they having been recommended to me. During our travel to the work they had studiously avoided reaching the noon and night camps until after the camp work was done, but always in time for their meals; jocosely they said to the men, out of my hearing, that they were out on a "lark," a "picnic" and to "have a good time." Now I considered the time had come when there must be a "show of hands," so after explaining the necessity for the move and their still declining to move, I told them they could either obey orders or quit; they said they would quit. I told them to turn in their arms and ammunition (which belonged to the government), roll their blankets, take two days' rations and get outside of the camp ground within fifteen minutes, and that fifteen meant fifteen and not sixteen; it was done and they walked out. When the surveyor general heard of this he mildly reprimanded me, saying that it was a dangerous procedure to discharge men in an Indian infested county, but I said they were given a choice and they volunteered to quit. In after years when I went into the jurisdiction of another surveyor general, in one of the southwestern territories, I found I had a record, the story had preceded me. I was compelled, however, to return and procure other men.

FIND RUINS OF OLD FORTIFICATIONS

I completed the township lines south of the fourth standard parallel, returned to the east side of the work, and began running the lines between the fourth and fifth parallels. On running east on the line between townships 18 and 19, range 17, we found on the right bank of the Loup river a circular line of fortifications overgrown with grass and extending from bank to bank. In the grass we found rust-eaten tin plates and tin cups and in the brush on the east side an old set of hay scales.

AN IMPENDING INDIAN BATTLE

This was in section 33, township 19, range 17 north. Being nearly out of provisions, I only ran this line east to the river and proceeded down the river to the upper end of an island which I think is about opposite Comstock, and camped close to the river bank. On the west, about fifty or a hundred yards, was a broad, bulrush slough which entered the river farther down. I thought this a good defensive position against Indians, as the only way they could get at us with their ponies would be to come down along the narrow strip of solid ground between the ruin and slough for a mile or two.

While the cook was getting dinner, I looked across the valley and noticed several horse-men on the bluffs, who were going southeast toward the river, and before reaching the valley they saw us and came directly toward our camp; of course, they were Indians. I therefore sent the two best shots into the bulrushes with instruction not to let them cross the slough, while we threw up a line of breast-works in front of the camp. While thus engaged I got into the wagon, so I could see across the swamp. Someone said, "Where is Jim Scott?" His spade was in the rifle pit but he was gone and the word went round that Jim had run. The wagon stood close to the cut bank and looking over I saw Jim putting on a new pair of overalls. I yelled, "Jim, what are you doing? Why ain't you digging?" "Well, boss," said Jim, "I just thought if we are to fight I don't want to be found dead in an old pair of ragged overalls."

No sound came from the bulrushes, neither could I see any signs of Indians or my two men, when finally one of the men appeared and called that they were white men and soldiers. Captain John Mix, of a cavalry command, was out on reconnoissance and was camped about two miles down the river, behind some timber, and these men were returning hunters for the command.

A CAMP FIRE

After having received supplies I continued the range line north. I camped at the corner of townships 18 and 20, ranges 17 and 18, and completed the line between townships 19 and 20, range 18, in the afternoon. Next morning I found that the teamster, Charley Storey, had brought, from the river the evening before, only one barrel of water and the stock and camp had used nearly all of it, leaving only a small supply for use of the men and team that were to go north to the county line, or parallel. So Storey was instructed to return to the river for more water.

The tent stood about three chains north of the township corner and it had to be taken down so that I could see to set the flagman. We reached the county line at noon and at the last flag station, on a hill just south of the line, I looked back and noticed a thin column of smoke shooting straight up and directly over the line. We hurriedly ate our dinner and hurried back to camp, and from the bluff overlooking the valley saw that the camp was on fire, the tent down and men trying to put out the fire. It seemed that after we had started north on the line the cook concluded to go with Storey to the river, for Storey's father had been killed by the Indians and he was very unsafe to be trusted alone. Before going, however, he dug a trench, emptied the fire box of the sheet iron stove into it, sprinkled water on the living coals and then covered them over with earth. They were at the river when they noticed the smoke, but the cook ran the three miles, reached camp before the tent fell, saved the small trench containing field notes and maps, etc., and carried out the box of five hundred rounds of paper cartridge ammunition for revolvers. The pine box had burned through at one corner, scorched the inside paper lining and in perhaps another instant the entire contents would have exploded. The tent, one wagon-cover, all of our bedding, extra clothing, and the grain and flour sacks were consumed. John M. Daugherty, who was running section lines, was camped in front of the entrance to Woods Park and lent us what assistance he could by loaning us grain sacks, boxes, etc., to hold what we were able to save, and some extra blankets. Mr. Daugherty's party was at dinner when they saw the smoke and through a field glass said they saw some men at the camp, saw the team returning from the river and saw the tent fall. They thought it was Indians raiding the camp. It was suggested that the two men discharged in July, had returned to commit the depredation. Upon examination it was found that the dry buffalo grass had not been burned for several feet around the stove, and there was no evidence of there having been an explosion of the buried coals. I have never been able to formulate a satisfactory theory as to the cause of this fire. This caused me a loss of several days in going to the settlement on the Loup where I was loaned tents, blankets, etc., by Captain Munon, of Company C, Ninth United States Infantry, who was then camped near the present town of Cotesfield, Howard county.

FIND AN ERROR ON FIFTH PARALLEL

Resuming work, I returned to the 4th parallel and projected the next range line with its complement of township lines, and at the end of the twenty-four miles I should have intersected the 5th parallel or county line north of a cedar canyon, and after a half day's search found the corner nearest my intersection had within a few days been torn down and a new one built about fifty rods west, and on the west side of the canyon near a pine tree. Here was more trouble.

My camp was on the north side of the Loup river and Daugherty's camp on the south side below. On my return I reported to Daugherty what I had found and proposed a joint examination. He opposed it, as it would cause a loss of time and besides that, that our authority was to close on the line as we found it. We locked horns at once. I insisted that according to my closing six miles east a few days before a great balk had been made somewhere along the line and we would have to show to the surveyor general's office that it was not in our lines, by pointing out by an examination when it existed, and since I had the township lines between the 5th and 1th parallels I would then have to explain the discrepancy. In fact, I would not be able to run their lines until it was reported and passed upon by the surveyor general. Further, that I proposed to find the error and report it, as neither of us would be able to get pay for any work in townships 20 in any of the ranges until it was settled. I insisted that he should bear a part of the expense, so it was finally agreed that next morning he bring his team and two or three men, and that I should send to his camp three men so that his work could go on. We spent two days on that examination and found that Park had torn down his original line and set all of the corners west from fifty to sixty rods for five miles and from the southwest corner of section 36, range 18, had set a section corner west 15.80 chains and marked it for the corner of sections 34 and 35, which we found on the west side of the canyon among some trees and south of the old Kent postoffice in Loup county. The corner one mile west of it was marked the same. The construction of the new corners showed fraud, for some of them were scarcely distinguishable. We left them as found, for we knew they must or should be destroyed and a new line run. On our return to camp we made out a report to the surveyor general, read it to the assistants, which were subscribed to before us. Next day Mr. Daugherty, being in need of provisions, sent his team and driver with one of my men to St. Paul, with the report to be mailed to the surveyor general. We also sent notice to Mr. Park at North Platte, so that he could correct his line.

I had a partial acquaintance with Mr. Park in 1869, in Omaha, had been in his camp and had seen him at work in the field. In the Civil war he was lieutenant colonel of the Fourth Michigan Cavalry, which captured Jefferson Davis, and therefore came to the state with political and military prestige. His first connection with the surveys of the public lands that I find in the records is his contract number 1, dated July 2, 1867. In the same party with me in 1869 were two men who were with Park in 1868, in Howard and Sherman counties, and I heard a great deal about him, so I was anxious that Mr. Daugherty should join me in the examination of the parallel for his individual and moral support.

Park, Daugherty, and myself were called in conference in January following, when it was agreed that Mr. Park should correct the line in early spring and correct our closing corners to alignment on the new line and report the same to us. I never received any report, but I notice in my notes that my figures, in black ink, are corrected, in red ink, by the surveyor general's office.

A LAME OX AND THE REMEDY

In early September one of the oxen became very lame in one of its hind feet, by reason of the wearing through of the sole of the hoof. Various schemes were tried without relief and it became a question of turning it loose in the brush along the river, when it was bethought to try shoeing it with hoop iron. A heavy hoop was taken from a water barrel and a shoe cut out to fit the toe. The ox was tied up along the side of the camp wagon with the foot strapped down on top of the hub. We were unable to drive the shingle nails through the edge of the dry hard hoof. The holes were drilled and the burned nails driven and clinched. We had no further trouble and the shoe remained for several months.

NAMES OF CREEKS

I gave the name of Rock creek to the little stream of water flowing into the deep river at the south edge of the oak grove, in township 18, range 17, on finding rock in the bottom of the river at its mouth; the name of Lillian to the stream on the south side of the Loup in township 19, ranges 18 and 19, and Victoria in townships 19 and 20, ranges 20 and 21, after two nieces living in Indiana.

FOOLING THE COOK

During all my previous years on the plains, I had heard it claimed that the antelope was a species of the sheep family, and especially the pilgrim plainmen maintained they had the odor of sheep, that the meat tasted like sheep and they were sheep. So it was with nearly all of my party in Custer county, and the cook was so very positive that they were mutton that his stomach rebelled when he cooked the meat. To bring matters to a test, a bet was made of an oyster supper for the entire crew that he could not distinguish the difference blindfolded. So one forenoon by good luck a deer and antelope were killed, and the saddles and sirloin cut out. In the evening the cook fried in separate pans cuts of sirloin of each, so that he knew he would have a square deal. When blindfolded he was given a piece of the deer and then the antelope and failed each time. It was tried in various ways and finally he was given one kind several times in succession, then the other. He guessed it correctly once and his stomach never rebelled after that. Antelope and sheep are of an entirely different and distinct species.

GOVERNMENT SURVEYS

The act of congress, approved July 22, 1854, created the surveying district of Kansas and Nebraska territories.

John Calhoun, of Springfield, Illinois, was appointed surveyor general, by President Franklin Pierce, August 15, 1854, with headquarters at Leavenworth, Kansas.

The first contract for surveys was awarded to Professor Jonathan P. Johnson, November 2, 1854, for the first sixty miles of the Base line on the fortieth parallel of north latitude.

On March 1, 1867, Nebraska territory was admitted into the Union as a state and the surveying district was changed, Kansas being consolidated with Wisconsin, and Nebraska with Iowa July 28, 1866, under the title of "Iowa and Nebraska," with the surveyor general's office at Plattsmouth. Phineas P. Hitchcock, of Omaha, for surveyor general, was appointed by President Andrew Johnson in April, 1867.

While the two territories constituted the surveying district 233 contracts were awarded for surveys in the two territories, but in the new district contracts began with number 1.

The first survey of the public lands which affected Custer county was the establishment of the southeast corner of township 13 north, range 17 west, or the third initial point of the second guide meridian west, by H. C. F. Hackbusch, 1866.

Surveyors whose work in any way affected Custer county were:

- 1—H. C. F. Hackbusch, Leavenworth, Kansas;
- 2—J. B. Park, Omaha;
- 3—Nicholas J. Paul, Omaha, now St. Paul;
- 4—John F. Burch, Omaha;
- 5—Robert Harvey, St. Paul;
- 6—Joe E. North, Columbus;
- 7—John W. Daugherty, Fremont;
- 8—James L. Slocum, Falls City;
- 9—D. V. Stephenson, Falls City;
- 10—Zadok Stephenson, Falls City;
- 11—S. C. McElroy, Falls City;
- 12—H. C. Campbell, address not known.

Of the above list of twelve surveyors, only numbers 3, 5, and 8 are known to me to be now living.

An abstract of the history of the government survey is given in the following tables:

Note: The connecting lines are the distances from the closing corners to the nearest corners on the parallels, owing to the convergence of meridians and not to errors of surveys.

Table II is the subdivision of townships into sections and gives the numbers of the townships, names of the surveyors, date and number of contract, lengths of lines in miles, chains, and links, and year when survey was made, and includes the length of the right bank of the Loup river and all connecting lines. See note above in table II.

Table IV is a tabulation of the land and water area of the county by ranges. These data by townships are very instructive and useful, but would occupy about three pages and therefore are omitted.

The Middle Loup river having been meandered, the water area is deducted from the public lands. The south branch was not meandered and its area was sold as a part of the land area and is therefore not included in the tabulation.

I always employed a full crew of men, consisting of a cook, teamsters, two chainmen, two cornermen, and one flagman. In Custer county I had altogether twelve men; two were discharged at the beginning, for mutiny, and two discharged after the destruction of the camp by fire in August; three remained throughout the work, six were accessions. Only five are known to be living.

CUSTER COUNTY WEATHER

No detailed description of climatic conditions in Custer county is necessary. It can be truthfully stated that the climate is much the same as in other parts of the middle west, and admirably adapted to stock-raising and agriculture. It has always been a very healthful climate.

Through the courtesy of G. A. Loveland, meteorologist in charge of the United States Weather Bureau, at Lincoln, Nebraska, the following tables showing precipitation in the county covering a range of thirty-six years and temperature covering a period of seventeen years are given.

The earliest reports come from Sargent and the following tables in the order of their establishment, are submitted.

A MORNING HUNT ON THE MIDDLE LOUP IN CUSTER COUNTY

The hunter is Mr. A. Pulliam, a crack shot, as can be seen by the two coyotes strapped behind his saddle

CHAPTER III

IN THE DAYS OF CATTLE

RANCHES ARE LOCATED — BIG PROFITS — LIFE WITH THE COWBOYS — WOMEN WERE SCARCE — A STAMPEDE — THE ROUNDUP — A ROUNDUP OF ROUNDUPS — CATTLE MEN VERSUS SETTLERS — A NEAR BATTLE — AN UNDERGROUND RAILROAD — THE WILD WEST HAS WILD HORSES

When the white man found this location the prairies were covered with buffalo, deer, elk, and antelope, while the prairie chickens, grouse, wild duck, and goose were found in great abundance. This was nature's suggestion that the country was suited to stock-raising and poultry production, and the demonstration of the years since has justified the prediction. In the early days of Custer county, cattle raising was the only occupation. It indeed was a profitable industry. As early as 1869 the great advantages of this country attracted attention of the cattlemen of the south and east. The territory, well grassed and well watered, was very attractive.

Texas was then the greatest breeding ground for cattle and horses in the United States and probably in the world, but it was railroadless and without means of transportation. Cattlemen were compelled to trail their stock across many hundred miles of prairie to find a railroad shipping point. At that time Ogallala, in western Nebraska, was the shipping point for all the adjacent plains to the south, including the Panhandle territory and all northern Texas. Cattle were brought to this point in such numbers that at times it was estimated more than a hundred thousand head grazed on the surrounding ranges, awaiting shipment. These cattle were sometimes held for months. Grass ranges were in demand.

During these long waits the cattle were frequently allowed to range over the divide, on the north into the South Loup valley, and thus the Texans and southern cattlemen discovered that their herds could live and keep fat all winter on the rich, luxurious grasses which they found here in great abundance. The fame of the South Loup valley spread among cattlemen. They investigated. They found plenty of grass of different varieties, among which was an abundance of buffalo grass, best adapted for winter pasture. They found hills and breaks that afforded shelter from the winter storms. They found an abundance of running water in open streams, and all these advantages combined to make it an ideal cattle country, into which cattlemen were not long in driving their herds.

RANCHES ARE LOCATED

At this late day it is almost impossible to be accurate about dates or the order in which cattlemen settled in the country. At that time all was government land and the stockmen came in and appropriated their ranges. They set up land marks and made claims for so many miles of prairie in this direction and that direction until they had assured themselves of plenty of territory. Ranges often overlapped, herds became mixed, but that made small difference. Some few erected fences but for the most part herds ran at large. Concerning dates and settlements, the following is given upon the authority of Judge H. M. Sullivan:

In the winter of 1869 and 1870 one Captain

Streeter for the first time wintered cattle in the territory now comprising Custer county. On Ash creek, a short distance south of Broken Bow, he turned out in the fall 821 cattle, of which 385 were yearlings. They were all Texas cattle; the following spring he rounded up 819, a loss of only two head.

In 1872 E. J. Boblits came into the South Loup country, located a range on what is now known as Tuckerville and stocked it heavily with cattle. Boblits has since acquired the title of judge, through efficient occupancy of the office of county judge, to which he was several times elected. He is one of the few stockmen who is still in the country occupying the same location. In fact, he claims the distinction of being the oldest continual resident of the county. He also claims to have built the first frame house in the county.

The Boblits family is still living on part of the ranch, in a magnificent country home where generous southern hospitality is still on exhibition.

Childs B. Harrington, H. C. Stuckey, and Anton Abel located ranches shortly after this in the eastern half of the South Loup valley. About the same time Williams and Kilgore and John Myers located in the same region, a little more to the south.

In 1872 John Harrington came from Texas and located a ranch on the South Loup, eight miles northwest of Callaway in the region of Triumph. He brought in about two thousand head of cattle and built three cedar-log houses. These houses were built in true southern fashion, with the passways between them roofed.

A cattle ranch was established by Nimrod Caple and Manly, his son, in 1875, on the head of Spring creek, where bursts forth from the side of a steep hill one of the largest and purest springs in the country. Mr. Caple sold out his cattle and left in 1876. In his departure many a settler rejoiced, for his cattle were always doing some damage to crops. Mr. Caple always offered to pay, but invariably carried a fifty-dollar bill, which none of his neighbors could ever "bust." He always, in this way, got his cattle, but the farmer seldom got any pay.

In 1876 Edward Holway and J. D. Haskell occupied the same ranch formerly located by Harrington, and this ranch was afterwards sold to the Parker Live Stock Company of Illinois. The range claimed by those owning this ranch was the South Loup valley from Triumph west to Cedar canyon and the territory north adjoining.

The Parker Live Stock Company first came to the county in 1876. It located its headquarters at a point about two miles west of Callaway, and claimed as its range what is now known as Sand valley and the territory lying south and west. This company began with 1,500 head of cattle, and J. J. Douglass, afterward clerk of the district court of this county, was the manager.

In 1876 Durfee & Gasman located a ranch a short distance north of Callaway on the north side of the Loup, at what is known as the Big Spring, on the farm now owned by N. M. Morgan, and they began business with 3,000 steers.

W. H. Paxton, of Omaha, in 1876, located a ranch a short distance southeast of Callaway, on the Cottonwood, with 2,000 cattle.

In 1878 Durfee & Gasman bought out the Paxton ranch and consolidated it with their ranch on the opposite side of the river. The range they claimed after the consolidation was the large valley about Callaway, the Wood River valley and the valley of the Cottonwood.

In 1876 Arnold & Ritchie located a ranch on the Loup, a short distance east of Arnold, with 1,000 cattle.

In 1877 Henry Brothers located another ranch, west of Arnold, with 3,000 cattle.

Some time previously to this, the afterward famous Olive Brothers located a ranch on the Dismal river, in Blaine county. Later, in the fall of 1877, without giving up the Dismal river ranch, they moved headquarters to the South Loup and established a ranch which included a good many thousand acres of South Loup valley and included Spring creek and Turner valley. They claimed to have, in all, something like fifteen thousand head of cattle, but those who had opportunity to know, doubted their holdings were so extensive.

In 1875 N. H. Dryden, now of Kearney, located a range on Victoria creek, settled there and brought with him about 100 head of cattle.

In 1876 Thomas Loughran and I. Childs each entered land on the river, near the Dryden ranch, and also began raising cattle.

The same year Frank Ewing located a ranch in the Middle Loup valley, near where Milburn now is, with 600 head of cattle.

In 1878 Smith & Tee located on the north side of the Middle Loup river, not far from the ranch of Ewing. They turned out about 800 head of cattle.

In 1879 Finch-Hatten Brothers located a ranch on the Loup, just below the mouth of the Dismal, with 700 head of cattle.

Shortly afterward Miles & Gamlin followed with 1,600 head of cattle, locating not far from the ranch of Finch-Hatten Brothers.

Other cattlemen came into the country during these times of whom it is impossible to get much reliable data. Among these were the Finlen Brothers, Rankin Live Stock Company, and others. The Finlen Brothers remained in the country for years. Thomas Finlen is still a resident.

The cattlemen met with no reverses until the winter of 1880-81.

At this late date it is impossible to know accurately, the number of cattle in Custer county in the summer of 1880, but there were probably very nearly 60,000 head of cattle, of the value of not less than $1,500,000. The greater part of these cattle had been reared or brought into the county after the year 1875.

BIG PROFITS

Probably in the settlement of the United States no agricultural or grazing territory of a similar area witnessed such a rapid accumulation of wealth. Up to the winter of 1880-81 the profits from the business had exceeded the most sanguine expectations of the ranchman.

The winters were mild and pleasant, with plenty of moisture during the springs and summers. The buffalo grass upon the hills each year made a splendid growth. During the spring and summer the cattle did not graze upon this grass, for there was plenty of blue-stem, grama, and rye grass in the valleys and lagoons. But with the advent of freezing weather the cattle at once went to the hills to feed upon the buffalo grass. No more valuable winter forage exists than buffalo grass properly cured. Cattle fed upon the best of wild hay will not be in better condition in the spring than those which have wintered upon buffalo grass. In the economy of nature this grass seems to have been created and brought forth especially for winter feed. The thousands of buffaloes that originally roamed this country and made it their winter home lived upon this grass during the winter; hence the name.

In those days there was a greater profit in buying young Texas steers and holding them, than in raising calves. Yearling steers brought here from Texas could be bought at from five to six dollars per head; two-year-old for nine dollars; three-year-old from twelve to fourteen dollars; cows from ten to twelve dollars.

These same steers, kept on Custer county range for from eighteen months to two years, would sell from twenty-five to forty and forty-five dollars per head.

For a number of years no taxes were levied against the cattle. No investment in real estate was necessary. The cedar canyons furnished material for houses, corrals, and fuel. There was no expense for fencing or wells. The increase in value was nearly all profit. The only important items of expense in the business were supplies for and wages to the cowboys. They received thirty-five to forty dollars per month.

LIFE WITH THE COWBOYS

It would be hard to give a better portrayal of the experiences, hardships, and danger to which the cowboys were subjected in the early days than that written by J. D. Haskell, of Arnold, who is now a prominent rancher and stockman of the South Loup region:

"In those days big cattle-owners thought that if they furnished a tent for their men to sleep in it would be too much luxury and would make life with the herd altogether too easy. They figured that men would be slow to leave the tent on stormy nights and look after the cattle. On the roundup and on the trail cattle always had to be night-herded. The cattle that had been gathered during the day were never left for a moment until they were back on the owner's range. Night shifts were necessary. The first shift rode around the cattle until eleven o'clock. The second from eleven until two, and the third from two o'clock until after breakfast. These reliefs were composed of from one to four men, according to the size of the herd. In the spring, through the months of April and May, a good deal of rain generally fell and not infrequently there was snow and blizzards. It was often cloudy and drizzly for three or four days at a time. The cowboys were compelled to make their beds on the wet ground, and very often a heavy rain would come on in the night and they would find themselves lying in a sheet of water. In such cases there was nothing to do but get up and lean against the wagon or saddle horse until morning.

"With daylight, work would begin and no opportunity was offered through the day to dry clothing and bedding. When night came on again there was nothing to do but turn into wet blankets.

"No stove was furnished with the cook wagon. Bread was baked in a 'dutch oven,' and other food in skillets. Frequently there was no time to eat breakfast. It always seemed strange that the men, compelled as they were constantly to endure this exposure, escaped contracting fatal diseases.

WOMEN WERE SCARCE

"On a regular cattle ranch no women were to be found. There was always a man to do the cooking. Those who sampled cattle-ranch hospitality claim that the cooks were almost experts.

"Ranchmen and cowboys, like most other members of class occupation, were clannish and stuck together in protection of each others' interests. They were generous to a fault among themselves and to any one needy, but for an outsider to mingle in their business was not altogether healthy exercise.

A STAMPEDE

"In 1877 three men and a cook were holding a band of 1,000 Texas steers on the Muddy, where Broken Bow now stands. They had to night-herd the cattle every night. They saw only one man pass during the three months they were there. They received no mail and had nothing to read. As they were all young men who had been reared in the far east they experienced a lonely time, shut in from the outside world.

"The last of September the owner sent a man to direct them to move the cattle to the ranch near where Callaway now is, that they might be taken from there to Lexington and shipped to Chicago. The first night after the start for the ranch they camped about seven miles west of where they had held the cattle. The early part of the night was beautiful. All the boys but the night-herder had turned in and for the first time in three months were enjoying sleep under a roof.

"About ten o'clock the man out with the cattle observed a black, angry cloud moving up from the north. He rode to the tent, called to the other men to hurry up and help hold the cattle. They got up slowly, grumbling. However, as soon as they looked out and saw what a terrible storm was coming, they rushed for their horses, but before they could saddle and mount, the storm had struck them.

"In the meantime the watcher had hurried back to the cattle. He had almost reached the head of the herd when the storm broke. The darkness was intense. A terrible wind drove the rain in sheets. The entire herd jumped to their feet as one steer and started on a wild stampede before the storm. And oh, such a night!

"The instant the cattle started, the boy was also gone like a shot along the side of the herd. For more than a mile he ran beside the herd, over chop hills, across canyons, trying to get in the lead of the steers.

"The roar of 4,000 hoof beats, mingled with the constant crash of thunder, made it a race never to be forgotten. The cattle could only be seen by the rider at the flash of the lightning, which was so dazzling as almost to blind his eyes. Time and again the wiry pony was on his knees, but almost instantly up and going again.

"Gradually the pony gained upon the leaders and the rider held him in against them. They began to swerve from their straight course before the storm. Gradually he brought them to running in a circle, then as he closed in nearer the outside cattle the circle became smaller and smaller until they were at a standstill.

"The storm ended as suddenly as it began. Shortly his companions were there and the cattle were driven back to the tent and held until morning, when, on a count of the herd, it was found twenty-five were missing. These were found later—not far from where the cattle were stopped the night before—lying upon the hillside and resting from their terrible run.

"The point where that stampede was stopped was at what is now the Charles Jeffords farm at the foot of the Big Table."

THE ROUNDUP

Prior to the winter of 1880-81 very little hay was prepared for winter use. The cattle wintered on the range where they summered. During the winter the cattle were permitted to roam wherever they felt inclined, and no attention was paid to them.

The work of handling the cattle began with the spring roundup, about the first of May, and closed with the last shipment of cattle to market in the fall, which was about the first of November.

The cowboys, after the long, idle winter, looked forward to the spring roundup with the same desire that the soldier, after months in the barracks, longs for active duty in the field and for battle. As the time for beginning of the roundup drew near the cowboy would be found busily engaged in washing his clothing and blankets; his saddle and bridle were cleaned and oiled; bits, spurs, and six-shooters were polished; and saddle ponies were curried and given extra feed and attention.

Among these men was found that same diversity of character, temperament, energy, and intelligence common to mankind everywhere. A reputation for courage was a necessary requisite to good standing in cowboy society. He who could display the greatest recklessness, or assume the role of the greatest daredevil, stood foremost and was the leader of that society.

This desire for notoriety among his fellows led the cowboy into many serious difficulties and gave rise to the general opinion that he was without feeling or regard for the rights of others and was naturally cruel. This opinion was erroneous. His recklessness and occasional cruelty were not the natural products of his nature but were rather, in most instances, assumed in a spirit of bravado. As a rule, the cowboy was true to his friends, and with him it was a religious principle to stand by and never desert a friend in a "tight place."

In the general roundup in the spring, all cattlemen having cattle upon the territory to be covered took part. Sometimes as many as one hundred men worked together. A captain was selected, and he directed the men. Cook wagons were provided and these were kept convenient to the men at work on the range.

Each day cattle found were driven to a point selected by the captain, where the calves were branded and the cattle of the different owners were "cut out" from the others and driven back to the range of the owner, and so work went on from week to week until all the territory where it was probable cattle of those engaged in the roundup could be found, was covered.

After this roundup was completed each ranchman again covered his own range, branded the calves found there, and again, later in the summer, when the steers had become fat, the range was again gone over, and those in condition for the market were cut out and driven to the railroad and shipped.

A ROUNDUP OF ROUNDUPS

After the South Loup spring roundup was finished the cowboys who had been riding the ranges for from four to six weeks would mount their horses and hike for North Platte, where they would meet the riders from the North Platte roundup, and then would be held a roundup of roundups that made history of its own. On these occasions there would assemble from two to three hundred men, with from five to seven hundred saddle horses. Each ranch outfit represented would have a crack shot, a foot racer, a boxer, a race horse, a bucking broncho, and all these would be trotted out in their turns and matched against the rivals of the other ranches. Defeats and victories were both celebrated by drinks for the crowd. These celebrations lasted as long as the cowboys' money held out. Associated at different times in these lusty carnivals were such characters as Buck Taylor, Major North, John Shores, and Buffalo Bill, all of whom had race horses of their own and were always ready to back them up with all the money they could get their hands on.

CATTLEMEN VERSUS SETTLERS

As early as 1874 settlers began coming in—that is, a few adventuresome spirits drifted into the Middle and South Loup countries and a settlement or two was made in the eastern section of the county and also in the New Helena district. They came in slowly at first and their coming was not encouraged by the cattlemen, who saw that the homesteader would sooner or later absorb his range and supplant stock-raising and grazing with farming and stock-raising on the farmer's scale. He was naturally averse to this, and the reckless cowboys, who understood that with the going of the large herd would go their occupation and employment, never put themselves out to make things attractive and pleasant for the settler. One writer says:

A very bitter feeling existed between those engaged in the two occupations; neither was fair nor just with the other. The weaker was compelled to give way to the stronger. There were a hundred homesteaders to every ranchman. A few of the more courageous cattlemen made a struggle to hold their ranges. They fenced in large tracts of territory, constructed wells in these pastures, and the cowboys in their employ made homestead, pre-emption, and timber-culture entries therein, under the government land laws.

Frame shacks or shanties were constructed, called by the cowboys, in their application and final proof, houses. These were in many instances upon runners or wheels and were moved from claim to claim. The same shanty oftentimes answered the purpose of a house in making final proof for three or four cowboys upon as many different claims. But all this was of no avail to the ranchman. The homesteader made entries within his pasture. He contested and had cancelled the claims of the cowboy. He cut and destroyed the fences. Bloodshed and murder were in some instances the result. In the courts the ranchman had but little hope of success. In his controversy with the homesteader he must try his case before a jury of homesteaders.

A NEAR-BATTLE

Early in the fall of 1884 a few settlers located homesteads in the northeast corner of the Brighton Ranch Company's pasture, on Ash creek. This pasture was about fifteen miles square and extended several miles south of the Loup river almost to Broken Bow, and was inclosed with a wire fence. The land being government land, and subject to entry, these settlers served notice on the ranch company to remove their fences from about their claims within thirty days. The company paid no attention to this request, and at the expiration of the time the settlers made a raid on the fence and appropriated the posts to make roofs for their sod houses. Roofs in those days were made by laying a large log, called a ridge log, lengthwise of the building at the top. The fence posts were then laid up to form the rafters, to which brush was fastened, the whole being covered with one or two layers of prairie sod, coated with several inches of yellow clay, procured from the canyons, which turned water very effectually.

In a short time after the appropriation of these posts the foreman of the ranch had the settlers arrested and taken to Broken Bow for trial. The sheriff had no sooner departed with the prisoners than the second foreman of the ranch rigged up two large wagons, drawn by four mules each, and proceeded to the houses of the settlers, accompanied by a number of the cowboys. They drove up to a house, took a team and a large chain, hitched on to the projecting end of the ridge log, and in about three seconds the sod house was a shapeless mass of sod, hay, brush, and posts mixed up in almost inextricable confusion. The ranchmen then culled their posts from the wreck and loaded them into the wagons, when they went to the next house and repeated the operation, leaving the occupants to pick their few household goods out of the ruins at their leisure. The boys were having great fun at the expense of the settlers, cracking jokes and making merry as the work of destruction went on. After destroying several houses in this manner they proceeded to the claim of a Mr. King, and Mrs. King, seeing them approaching, met them with a shotgun and dared them to come on. Had it been Mr. King, the invitation would possibly have been accepted, but the cowboys were too gallant to enter into a quarrel with a lady, and withdrew without molesting her.

In the meantime a boy of the settlement had been despatched to Broken Bow, on the fastest pony that could be procured, to secure help, and quite a posse of men from the town started for the scene of action. The foreman of the ranch, who was in Broken Bow at the time as complaining witness against the settlers, heard of this and sent one of his cowboys in haste to warn the second foreman of the impending invasion. The messenger arrived at the settlement in advance of the citizens and gave the alarm. The housewreckers were thoroughly scared, and, turning the heads of their mule teams toward the South Loup, applied the whip freely. As the mules began to run over the rough prairie the posts began to fall off the wagons, and as the teams began to show signs of weariness the cowboys began to heave off more posts to lighten the load as they bumped along, leaving a trail behind them like that of a railroad construction gang. Arriving at the ranch, they turned out their mules, secured their Winchesters and made a break for the hills on the south side of the river, to await developments. When the posse of rescuers arrived at the little settlement and found the invaders gone, they did not follow them, but returned to Broken Bow. The cowboys remained in the hills two days, waiting for the approach of the enemy in vain.

The ranch company failed to make any case against the settlers, it being shown that the ranch pasture was government land and that the claims were lawfully held by the homesteaders, who had a perfect right to remove the fence which inclosed their property. The prisoners were accordingly released and were not again molested. The second foreman of the ranch was subsequently arrested for tearing down the houses of the settlers, was tried at Broken Bow, found guilty, fined twenty-five dollars and costs, and confined one day in the county jail.

The winter of 1880-81 marked the termination of extraordinary profits in the cattle industry in Custer county. The severe winter entailed frightful losses upon cattlemen. Some whole herds were wiped out of existence. This opened the door to the settlers, who were not slow to flock in and settle in all parts of the county, picking out, of course, the choice and level land without regard to whether it was in some ranchman's range. By the close of 1884 there were fully 18,000 people in Custer county, and probably not to exceed 4,000 cattle.

As the ranchman and the Texas steer in the '60s and early '70s had driven out the Indian and the buffalo, so now in the '80s the ranchman and the steer were compelled to give way to the farmer and the horse.

It may be well to record here one more incident which illustrates the kind of war waged in those days between settler and rancher. In 1875 Frederick Schreyer located a homestead about five miles up the river from where Callaway now stands. His only neighbors were cowboys, and peace and harmony did not prevail in his neighborhood. He was not given a welcome reception. No bands played in his honor. There were presented no testimonials expressing the pleasure of the ranchmen and cowboys because he had moved in. In order to discourage the lone homesteader, the festive cow-punchers stampeded their herds over the roof of his dugout, and herded their steers in his cornfield. When he resorted to arms to defend himself he was arrested and put into jail. But Schreyer was an indomitable spirit and not easily put down. His career, however, was so marked in the early days that it is given another place on these pages.

The last cowboy has disappeared from the South Loup country, from the Middle Loup, and from other parts of Custer county that were once covered with cattle. The plucky pioneers, however, who paved the way for others to follow, are still with us, for the most part, full of years and honors, living in the enjoyment of the fruits of their toil.

AN UNDERGROUND RAILROAD

The following story, told by Robert Harvey, describing a discovery made in the South Loup country in July, 1872, by himself and surveying party, seems to disclose the "main line" of the famous "underground railroad," over which a great number of valuable horses, and perhaps other property, passed through the county in the days of the early '70s.

"During the last days of July we completed all but six miles of lines south of the fourth standard parallel and camped at the corner of townships 15 and 16 north, ranges 23 and 24 west, near the northeast edge of a beautiful round, flat valley, located on what is now the line between Triumph and Delight precincts. The depression, is, no doubt, a very remote lake-bed or basin formed by the rocking of an ancient iceberg.

"In the afternoon we started north on the last six miles of the range line of this part of the work and ascended the long, grassy south slope of a high hill or promontory. After considerable labor and fatigue, we reached the summit of the clean-cut northeast rim. The diagonal descent along the steep northeast slope was attained with considerable difficulty, and having reached the bottom I found that the bluffs' dark shadows cast far out into the valley, rendering farther progress that evening impossible. We proceeded to camp, which we found on the right bank of the South Loup river.

"Next morning we resumed the work of projecting our abandoned line northward, and at the half-mile corner between sections 13 and 18 we crossed a small spring brook having its source in springs under the east slope of the high bluff. A little farther north we ascended an elevated clay spur formed by the river on the north and the little brook on the southeast. The bluff terminated a little east of our line in a low bottom covered with wild hemp and sunflowers.

"Crossing this spur, I noticed a deeply cut wagon track, which appeared to have been made in soft wet ground and then grass grown, which excited my curiosity, and turning down the trail a few yards I came upon a cowbell and a spring of a wagon spring-seat, common to that period. Descending to the low bench I passed to the left along the foot of the spur and near its point suddenly came upon the door of a cave which was set flush with the perpendicularly cut bank.

"Pushing open the door, I entered a room containing a fireplace at the north end, a single sleeping bunk at the south end and an old rough-board table. Evidently it was the kitchen, dining room, reception hall, parlor, and cook's sleeping room. Passing through a door in the partition I entered a large room which had feed stalls arranged along the north side and west end, and sleeping bunks along the south side. Some shelled corn was scattered about and a copy of Harper's Weekly of the previous June lay on the floor.

"On the outside we searched in the grass and weeds for signs of occupancy, but found no tracks or paths leading to the river or creek, but at the water's edge of the brook found a block about three feet long, cut from a cottonwood and pegged with forked stakes to hold it fast so one could stand upon it and dip water from the brook.

"The discovery of such an abode, far from any settlement, and in an Indian infested country where hunters had not yet ventured, was remarkable. It brought to my recollections a story I had heard repeated in Benton county, Iowa, three years before. The story ran that a young man of the neighborhood had gone west in 1866 or 1867, and joined a band of horse thieves whose 'runway' was from Mexico to the British possessions. The party with which he worked operated in Nebraska and perhaps Dakota Territory.

"One of the stations along the route was in a cave on a branch of the Loup river and near the foot of a high, dark hill, with pine timber growing along the bluffs and a little stream of spring water flowing past the mouth of the cave. Their next station was two days' ride from this cave and located in a forest of pine and cedar in the canyons of the Loup river.

"The story seems to describe this place. Here was a cave on the right bank of a branch of the Loup, with a small spring brook only a few yards away. There was a high, dark, frowning hill nearby, while scattering pine timber grew along the bluffs on the opposite side of the river, and about seventy-five miles to the northeast, about two days' ride, were the cedar and pine-wooded canyons of the North Loup below the mouth of the Calamus river. All of the details of the story dovetailed exactly with the place.

"In the latter part of September I was operating north of the parallel and on the 30th pitched my camp on the long, high mesa, or table-land, west of where Broken Bow is now located. Being almost destitute of water in the afternoon, I sent two men with the light wagon to the south branch and gave instructions to fill the barrels that evening and return early next morning. It was about seven miles to the river and six to our initial point on the parallel for the survey of the line between ranges 23 and 24 west, township 17 north.

"On our way to the initial point we came to the south edge of the high undulating table-land about three miles south of camp, when we halted to scan the country. We expected to find evidence of two surveying parties operating south of us, who should be near the close of their work and about ready to return to their homes. We had brought with us a lot of written mail, hoping we might send it with them.

"We scanned the country south, east, and west, and finally observed a bright spot far up the river. It looked like the reflection from a bright surface, and a dark object loomed near it. To ascertain if it was moving I directed the instrument towards it and made out that it was moving down the valley.

"After watching the object for a time we concluded it was a wagon. But our curiosity was excited when we discovered that only one or two men were walking and several rode in the wagon, which was a very unusual thing for surveyors to do when traveling over the prairie. The bright spot we had seen was the reflected sunlight from the bright tire of the hind wheel. The wagon proceeded down the valley and halted on the clay spur where our cave of July was found. Here the horses were turned out and the men passed from sight over the end of the spur.

"It was now quite late and my suspicions were thoroughly aroused, and being anxious for the safety of the teamster, who had not returned from the river, and the team, I determined to go to their relief. Sending a man to camp, we hurried to the river and reached it at dark, just as the wagon arrived. The men were entirely ignorant of the presence of strangers and surprised at the suspected character of their very nearby neighbors. Giving directions for guard duty during the night, Charley Starkweather and I walked along the bank, perhaps a hundred yards, and yelled several times without receiving an answer, then fired two shots, which brought a feeble voice inquiring what we wanted. We told him we were surveyors and had lost our way to camp, that we were hungry and tired and wanted accommodations for the night. The fellow told us they were strangers in the country and poorly provided, so could not entertain us. We told him there was plenty of room in the cave and we would come over.

"Fording the river, we followed him to the dugout, which it really was, and instead of there being three or four men, there were sixteen. After explaining who we were and our business we asked for supper and a place to sleep. We tried to be friendly and agreeable, but none of the men would talk except equally strange to us that so many men were there, far from settlements, in an Indian country. They claimed to be hunters, yet, in a splendid game country, they had gotten only one or two deer in a week and were poorly supplied with bedding and food.

"Without supper, we lay down on a blanket before the fire-place, but each of us quietly slipped a cartridge into his gun and each took a turn on guard, feigning to be asleep. At break of day we quietly slipped out, and, one about fifty years old who appeared to be the spokesman and leader. He said they were hunters, had been there about a week, had killed only one or two deer, and were out of provisions, excepting a little coffee. A team and two men had gone that morning to Plum Creek station on the Union Pacific railroad for provisions, but had not returned, therefore they could not feed us.

"It seemed very strange to us that one man should do all the talking for the gang and he refused to tell us where they were from, except that he came from Iowa. It seemed on going around the south side of the spur, saw two fine black horses and a new top buggy. I have been told by some of the early settlers that this was the rendezvous or hiding place of Doc Middleton; but Doc had not gained notoriety in 1872, nor do I think he had gone into the rustling business then. If this was the cave, or station, attributed to the young man in Iowa, which I have every reason to believe it to be, Doc Middleton and he were one and the same person. Doc Middleton was only a boy when the cave was occupied by the horsethieves."

THE WILD WEST HAS WILD HORSES

Dan Haskell, who came to Custer county before its organization, and who had to do with its development as much as any other man, gives this interesting account of a wild horse hunt in the county:

"A correspondent of the Chicago Drovers' Journal says: 'I have seen the stag hunt in Scotland and the steeple chase in Ireland, but compared with a wild-horse hunt on the Haskell & Company ranch in Nebraska, these are tame sports.'

"In the summer of 1884, we had a herd of six hundred horses on our ranch. One evening about sundown we were driving them across a small bridge when they became frightened and commenced to run. This raised a dense cloud of dust, which added to the fright of the animals, causing them to stampede, break through a fence on either side, and kill five of them, the balance of the herd flying in every direction into the hills. During the night they became mixed up with a herd of wild horses, of which there were large numbers roaming over this country at that time. One would naturally suppose that the wild horse could outstrip his domesticated brother in a long race, but in separating our stampeded herd from the wild ones we discovered that such is not the case. The domesticated horse, being better bred, proved to have superior powers of endurance. As the wild horse has long ago disappeared from Custer county, a short description of his habits and the manner of hunting may be interesting to the reader.

"Wild horses roamed over the prairie in small bands, each led by a stallion, who was the head of the family. The first business of the hunter was to shoot these band stallions, which would cause the mares and colts of that family to unite themselves with another band. By repeating the operation of shooting the leading stallions quite a bunch of horses would soon be gathered together, the object being to chase as many down at once as possible. Having gone thus far, the work of the hunter has just begun. When pursued, we found that wild horses always traveled in a circle, and that they would eventually get back to the place from which they started. After getting a bunch of the required size together, by shooting the stallions as described, our next move was to establish camps along the course we concluded the animals would run, with a man at each station to take care of the saddle horses, which were used in relays. Two men, well mounted, then started the herd of wild horses, and crowded them to their utmost limit, giving them time neither to eat nor rest until they were completely run down, and would permit themselves to be corralled. It usually took about five days of constant motion to accomplish this, although sometimes a herd would succumb in two or three days. Whenever we reached a relay camp our saddle horses were changed, thus keeping the wild horses on the constant move day and night. The long race generally broke the old ones down so that they were seldom of any use afterward, but the young ones seemed little the worse for their chase after a few days' rest.

"Occasionally we would start a bunch led by an old stallion that would, when pushed hard, start out and run for fifty miles in one direction, taking us away from our camps altogether and compelling us often to ride a hundred miles without a change of horses. At intervals in the chase one or more of the wild horses would drop back, not able to keep up with the flying herd. These were always roped, thrown, and hobbled, so that we could return and get them after the main bunch had been run down. We had a one-armed man on our ranch, by the name of Jim Hunnell, who could rope and hobble a wild horse with the best of them. With one end of his lariat tied to the horn of his saddle, he would take the bridle-rein in his teeth, and, holding the coil and loop both in his hand, would catch and throw his horse every time, putting on the hobbles by using his hand and teeth. Those who have tried to rope a wild horse and hobble him with two good hands will appreciate the work done by Jim Hunnell. The most favorable time to chase wild horses was when there was snow on the ground, as we could then follow the trail much easier during the night. We carried small, dark-lanterns with us, to be used when it would be impossible to follow the trail without them. We would sometimes be caught by a blizzard, in the middle of a chase, and be obliged to give up and get back to the camp as best we could. In February, 1883, my brother and myself started out to catch a small bunch of eleven horses headed by a fine roan stallion. One of the neighbors had been catching the colts for two seasons. We had six good saddle horses with us, expecting to locate them at two different points along the course we thought the wild horses would take, but when we reached our friend's house he said he had chased the bunch several times and they took a circle only of ten or twelve miles, so we left our extra horses at his place and set out with but one feed of corn and a lunch in our pockets. We soon located the herd, and away they went like the wind, the fine old roan stallion in the lead. When the old fellow found out that some one was after him that meant business, he struck off on a tangent at the top of his speed in a southwesterly direction. Late in the afternoon we struck the North Platte valley northwest of Ogallala. The roan then changed his course to northwest, and traveled at such a killing gait that, had it not been for the snow on the ground, we could hardly have been able to follow him. As we neared the B. and M. Railroad, the snow became quite deep, and after the darkness came on we lighted our lanterns and followed the trail without any trouble. At three o'clock in the morning we concluded to stop and give our saddle horses a rest, as they had been ridden hard all day and night, except when we had stopped to feed them the corn and to eat our lunch. We scraped a little round place in the snow, which was twelve inches deep, and lay down on the frozen ground together, holding our horses by the bridle reins. We were so cold our teeth chattered together, while our horses stood and shivered. As soon as daylight appeared we arose from our downy bed and rode up to the top of a high bluff, from which we discerned the wild horses huddled up in a small valley with their heads down, taking a much-needed rest. Hearing the bark of a dog, we proceeded in that direction and came to the ranch of Carl Gross, southwest of Lakeside, where we remained that day and the following night. We were both snow-blind. Early next morning, we took up the trail of the horses and followed them back to the place from which they had started. We procured fresh saddle horses, set out after them again, and two days later had the entire bunch in a corral at our home ranch. While in pursuit of this roan band, we sighted another herd of fourteen, headed by a fine brown horse, and next month gave them chase and had them corralled in two days. This was our last horse hunt.

"Wild horses have almost entirely disappeared from Nebraska, although it is said there are still a few small bands in the vicinity of Blue river. The writer has seen hundreds of them on Tallin Table in Custer county, and it was a grand sight to see the fat, sleek fellows watering at the pools, which stood there as late as the month of June, each leader herding his family to keep it from mixing with other herds."

From the vast sweep of an almost endless prairie, entirely without human inhabitants, save marauding tribes of primitive red men, to a white population numerous enough to justify the organization of a county, is a far cry. Prior to June, 1877, the territory now comprised in Custer county covered all the distance between the uninhabited waste and the nucleus of organized government. Under early conditions the cattlemen or ranchers had been compelled to pay taxes to the organized counties on the east. They had no benefit from any taxes paid and no enforcement of the law. If lawless characters committed depredations, ran off or branded their stock, there was no recourse of law. Of course the cattlemen never expected that this would become an agricultural territory. It seemed evident to them that it would always be a range country and cattle-raising the chief industry; still, they must have some semblance of law, there must be some way provided to punish cattle thieves and, perhaps, a few schools would have to be established. In order to accomplish this, it was evident that county organization should be established and maintained.

County organization began to be talked over. Several meetings were held at different times for the purpose of taking steps toward organization. One of these meetings was held in the residence of Ne George, at which were present Frank Young, L. D. George, Coe Kilgore, and Joshua Woods. No action was taken, however, and in different places were held several other meetings, which were barren of results so far as effecting organization was concerned.

THE PROPOSED GARBER COUNTY

During the winter of 1875 a bill was introduced into the legislature, and passed by both houses, authorizing the organization of a county to be known as Garber county, comprising a territory of twenty-four miles square, lying immediately west of Valley county. It did not appear, however, that the proposed new county had enough inhabitants to support and maintain, through taxation, a county organization. So the proposition received the veto of Governor Garber. The governor's veto did not take into consideration the fact that the new county was named in his honor. The territory included in the bill to create Garber county was about one-fourth of the present Custer county, and on the basis of the precinct organization would have included the precincts of Sargent, West Union, half of Milburn, most of Lillian, all of Garfield, Douglas Grove, Comstock, Spring Creek, Westerville, some of Berwyn, and about one-fourth of Broken Bow. The southwest corner of the county would have been located in the present townsite of Broken how this name came to be applied or who was the first to apply it, is not known. The government, however, seems to have given some recognition to this cognomen. The early postoffices of the county were designated as being in Kountz county, Nebraska. This statement concerning the counties accounts for the conflicting opinion that prevails among early settlers concerning the first county names. Some state positively that Custer

Bow. Notwithstanding that the measure failed, the name Garber county attached to this territory until after the organization of the present county.

KOUNTZ COUNTY

Exclusive of that portion of the county which wanted to be organized into Garber county, all the rest of the unorganized territory west of Valley and Sherman counties was known as Kountz county, so named after Kountz brothers, wealthy bankers of Omaha. Just county was first known as Garber county, others that it was first known as Kountz county and, in harmony with the above explanation, both are right.

NOW COMES CUSTER COUNTY

Agitation for the new county continued and finally culminated in the organization of Custer county. The taxpayers of the unorganized territory were growing continually more restless under the assessment of high taxes which they could pay but could not spend. This left them, they declared, holding the hot end of the poker. Other organization meetings were held and the agitation kept up. Eight ranchmen met one day under a tree on the Frank H. Young place and took the preliminary steps toward organization. A later meeting at which thirteen ranchmen were present finally put the machinery in motion. This second meeting was held at the Anton Abel ranch. The first officers were recommended to the governor by the men in attendance at this meeting.

In the legislature of 1877, the Hon. J. H. McCall, of Dawson county, came to the rescue of these settlers and introduced in the legislature the following bill, which accordingly passed both houses and was signed by Governor Garber:

Be it enacted by the legislature of the State of Nebraska:

Section 1. That all that portion of the state of Nebraska, commencing at the southeast corner of township thirteen (13), north of range seventeen (17), west of the sixth principal meridian, thence north to the northeast corner of township twenty (20), north of range seventeen (17), west, thence west to the northwest corner of township twenty (20), north of range twenty-five west, thence south to the southwest corner of township thirteen (13), north of range twenty-five (25), west, thence east to beginning, shall constitute the county of Custer.

Approved February 17, 1877.

It is not known who is entitled to the distinction of naming the new county, but it was named "Custer" in honor of the gallant Indian fighter who perished with all his command at the memorable battle on the Little Big Horn the previous summer, 1876.

In May a petition was sent to Governor Garber, signed by most of the cattlemen of the county, asking for the appointment of temporary officers to complete the organization of the county, as follows:

To the Honorable Silas Garber,
Governor of the State of Nebraska:

We, the undersigned, inhabitants of Custer county, Nebraska, and taxpayers therein, petition you to appoint and commission James Gasmann, Anton Abel, and H. C. Stuckey as special county commissioners, and Frank H.

Young as special county clerk of said county for the purpose of forming a permanent organization for said county, and that you will appoint and declare the southeast quarter of section 23, in township 15 north, range 22 west, as the temporary county seat of said county, and for this we will ever pray.

Lincoln, Nebr.

Dear Sir—Several of the citizens of Custer county have been speaking to me about the organization of that county, and desire me to write to you about the matter. There is quite a large amount of personal property owned by the citizens of that territory, and under the present status it is under the control of no one. One-half of the county is in this judicial district, and the other in the sixth. Mr. Young, a resident of that county, will call upon you for the purpose of seeing about the matter, and will explain the situation to you. I feel like accommodating them if it can be done. Please let me know the situation. Yours, etc., C. J. DILWORTH

Hon. Silas Garber,
Lincoln, Nebr.

Dear Sir—Enclosed find letters from the county officers in regard to Custer county. Mr. MacColl is absent and will not be back for about two weeks; the other officers all signed the papers. I would like to get the commission by return mail, if possible, as I am in a hurry to get out of Custer county to look after my calves, as it is time to brand them. Hoping you will give this your early attention, I remain,

Yours respectfully,

FRANK H. YOUNG

The governor, on the 27th day of June, issued the following proclamation, which launched Custer county on its glorious career:

PROCLAMATION

Whereas, A large number of the citizens of the unorganized county of Custer have united in a petition asking that the said county be organized and that James Gasmann, Anton Abel, and H. C. Stuckey be appointed special county commissioners, and Frank H. Young be appointed special county clerk of said county, for the purpose of forming a permanent organization, and that the southeast quarter of section twenty-three, in township fifteen north, range twenty-two west, be designated as the temporary county seat of said county of Custer, and it appearing that the said county contains a population of not less than two hundred inhabitants, and ten or more of said petitioners are taxpayers and residents of said county:

Now, therefore, I, Silas Garber, governor of the state of Nebraska, in accordance with the memorial of said petitioners, and under and by the authority in me vested and in pursuance of the statute in such cases made and provided, do declare said county to be temporarily organized for the purpose of permanent organization, and do appoint and commission the persons above named as the special county commissioners, and the said person above named as special county clerk of said county, and do declare the place above named and described as the temporary county seat of said county.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and caused to be affixed the great seal of the state of Nebraska.

Done at Lincoln, the capital, this twenty-seventh day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-seven and of the independence of the United States one hundred and first, and of this state the eleventh.

SILAS GARBER

By the Governor:

BRUNO TSCHUCK, the Secretary of State.

FIRST COUNTY OFFICERS

Prior to the issuing of the proclamation by Governor Garber, establishing a temporary organization for Custer county, a meeting had been held at the home of Frank Young at which were present E. J. Boblits, Al Wise, J. J. Douglass, Joshua Woods, Vergil Allen, and other early settlers to the number of thirteen. This meeting recommended the appointment of Frank Young as temporary county clerk, Anton Abel, James Gasmann, and H. C. Stuckey as county commissioners, and accordingly the governor was petitioned for their appointment. Complying with the request the governor named these men for their respective offices and they became, by the governor's proclamation, the first officers of Custer county.

FIRST MEETING OF SUPERVISORS

commissioners met at the temporary county seat and they were duly sworn into office. Frank H. Young had taken the oath of office as county clerk in the governor's office at Lincoln, so when the supervisors had been duly inducted into their office, they were ready to commence business. The first matter of business attended to was the passing of an order calling for a special election to be held on Tuesday, the 31st day of July, 1877, for the purpose of electing a county judge, a sheriff, a clerk, a treasurer, a coroner, a surveyor, and three county commissioners. The matter of selecting a county seat, or of making the temporary county seat the per-voting place should be the home of Joshua Woods. In precinct number two all the electors were to resort to the home of Anton Abel, the third voting precinct was in the home of E. Halloway. This last voting precinct was so far to the south end of the precinct that the New Helena people objected and, at the first opportunity, presented the first petition ever presented to a Custer county board praying for a new precinct. As this request was granted, this special election of July 31 was the only election ever held while the county was divided in only three precincts. The election came off in due form. Fifty-eight votes were cast, which constituted manent location of the county capital, was also to be decided at that special election.

After the special election had been provided for, the three commissioners proceeded to chop the county up into three voting precincts, which they did by cutting off tiers of townships running clear through the county from north to south on the east end of the county and constituting that as precinct number one. Another three ranges of townships west of first precinct and running through the middle of the county constituted the second precinct, while the remaining three tiers of townships on the west end of the county became the third precinct.

FIRST VOTING PLACES

In the first precinct it was ordered that the

the sum total of the new county's voting strength. It was the first election, it was being held far from the centers of eastern civilization and, consequently, form and ceremony were little observed. In the third precinct they did not go to the formality of administering the oath to either judges or clerks, consequently the vote in the third precinct was thrown out when an official canvass of the vote was made by the county commissioners.

The election, however, was an event long remembered in those days, conducted under a purely western regime. The voters came early and in most cases stayed for dinner with the judge of election, who was also host for the occasion. It is related that not more than three or four voters in each precinct made the trip to the polls and back without trading horses. One early narrator makes the too extravagant claim that more horses were traded that day than votes cast.

FIRST ELECTION RESULTS

When the supervisors assembled in August to canvass the returns of the special election, they rejected the vote of the third precinct, for reasons that have been previously stated, and, on summing up the returns from the other two precincts, announced that the temporary county seat was to be the permanent county seat, and that the following officers were duly and regularly elected:

Commissioners, Anton Abel, James Gas-mann, William Kilgore.

Clerk, Frank H. Young.

Treasurer, S. C. Stuckey.

Sheriff, Joshua Woods.

Coroner, Charles R. Mathews.

Surveyor, H. C. Norton.

County Judge, Louis Wambögan.

All of these officials filed their bonds, which were accepted by the newly elected county judge. Equipped with these officers, the Custer county ship of state was ready to sail. The New Helena people were on hand with their petition requesting a new precinct with a voting place in the New Helena postoffice, which was then in the home of Judge Mathews. It was an accommodating board of commissioners that received the petition, hence the request was granted, and never since that time has this been a county of three precincts.

The special election was scarcely over before the commissioners and the people began to campaign for the regular election in November of the same fall, only four months off. The regular election came on and was held in the four voting places. This time all the judges and all the clerks were sworn into office, the voting proceeding regularly, and counts were duly made and returns sworn to. Horse trading came in for its regular place on the program and several cleverly hidden spavins went home with new owners. This election did not greatly change the personnel of the official staff.

THE NEW OFFICERS

The same commissioners, Abel, Gasmann, and Kilgore, were retained in office, S. C. Stuckey was retained as treasurer, Joshua Wood as sheriff, Charles R. Mathews as coroner, but John W. Benedict was made county surveyor, and Wilson Hewitt was elected county judge.

The early records of the county are very meagre. No official roster has been kept. It is a hard and laborious task to trace the proceedings of county commissioners, to fill out in detail the official roster, or to name the men in succession who have served the county in various capacities down to the present time. Some of these early officers performed very little service. They had no offices other than their own residences, so that in fact the county seat was scattered all over Custer county, according to the places where officials had their residences. Salaries were small, some offices, in fact, being without any salary attached, and for services rendered the incumbents were remunerated only by a nominal fee. The offices were not as attractive as they are now—they were not considered plump plums to be grabbed every time some power shook the political tree. There were no conventionalities; a county official was in his office and ready for business whenever and wherever he was found. If the treasurer was in the hay-field when a taxpayer came along with the money, there was a business transaction forthwith to which Custer county was party.

It took one lovelorn candidate for matrimony three days to hunt up the county judge in order to procure a license, and when he located the judge, that official had to stop fighting fire long enough to grant the license. But if it took some time and trouble to locate the office and the officer, there was no difficulty about formalities when they were found. A judge would enter in a day-book a statement that a marriage license had been issued to such and such parties, then proceed to perform the ceremony and make the same entry do for both the license and return. Ceremonies, too, were simple and informal. It is related that when Judge Boblits performed his first marriage ceremony he simply said: "If you folks want each other for husband and wife you are married. And what God and Boblits have joined together let no man put asunder."

CUSTER COUNTY JUDGES

The statement has been made that all the men who have served Custer county in the capacity of county judge during the past forty-one years are still alive and in a reasonable state of health. This is a very remarkable fact. Great pains have been taken to ascertain if the statement is correct. Louis Wambsgân was elected county judge at the first election ever held in Custer county. He filed a bond and took the oath of office but never transacted any official business other than to pass on the bonds of the first officers. Four months later, at the time of the regular election, he was not a candidate for re-election and Wilson Hewitt was elected county judge. Hewitt was sworn into office in January, 1878, and in April of the same year resigned. The board accepted his resignation and appointed E. J. Boblits to fill the vacancy. At the next regular election, in the fall of 1878, Boblits was regularly elected as his own successor and served for two more years. In the fall of 1880 Judge C. R. Mathews, of New Helena, was made the county judge. From that time on the following have served as county judges in the order named: Judge John S. Benjamin, Judge Arthur H. Kilgore, Judge John Reese, Judge H. J. Shinn, Judge J. R. Rhodes, Judge J. A. Armour, Judge A. R. Humphrey, Judge H. C. Holcomb, and Judge N. Dwight Ford, who is the present incumbent.

The first assessors to serve the new county were W. H. Comstock, Coe Kilgore, H. A. Chapin, and I. P. Bell, who were appointed to assess all taxable property in their respective precincts. In the spring of 1877 W. H. Comstock had been appointed by the authorities of Valley county to assess the property in the Custer county territory. This was done and returns made to Valley county but later an agreement was made by which the tax was collected by the Custer county officials and paid in to the Custer county treasurer. This was the first revenue coming into the coffers of the young county.

THE FIRST COUNTY ASSESSMENT

In the spring of 1878, eight months after the organization of the county, the first assessment was made by the assessors mentioned in the foregoing paragraph. When the returns were compiled it was found that the young county had taxable property to the amount of $136,054.50.

NAMES OF THOSE WHO HAVE SERVED AS COUNTY CLERKS

Frank H. Young was the first clerk to serve the county. He was one of the most efficient officers that every served in any capacity. He was first appointed by the governor and afterwards elected at both the special and regular elections in the year of 1877. He served for three years and six months. Since his retirement the following men have served in the order named: Wilson Hewitt, J. J. Brown, A. W. Hyatt, George Richtmyer, J. B. Osborne, George W. Dewey, Joseph E. Pigman, W. H. Osborn, Jr., Robert E. Waters, present incumbent.

CLERKS OF DISTRICT COURT

A complete roster of county officers has been very hard to obtain. Some of the offices have been created since the organization of the county. In the early days the county clerk served also as clerk of district court until the office of clerk of district court was instituted, in 1888. Those who have served the county as clerk are Wilson Hewitt, J. J. Brown, J. J. Douglass, S. M. Dorris, James Stockham, C. T. Orr, George B. Mair, and the present incumbent, Jess Gandy.

COUNTY TREASURERS

The men who have been intrusted with the public funds of the county are as follows:

S. C. Stuckey, C. T. Crawford, Dr. R. C. Talbot, W. C. Bidwell, Hues Brown, David Weimer, H. Lomax, Mark Schneringer, W. A. George, J. E. Cavenee, Clarence Mackey, and M. S. Eddy, the present incumbent.

REGISTERS OF DEEDS

The office of register of deeds has had five occupants. It dates from 1894, when D. W. Lanternman first filled the office. His successors have been Charles H. Jeffords, C. O. Linn, J. T. Wood, and the present recorder, George E. Porter.

COUNTY SUPERINTENDENTS

The office of superintendent of public instruction is one that dates from the organization of the county. The first superintendent was E. D. Eubanks, who served five years and who at one time might have said that he was superintendent of public instruction in a county in which there were no schoolhouses. It was during his regime that the first districts were organized and the first schools established. The following men have filled the office of county superintendent since the retirement of E. D. Eubanks as a public officer: D. M. Amsberry, C. F. Randall, W. H. Hendrickson, H. H. Hyatt, J. J. Tooley, J. G. W. Lewis, H. M. Pinkney, G. E. Lewis, and T. C. Grimes, who is filling the office at the present time.

OFFICIAL ROSTER OF CUSTER COUNTY

The following constitutes the official roster of Custer county as it stands on this first day of September, A. D. 1918:

District Judge, Bruno O. Hostetler.

County Judge, N. Dwight Ford.

Senator, Twenty-third Senatorial District, Charles W. Beal.

Representatives, W. J. Taylor, George Greenwalt.

Sheriff, Joseph F. Wilson.

Deputy Sheriff, Ernest Thompson.

Treasurer, M. S. Eddy.

Deputy Treasurer, Mrs. J. B. Osborne.

County Clerk, Robert E. Waters.

Deputy County Clerk, Essie Holcomb.

County Superintendent, T. C. Grimes.

Register of Deeds, George E. Porter.

Clerk of District Court, Jesse Gandy.

Deputy Clerk of District Court, M. M. Runyan.

County Attorney, Frank Kelley.

County Surveyor, A. J. VanAntwerp.

County Assessor, G. T. Robinson.

County Commissioners: R. J. Mills, First District; Robert Farley, Second District; Scott Cooper, Third District; J. H. Phillips, Fourth District; H. B. Schneringer, Fifth District;; E. K. Lichtenberger, Sixth District; John Walker, Seventh District.

A NOTED SHERIFF

One of the men who has served as sheriff of Custer county rendered such excellent service and in so many ways made himself both prominent and useful that a somewhat extended mention may not be out of place in this connection, although it is not the policy to bring biographical sketches into this department of the volume.

Charles U. Richardson served as deputy sheriff under Eli Armstrong for three years, following which he was twice elected sheriff, making in all seven years of service rendered for the county as sheriff or deputy sheriff. He was in many ways a remarkable man, was a native of Virginia, and was a veteran of the Confederate army, in which he rendered an unusual and helpful service. He was counted too young to carry arms when he first entered the service and was made a messenger boy for Stonewall Jackson. After two years' service in this capacity he was promoted to a full-fledged soldier and served to the end of the war. He was with General Robert E. Lee at the surrender at Appomattox. He was one who participated in the famous charge led by George Pickett at Gettysburg. He was wounded four times and carried the effects of his wounds to the grave. He was once left for dead on the battlefield, but Charlie Richardson, as he was familiarly called, was not to be killed by bullets. He was destined for a career in Custer county, to be a homesteader, a mail contractor, and a useful citizen. It was to be his lot to die in peace, surrounded by his friends in Custer county, December 3, 1910. His widow and family still survive.

MULTIPLY VOTING PRECINCTS

Very early in the life of the new county it was found that voting precincts were so few and far apart that people living in remote parts were practically disfranchised. The three precincts already noted, lasted only for the first election. The first petition for a new voting precinct came from New Helena, early in the first year of the county's existence, and the accommodating supervisors granted the prayers of the petitioners. In the winter of 1878, through the influence of Judge Mathews and others living in the north part of the county, the legislature passed the following bill:

Each board of county commissioners shall divide the county into convenient precincts, and as occasion requires subdivide precincts or erect new precincts, alter precinct lines and whenever any portion of territory containing in the aggregate not less than one township of land nor more than four townships lying contiguous shall contain not less than fifteen voters, it shall be the duty of the board of county commissioners, upon receipt of a petition signed by a majority of such voters, to constitute such territory a new voting precinct.

With the passage of such an elastic measure the jig was up. There would be no good place to stop. Of making many precincts there was to be no end. However, it all worked to the advantage of the young county. Settlers came in very rapidly. There were over two thousand voters in the county as early as 1884. Precincts were laid out, polling places were established, and by 1888 the present organization of the county was, with the exception of a few divisions that had been made recently, the same as it is to-day.

For the benefit of future investigators, we record here the present organization of the county. Reading from left to right, commencing in the north tier, the precincts are as follows: Hayes, Victoria, Milburn, West Union, Lillian first, Lillian second, Sargent, Arnold, Cliff, Kilfoil, Broken Bow, Garfield, Douglas Grove, Comstock, Spring Creek, Triumph, Ryno, Berwyn, Westerville, Myrtle, Elim, Delight, Custer, East Custer, Ansley, Algernon, Wayne, Grant, Wood River, Loup, Elk Creek.

Over the first regime of county organization each precinct constituted a supervisorial district and was reported in supervisors' meetings each month until the number reached twenty-five. This made a meeting of the supervisors look like a young legislature. The body was unwieldy and likewise expensive. It was, perhaps, the expense that started the campaign for representation on a different basis. As a result of the campaign in 1895 a change was made and the county was divided into seven supervisorial districts with one supervisor or commissioner from each district.

THE LAST PRECINCT SUPERVISORS

The last board to serve under the old precinct basis was as follows: I. A. Reneau, Broken Bow; L. McCandless, Broken Bow; J. A. Daily, Ansley; J. S. Spooner, Douglas; Jules Haumont, Garfield; M. R. Foster, Victoria; W. A. George, Loup; W. C. Nixon, Grant; A. Pool, Hayes; G. W. Dewey, Lillian; M. Schneringer, Delight; John Samuelson, Arnold; A. C. Towle, Kilfoil; J. C. Hutt, Cliff; F. Schreyer, Triumph; T. W. Carr, Elim; H. Lomax, Wood River; B. L. Nicholas, Elk Creek; Scott Cooper, Myrtle; R. J. Mills, Westerville, S. Neth, Custer; A. S. Welch, Berwyn; B. P. Morris, Algernon. With the passing of this board, mass meeting of supervisors was a thing of the past. In January, 1896, the new board met to resume the business of the county under increased responsibility because of reduced representation.

THE NEW BOARD

The first representatives of the districts were L. W. Cole, district 1; G. W. Dewey, district 2; George E. Carr, district 3; J. C. Hutt, district 4; E. B. Whaley, district 5; W. A. George, district 6; B. P. Morris, district 7. These districts have remained intact without much gerrymandering until the present time. Under the present division, it was ordered in 1880 that each precinct constitute a road district.

Accordingly the roads of the county have been maintained by public expense under precinct direction ever since its organization.

BRAND COMMISSIONERS

One of the early officers of the county, and one not in vogue to-day, was a brand commissioner. The brand commissioner was appointed by the commissioners or supervisors and in each case, so far as the record shows, the brand commissioner was a member of the county board. In the days of cattle when everything was an open range, herds were mixed, and identity of stock was something that occasioned a good deal of trouble. It is charged that a good many people were very careless with the branding irons and often stuck them on to the wrong animal. Some cattle were rebranded. All this caused trouble. Disputes constantly arose. In order that every brand used by a cattle-owner might be known, and that cattle branded with his recorded brand might be protected, the brand commissioner was appointed. It can well be imagined that he had his hands full. Anton Abel was the first brand commissioner, having been appointed in 1877. It did not take Anton very long to get all the glory that the office of brand commissioner could furnish. He was soon satisfied and in the spring of 1878 he resigned and J. D. Haskell was appointed his successor. It is recorded that Haskell was one of the best authorities on brands to be found anywhere in the western part of the state. It is claimed that he could read brands half a mile away on the opposite side of the steer while he was going at a forty-mile clip. Mr. Haskell seems to have given good satisfaction and a great many disputes were amicably settled during his tenure of office.

With the passing of the big herds and the closing of the range there was no longer work for the brand commissioner and the office ceased to exist.

COUNTY DIVISION

Dividing the county up into precincts seemed to have gotten the early settlers into the division habit. So, very early in the history of the county, division sentiment began to show itself. In September, 1879, county division propaganda commenced in earnest. A petition was presented by Phil Dufrand, which asked that the proposition of dividing the county be submitted to the people. The proposition was to cut a slice off from the east end of the county, which should be twelve miles wide at the south line of the county, and pass in irregular jogs to the north part of the county, the west line of the proposed county reaching the north line of Custer county at a point twenty-four miles west of the northeast corner of Custer county. This new county was to be known as Blaine county. The people voted on the proposition, but it was rejected.

FIRST LAND DOCUMENTS

Ever since the settlers landed in the county all kinds of bickering, bartering, trading, and selling have been going on. Somebody has made the statement that every acre of land in Custer county has been sold twice since the county was organized. Whether the statement is correct or not can never be ascertained. It may be interesting to record that the first United States patent for Custer county land was made to Charles A. Nale and filed with the register of deeds December 24, 1878. This patent was for the west one-half of the southeast one-fourth, section 15, and the northwest, northeast lot 1, section 22, township 18, range 17. The first deed was for the same land, made by Charles A. Nale to F. S. Nightingale, and was filed for record May 1, 1879.

While land has been shunted around from one owner to another in a somewhat promiscuous way, much of it has been mortgaged. There was a time when it was a popular belief that you could not raise corn or wheat on land that was not mortgaged. The first mortgage of record in the county, however, was not a farm mortgage but was a mortgage of the Union Pacific Railroad to Cyrus H. McCormick et al., trustees. This mortgage was filed August 26, 1878, before any land patents had been granted. The second mortgage which really figures in Custer land transactions was made by Henry Goodyear and wife to Henry G. Wiley, and it was filed for record December 21, 1880. The first mortgage ever released, and therefore it is to be presumed the first one paid, was one released by Charles C. Burr to Charles A. Hall and wife.

THE EVOLUTION OF THE COURT HOUSE

Since the location of the county seat of Custer county at Broken Bow, four separate court houses have been built and used for the accommodation of the public. As an cated on the northeast corner of block 12. In this building the officers were housed and the public business transacted until the commencement of the term of officers who were elected in 1889. The county clerk, the county judge, the county treasurer, and the county superintendent maintained offices in this building.

The question of county division was always a sore question to the people in and around Broken Bow, and to placate the county-division sentiment and to meet the criticism of divisionists outside of the immediate vicinity of Broken incentive to the location of the county seat at Broken Bow the Gandy brothers, A. W., J. P., and Jess, agreed to put up a building and donate its use to the county for court-house purposes, until the sale of county lots, under the terms of the location of the county seat made by them, would provide a fund with which to build a more commodious building. Following out their agreement, they erected a small frame building on the southeast corner of block 5, where the Custer County Chief office now stands. This was the first court house in Broken Bow.

BUILDING THAT SERVED AS FIRST COURT HOUSE OF CUSTER COUNTY

After the sale of the lots in the proposed town, a four-room court house was built, lo-

Bow, who insisted that Broken Bow should build a court house because the town received all the advantage incident to its being center of public business, a bond proposition was duly submitted at the election of 1888 and Broken Bow precinct bonded itself in the sum of twelve thousand dollars, for the purpose of building a court house on the site selected by a vote of the people as the county seat.

These bonds were twenty-year bonds bearing six per cent. The last bond was paid on the first day of January, 1909. With the money thus obtained from the bonds, aided by private subscriptions from various people in Broken Bow, the court house located on block 6 of the original town was built. The list of private subscribers to this court-house fund has been lost, and it is impossible now to tell who the private subscribers were or the amount contributed by them toward the building of this third court house in Broken Bow. The court house was built and ready for occupancy on the first of January, 1889.

At the fall election of 1888 the political situation in Custer county turned upside down. The Republican ticket was defeated and for the first time county officers of a political complexion other than Republican were elected. It seemed a queer coincidence that the new court house should be built and first occupied by an entirely new set of men who were in no way charged with its building. This court house served the purpose from the time of its occupancy, commencing January 1, 1889, until it was destroyed by fire, on the 14th day of January, 1910.

Immediately after the destruction of this third court-house building by fire, the citizens of Broken Bow, aided by friends from other precincts, presented a petition to the county board of supervisors asking that a special election be called for the purpose of voting a tax of five mills on the taxable property of the county for the purpose of building a court house on the site of the one destroyed by fire. The question was duly submitted to the voters of the county by the board. Strenuous opposition to this tax proposition was met from the county divisionists and the county division centers of the county. They argued, and with some force, that the time to divide the county was when the court house was destroyed and while no bond or tax rested on the county for public buildings. The five-mill tax-levy proposition was submitted to the voters of the county, at a special election held on the first day of March, 1910, and the proposition to vote the tax was defeated by a vote of 2234 for, to 2213 against the proposition. In the meantime the county board had arranged their local offices here and there throughout the town, wherever they could rent a building, and the business of the county was conducted in the various offices scattered throughout the town.

During the summer of 1910, county-division petitions were freely circulated, signed, and, in September, presented to the board, and the proposition of dividing the county into counties was submitted to the electors of the county at the general election in 1910. The names selected for the new counties were: Arbor, Albany, and Corn, the fourth county being the old county of Custer or what would remain of it in the event that division carried. Probably as warm a county division campaign as was ever waged, occurred in the fall of 1910. The vote on the proposition at the general election showed that Arbor county received 2344 votes while there was cast against the proposition 2995 votes; Albany county 2298, against 2975 votes; Corn county 2312, against 3001 votes. Since that time there has been no further effort to divide the county.

After the election of 1910, petitions were again presented to the county board and a special election was called for the purpose of voting a tax to build a new court house, on the site of the old one destroyed by fire. This second proposition asked for an election on the seven-mill tax, four mills to be levied and collected in 1911 and three mills to be levied and collected in 1912. This proposition was submitted to the electors of the county on the 9th day of January, 1911. It carried by vote of 2732 for the levy and 2203 against.

Immediately after the canvass of the vote, steps were taken to adopt a plan to let a contract and commence the erection of a court house under the supervision of the board of supervisors. The contract for the new building was let in the early spring of 1911, the contract price being $55,087.00. This was the contract price of the building alone. At the time the old court house was destroyed, the county board carried an insurance of thirteen thousand dollars on the building and fixtures, and this insurance money was retained for the purpose of furnishing the new court house. Work on the new court house proceeded rapidly, and in the summer of 1912 the contractor turned it over to the building board, ready for occupancy.

The fourth court house stands on the site of the one destroyed by fire and in every way is a model of architecture, convenience, and durability, fire-proof throughout the commodious offices, and vaultage-room sufficient to care for the public records of the county for many years to come. It is regarded by capable judges who have seen it and examined its compartments as a model court house in all respects.

CUSTER COUNTY UNITED STATES LAND OFFICE

Since 1890 Custer county has had a government land office located at Broken Bow. In June, 1916, the present register, M. C. Warrington, and present receiver, John P. Robertson, went into their respective positions, and the event was chronicled in the local paper at the time, giving in outline a history of the office from its inception to the present day. It is here quoted at length:

In March, 1890, by an act of congress, the Broken Bow land district was created and the office established at Broken Bow, Nebraska. On April 24, 1890, Judge John Reese, of Broken Bow, was appointed the first register and Hon. James Whitehead, the first receiver, by President Harrison, and they both continued in their respective offices until July 1, 1894, when Hon. A. J. Robertson, of this city, a son-in-law of Judge Reese, and Hon. Charles H. Adams, of Lincoln, were appointed, by President Cleveland, receiver and register, respectively. These officials both retained their positions for a term of four years, which expired July 1, 1898.

In change of administration from Cleveland to McKinley, Hon. James Whitehead, now of Emporia, Kansas, and Hon. F. H. Young, of Broken Bow, were appointed by President McKinley, register and receiver, respectively. Mr. Young, at the close of his first four-year term, was reappointed for a second term, but at the expiration of about a half-year, owing to the necessary press of private business, resigned his position early in 1903. On March 3, 1903, the day of Mr. Young's resignation, Judge Reese again entered the federal service by being appointed receiver, by President Roosevelt. The Judge served as receiver and Mr. Whitehead as register until June 24, 1906.

During the period between March 3, 1903, and August 1, 1906, Judge Reese was associated with Mr. Whitehead, who was register of the land office.

On June 24, 1906, Judge Reese preferring the office of register, which he had formerly held, was again appointed to that position, by President Roosevelt, upon the retirement of Mr. Whitehead. On the same date Hon. D. M. Amsberry was appointed receiver, by President Roosevelt, to succeed Judge Reese, who had just vacated that position to assume the office of register. On the expiration of the official terms of Judge Reese and Mr. Amsberry, on June 24, 1910, they were both reappointed by President Taft. By this appointment Judge Reese received his fourth commission to a four-year term in the Broken Bow land office and Mr. Amsberry his second commission. They served together as land office officials until May 1, 1916, when Mr. John P. Robertson, of Broken Bow, a son of former receiver Robertson, entered upon his duties as receiver to succeed Mr. Amsberry, to which office he was appointed April 10, 1916, by President Wilson. On June 24, 1916, Hon. M. C. Warrington, of Mason City, who was appointed register by President Wilson to succeed Judge Reese, assumed the duties of office, that date being just two years to a day after the expiration of Judge Reese's last four-years term. In passing it may be noted that from May 1, 1916, until June 24, 1916, Judge Reese and John P. Robertson held the offices of register and receiver, respectively, this being the first instance in the history of the Land Department of the United States where a grandfather and grandson held the offices of register and receiver in the same office at the same time, one being a Republican and the other a Democrat. Judge Reese has the unique distinction of having held the positions of register and receiver of the United States land office under the administrations of five presidents for a period covering almost eighteen years in the same office. It is doubtful if this record has a parallel in the history of the land department of the United States. During this eighteen-year period, more than three millions of acres of government land have been taken by settlers as homesteads in the Broken Bow land district. Many hundreds of contests have been decided, involving the settler's title to his home, and on appeal not to exceed ten cases have been reversed by the department. Judge Reese and his associates in the land office have reason to be proud of the prominent part they have taken in the development of central and western Nebraska as federal officers in charge of these greatly responsible positions. For the distinguished gentlemen who have so worthily succeeded to these responsible positions, namely, Hon. M. C. Warrington as register and J. P. Robertson as receiver, their many friends, with a confidence born of a knowledge of their merits, bespeak a continuance of the splendid record of honorable service that has been made by their predecessors in the land department of the federal government.

KINKAID BILL GOES INTO EFFECT

As a result of the passage of the congress-

sional measure known as the Kinkaid bill, more than two million acres of land were thrown open to homesteads under provision by which entryman was entitled to 640 acres of land. A ruling of the general land office at Washington provided that any homesteader already on land entered prior to June 28, 1904, was entitled to adjacent land enough to make 640 acres, and to such holders a thirty-day preference was allowed in which to make filing. All the rest was open to the entryman first coming.

This caused a land stampede that is still remembered by the people of Broken Bow and also by all who secured land at that time. The following from the Custer County Chief gives a faithful account of the event:

Broken Bow already shows unmistakable evidence of a big rush which is to be on in this city next Tuesday, when the time arrives for making homestead entries under the new Kinkaid bill. There have for the past several days been from fifty to one hundred strangers in the city constantly, to get pointers in regard to the grand rush. The land office has been unusually busy preparing for the work that is coming, and reports from the county clerks of adjoining counties show that a very large number of entries will be made. There is considerable speculation as to how the crowd will be taken care of by the land office, and what method will be adopted in regard to making entries. It is expected that there will be at least one thousand people in line when the land office opens next Tuesday morning. In nearly all land rushes of this kind a large number of pickpockets and thugs make their appearance, and on this occasion our people will be protected by government detectives and an increased force of deputy sheriffs and deputy police. The town will be well policed from now on until the rush is over. In the meantime, however, it would be well for our citizens and visiting people to take a little extra precaution.

NEW LAW TAKES EFFECT

Hundreds of people clamor to make entries under the new homestead law. Broken Bow displayed considerable activity for some days prior to June 28th, at which time the Kinkaid homestead law took effect, under which law it is possible for one man to acquire 640 acres by homestead right. As early as the fore part of last week strangers from all parts of the country began to arrive in town. Many of them would make inquiries in regard to the workings of the new law and would then go into the district where the vacant land was situated, make their selection, and then wait for the grand opening. Those who had preference rights, by which they had thirty days to take land adjoining their present homesteads, were resting easy, but those who were after sections of land where they knew about half a dozen parties more were endeavoring to get filings on the same piece were, of course, uneasy and endeavoring to get what advantage was possible. On Monday morning people began to get their entry papers made out and until the early hours of Tuesday morning every attorney in Broken Bow was snowed under with business. As early as five o'clock on Monday evening people began to form in line at the foot of the land office stairs and started in on the long wait until the land office opened at nine o'clock Tuesday, that they might be in line to make early entries. In this they were disappointed, for at eight o'clock Register Whitehead and Receiver Reese gave out the word that no line would be recognized until eight o'clock the next morning, and it was with reluctance that the hundreds of people who had maintained the line for two or three hours gave way.

A QUIET AND ORDERLY CROWD

By daylight on Tuesday morning the crowd began to gather and by eight o'clock nearly two thousand people, attracted there through curiosity or through a desire to make entries, congregated about the land office, eager to have the line formed. In the meantime Governor Mickey was asked to permit the militia company to assist in maintaining the line of march. While no trouble was experienced and the crowd was nothing but a great big, good-natured, jolly lot of people, yet it was difficult to handle them without plenty of assistance, and for this reason it was that the militia could be of material help. Governor Mickey, after some delay and a good deal of telegraphing, gave his consent to the militia boys assisting, and after a half-hour's work in lining the people up, the filings commenced, the first one going over the counter at promptly nine o'clock. It was a curious sight, old men, old women, some of whom were eighty years of age, young men and young women, just past their majority, cowboys, farmers, business and professional men, ladies in plain dress and ladies in silks, waiting for their chance to take a section of Uncle Sam's land. As the day wore away, many people became tired and would grasp at chances to buy boxes to sit down on; many of them were fortunate enough to have umbrellas, but most of them did not, and could not leave the line to procure these comforts unless they had a friend who could hold their place for them. The city officials furnished the crowd with water and the restaurant people sold sandwiches, pies, lemonade, pop, cigars, etc. It was an interesting sight to go down the line. Some people were playing cards, others arguing politics, others making burlesque stump-speeches, and many of them singing old familiar hymns.

CROWD GETS A REST

At three o'clock in the afternoon numbered cards, each bearing the name of the holder and countersigned by the register and receiver, were issued, and the people broke ranks, and were admitted to the land office as their numbers were called. When the people found that they were to be turned loose with numbers one enthusiastic gang started up "Praise God from Whom All Blessings Flow." The first hour about twenty people were taken care of, after that an average of twenty-five entries were made per hour. While the line was being formed an occasional favorable position would command five or ten dollars. It seems strange to some that people should be so anxious to secure this land which has been open to settlement for years past. If it had any particular value it would have been taken long ago in the same manner that other government land was taken. Some of it is of value, owing entirely to its location in connecting land owned by an individual or company on either side. It is the general impression that more land was entered in this grand rush than will be proved up on. The vacant land in the Broken Bow land district at the time of the passage of the law comprises about two million acres, the amount in each county being as follows:

Blaine	219,912
Brown	141,856
Cherry	515,920
Custer	20,843
Grant	178,149
Hooker	316,158
Logan	140,804
McPherson	275,991
Thomas	245,266

THE LAND ENTRIES

During ten days over one thousand applications for homesteads under the new Kin-kaid law, were filed in the land office at Broken Bow. Six hundred of these were made at the land office and four hundred were received by mail. The land officers and their force of clerks have been putting in long hours checking over these entries, and have passed on about five hundred and fifty of them. Of this number one hundred and fifty have been rejected. From now on the work of checking entries will be slower, owing to more complications arising, and it is expected that it will take ten days to complete the work. The land officers are to be congratulated in handling this work as rapidly as they have.

OPENING OF THE MILITARY AND FOREST RESERVES

In October of 1913 the government land in the military reserve of Niobrara and the forest reserve of McPherson county were opened to settlers, and Broken Bow in this county was one of the land offices at which registrations were made. The following from the local newspaper gives a good description of the event:

The Saturday and Sunday preceding the opening of the registration was one of unusual activity about town. People had begun to arrive early in the week and by Saturday night there were over five hundred strangers in town. The night trains brought in more, as did also those of Sunday morning, so that there must have been fully one thousand strangers in town during Sunday. By the time the last train load was emptied Sunday night, a few minutes preceding the opening, the number of people waiting to register probably exceeded fifteen hundred. The first estimate placed the number at twelve hundred, but later figures proved this to be too low.

Sunday was a beautiful day and the people passed the time by strolling about, lounging in the park and going sightseeing. Many viewed the fair grounds and viewed the wreckage caused by the tornado of last Thursday. In fact there were several hundred who paid their respects to the defunct buildings and carried away souvenirs in the shape of splinters, small pieces of board or any other odds and ends they could find. The crowd was quiet and orderly and appeared to have no inclination to indulge in boisterous conduct. Early in the day some interest was taken in a lady who planted herself in a chair in front of the registration booth and gave out that she intended remaining there until the doors opened, at twelve o'clock that night. There seemed to be some mystery attached to her at first, especially as she appeared reticent about giving her name, excusing herself with the plea that she was not seeking newspaper notoriety. Her reticence, however, was finally overcome and she turned out to be Dr. Allie B. Weiner, a prominent suffragette from Lincoln. Later in the day Dr. Weiner was persuaded to vacate her post and, during the evening she favored the waiting crowd with a spirited lecture on the suffrage question, which was well received.

In the meantime, the crowd kept growing larger and hundreds of people were endeavoring to locate the best points of vantage. The police were kept busy trying to form a regular line and keep the people in it. As the hour of midnight approached, the excitement grew intense, although there was little or no disturbance. At intervals the crowd would relieve its emotions by joining in a popular chorus someone had started; at other times it would roar forth some well known hymn. Many women were scattered among the ranks and joined their voices with the others.

Within the registration booth the notaries were placing themselves behind the long counter and preparing for a busy night. Over all Judge Humphrey kept a fatherly eye, and thoughtfully chewed the end of his cigar as he looked through the glass doors at the sea of faces on the outside and speculated on just how many twenty-five cent pieces would jingle through the cashier's window during the night's rush. Sheriff Joe Wilson perched himself on the railing within the entrance, while several burly officers spread themselves across the entrance on the outside to keep the crowd in order.

A small clock belonging to one of the notaries chimed the hour of twelve, Judge Humphrey gave a last word of instruction, Sheriff Joe Wilson shouted: "Let her go," and the rush was on. The first to register was Dr. Allie E. Weimer, of Lincoln, the lady who had occupied the chair for the best part of the day; the second was Miss Emily Robertson, a Broken Bow young lady. Both of these ladies were registered by Miss Emma Scott, secretary of the notaries' association.

The first men to enter the door were two veterans of the Civil war, their names being respectively Almond Burgess, of Johnson county, Missouri, formerly of the Second Iowa regiment, and James Clayton, of Hamburg, Iowa, formerly of the Twenty-fifth Missouri regiment. Both of the veterans were extremely hopeful and signified their intentions of becoming sturdy homesteaders if they were so fortunate as to make a winning. The third man to register was Dr. A. N. Horn, a dentist of Exeter, Nebraska. The last named registered quickly and was really the first of the trio to drop his envelope in the box.

All night long the stream of people kept up, the applicants entering by the front door, selecting any disengaged notary, registering and passing out the back door into the alley. By the time the first rush was over the morning trains arrived bringing in another batch and it was the same story over again, with this exception, that there was a change of shifts among the notaries and the tired ones had a chance to go home and sleep.

Nor were the trains the only conveyances bringing in landseekers. Autos galore glided into town all hours of the day and night and from all parts of the country. Up to the date of this issue, over three hundred and fifty cars have brought people to Broken Bow for the purpose of registering. One citizen taking a trip east of here Wednesday forenoon, counted in two hours, 102 autos headed in this direction, and he missed a few at that, when he turned his head to spit. Let all come who want; Broken Bow has ample accommodations and can feed and shelter an unlimited number of people. The Burlington took care of the traffic in a manner that called forth the highest praise, and between it and the excellent town facilities there was no discomfort at any period of the rush.

During the twelve days the registration lasted, the Broken Bow authorities handled over 32,000 applicants. For the protection of the crowd, most of whom were strangers, every precaution was taken. The eating houses did not advance the price of meals and every private house in town contributed one or more rooms. The train service was so organized, however, that no one was required to remain in town over night unless they so elected. A large tent office was erected in the street and maintained as a bureau of information. W. L. Gaston had charge of this bureau and organized an able corps of assistants, who were on duty day and night and left nothing undone for the comfort of the strangers.

PERSONNEL OF THE NOTARIES

The splendid organization of the notaries, by which they handled the crowd as fast as they arrived, can not be too highly praised. They were accommodating and very efficient. Their names are as follows: I. A. Reneau, Broken Bow; M. M. Leonard, Anselmo; M. M. Runyan, Mason City; W. B. Eastham, Broken Bow; Emil Gschwind, Broken Bow; Robert Farley, Milburn; Dale P. Stough, Broken Bow; Mabel Darnell, Broken Bow; H. H. Andrews, Callaway; J. C. Moore, Broken Bow; James A. Kirk, Broken Bow; E. House, Broken Bow; A. R. Humphrey, Broken Bow; John S. McGraw, Broken Bow; A. J. Watkins, Oconto; Ross G. Moore, Broken Bow; Frank P. Knox, Arnold; J. Thull, Ansley; J. M. Fodge, Broken Bow; Charles H. Holcomb, Broken Bow; Emery F. Bush, Broken Bow; Arthur W. Holcomb, Broken Bow; E. S. Holcomb, Broken Bow; B. C. Empfield, Broken Bow; E. Taylor, Broken Bow; Charles L. Gutterson, Broken Bow; Willis Cadwell, Broken Bow; C. L. Bennett, Broken Bow; R. D. Pickett, Broken Bow; H. F. Hanson, Broken Bow; J. E. Ferguson, Broken Bow; A. B. Cornish, Lodi; Frank Kelley, Merna; Emma Scott, Ansley.

The land office was represented by Register John Reese; Receiver D. M. Amsberry; W. L. Lovelace, and Leo Poole.

LET UP, STOP, OVER, AND REST

From the beginning of settlements post-offices were in demand and, as noted elsewhere, were located in an early day so as to give best possible service to the scattered settlers. Some of the names selected for early post-offices were so peculiar and seemed to have been arranged with so much of design that we stop to record a few of them. In 1880 was established in the present vicinity of Callaway a postoffice which was named "Letup." In June, 1884, on what is to-day called the Stop Table, a postoffice was established called "Stop." In August of the same year another postoffice was established and called "Over." In November, 1890, on the West Table, a postoffice was established and given the delightful name of "Rest." Taken altogether these four postoffices, in the order in which they were established, read, Letup, Stop, Over, and Rest.

None of them is in existence to-day. Ira Graves was the postmaster of "Letup." He had the name changed to Delight. Later it was changed to Grant and then, in August, 1886, it was changed to Callaway. "Stop" was discontinued ten years after its establishment. "Over" was discontinued in 1907. "Rest" lasted until August, 1906.

The transition period between the white man and the Indian is always a very interesting period in the development of a new country, but it is one that affords little comfort to the historian who covets accuracy. Records are scarce if, in fact, there be any at all; treacherous memories and conflicting statements are about the sum total of obtainable material. The best that can be done is to give the general narrative and let the old settlers supply the details.

NO SETTLEMENT IN COUNTY

The present state surveyor, Robert Harvey, who with his party surveyed the principal lines of this county in 1872, says:

"There was not a settler in Custer county that we observed, and the only evidence noticed of an intention to settle was in section 26, township 18 north, range 17 west, in the south end of the Oak Grove, close to Rock creek, where we found four logs cut and laid up for the foundation of a cabin, and on a blazed oak tree nearby was the notice in pencil of 'Buffalo Bill's' claim of intention to file. It was dated in June and my recollection is that it was on the anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill."

In 1873 and 1874 the first settlements were made. During that period several parties came up from the Grand Island country, or perhaps a little farther east, and settled in the Middle Loup valley,—Lee's Park and the present New Helena. Other families came up from the south, filtering through Kearney, Lexington, then called Plum Creek, and made settlement in the South Loup valley. It was in these localities that Custer county settlements began. Some of the settlers were married men who brought their families with them and were therefore ready as soon as possible to establish some kind of a home. Whether a dugout, a log house, or sod house, it didn't matter. If four walls could be erected or dug out, and a roof constructed over them, it was home and in it home life began.

THE BUFFALO BILL TREE

A tree in the vicinity of Douglas Grove bore for years the name, "William Cody, 1869," cut deep into its shaggy bark, showing that "Buffalo Bill" had camped here on some of his hunting or scouting trips. Opposite the grove were three large pine trees, standing four miles back from the river. Two of them were cut in the winter of 1873, taken to Loup City and sawed into boards, which were taken to Omaha and Lincoln as an advertisement for Kountz county pioneers. In 1880 the last of the three pine trees disappeared. They had stood for years, faithful sentinels in the dreary sand hills—a guide for the weary hunter to his camp. All the early settlers miss that last lone pine, which could be seen for miles on either side of the river. None but a tender-foot could have destroyed the last remaining relic of early times. Owing to the fact that Cody's name was found carved on this tree, the story became current that Cody had located a claim within the boundaries of the county. There is nothing to substantiate the claim.

THE FIRST HOME

Who had the first home in Custer county? That is one of the many interrogations no historian can answer. During the early '60s trappers and hunters often visited the country but it is not known that any of them had permanent stopping places. Perhaps some of them put up rude shelters, but they were nothing more than shelters. Out south and west of Callaway, on the old Finch-Hatton ranch, was located what is probably the first white man's abode of any kind ever established in the county. Old settlers tell us that in 1872 the remains of a demolished dugout were discovered in this locality and at that time it gave evidence of having been abandoned at least ten years. The excavation and side wall were clearly demarked and no mistake could be made concerning the fact that it was made for a human occupant. Beyond doubt, then, this was the first home in Custer county. As the proprietor was never at home to any of his neighbors, or rather did not wait until his neighbors moved into the country, his name will never be recorded in these pages.

WHO WAS THE FIRST HOMESTEADER?

There has always been more or less dispute concerning the first homesteader who filed on land within the boundaries of Custer county. Both the South and Middle Loup countries have, with more or less insistence, laid claim to the distinction. Both Douglas Grove and the New Helena district make claims to this distinction, and it has been rather hard to harmonize all these claims and assertions. Butcher's history gives the honor to Edward Douglas, of Douglas Grove, to whom this volume gives third place. Great pains have been taken to ascertain the facts in the case. The different claims have always been maintained, no one took the trouble to search records and ascertain when these different parties filed.

LEWIS R. DOWSE FIRST SETTLER

The honors of being the first bona-fide settler belong, without doubt, to Lewis R. Dowse, who came into the county and settled in the Middle Loup valley in August, 1873. He brought with him his breaking plow, reaper, and mower. He put up hay, did some breaking, and settled on the homestead where he now resides. He did not file on his land at the time he located, but held it by squatter's right until such time as he had the money to make homestead entry. Accordingly Dowse is the first settler but was not the first to file on Custer county land. Before he could make entry of his land several others had filed homestead claims.

FRANK OHME WAS FIRST MAN TO FILE

Frank Ohme, who settled over on the east county line and whose address is Arcadia, in Valley county, is beyond doubt the man who filed on the first claim in Custer county and the second place goes to Edward Douglas, who is championed by the Douglas Grove people, and for whom Douglas Grove was named. As a matter of fact, there is only three weeks' difference between the times of their filing. Frank Ohme filed January 26, 1874, and his filing number at the land office was serial 4728.

Edward Douglas filed February 16, 1874, and his serial number was 4972. This puts twenty-one days between the entry of Frank Ohme and that of Edward Douglas, and we believe it definitely settles the question of priority.

The next entry found in the land office records is that made by Joseph A. Woods, March 21, 1874. Ten days later he was followed by Daniel Wagner, who filed May 1, 1874. The next name on the land office record is Patrick Kelly, May 5th of the same year, and this is as far down the column of entries as it is profitable to go.

THE FIRST COMERS

We quote W. D. Hall as authority for first Douglas Grove settlements and they were among the first, if not the first, in the county.

The third claim taken in what is now Custer county was in what is known as Oak Grove, and was entered February 16, 1874, by Edward Douglas, who died the following summer, at Loup City. For him the town was named. W. H. Comstock settled here in the spring of 1874, with D. J. Caswell, Sam Wagoner, B. D. Allen, James Oxford, E. D. Eubank, C. A. Hale, A. E. Denis, and Thomas Darnell. A. A. Higgins came in the spring of 1875 and brought with him a family of twelve, which greatly added to the population of the little settlement. Mr. Higgins was a patriarch of the gospel, a staunch upholder of the teachings of Wesley, and it was under his roof that Elder Lemin, the pioneer of Methodism in Nebraska, preached the first Methodist sermon and held the first quarterly conference in the county.

Frank Ingram bought from the heirs of Edward Douglas the Oak Grove claim in 1875. Oak Grove is a beautiful place. The country around is rough and rugged in the extreme, and is well known to all the old settlers on the Loup.

MORE FOR DOUGLAS GROVE

Douglas Grove received its full share of the pioneer inflow until 1884, when practically all government land was occupied. The first settler in Dry valley was James Wagoner, who settled on what is now the Len Town place, in 1878. Frank Muthic took the next claim, followed by N. W. Alberts, Dewitt Konklin, W. Bener, J. W. Scott, John Campbell, the Amos family, Brumbaugh family, Joe Armour, J. Roth, John Jems, the Twombly family, Worley brothers, Mr. Mattox, Swanson brothers, C. Gollier, A. Kohn, W. Newcomb, L. L. Wood, James Boggs, Mr. Bowers, and others who have made Dry valley a neighborhood of permanence and thrift.

M. E. Vandenberg located at the mouth of Sand Creek in 1878; the Payne ranch was located in Dry valley in 1880 and has been since 1884 the property of S. L. Glover and sons; Charley Hill located in 1880 on Wagoner creek.

To do justice to those who helped to make the history of Douglas Grove in its first decade, we mention the three Mickle brothers and their families, the Glazier family, I. C. Buck, John Stewart, the Stevens family, the Cleveland family, W. Hudson, Dewitt Comstock, W. S. House, H. H. McIntosh, H. G. Stockes, J. A. Kenyon, G. E. Whitcomb, W. D. Hall, J. H. Walton, W. C. Gaddish, and W. P. Higgins, who twice has represented the county in the state legislature.

Captain Comstock, B. D. Allen, and Sherman Wagoner homesteaded in the Douglas Grove country in the spring of 1874. Captain Comstock remained in the country till the time of his death, a few years since, and became one of the noted characters of the community, — one whose life history is interwoven with the story of Custer county and its development.

NEW HELENA HOMESTEADERS

In the spring of 1874 C. R. Mathews, who still lives upon his homestead in the New Helena district, organized a party of Virginians for the invasion of Custer county. The party consisted of himself, C. R. Mathews, Amos Broughan, Watts Sifford, Harv Andrews, George Snyder and wife, William King, W. P. Tolley, J. H. Withers, and a man by the name of Circle, whose first name is not recorded. They came by way of Omaha, Kearney, and Loup City into the Middle Loup country, fording the Middle Loup river where the old town of Wescott now stands. There were no roads, no lines of any kind, no bridges, so they pushed their way over the prairie. At Lillian creek they encountered a snow storm, which before the night was over became a blizzard. They had difficulty in crossing the stream, which was almost bank-full at the time, but they managed to reach the western bank, took off the wagon box and braced it up for protection from the storm.

Harv Andrews "shinned" up a cottonwood tree, broke off dead limbs, and soon had a roaring camp-fire. The next morning, after the blizzard had subsided, they moved up to the mouth of Victoria creek, where they met trappers who described to them the Victoria valley. They followed the creek until they came to the present site of New Helena. Here too they found many evidences of trappers and Indians.

DISCOVER CEDAR CANYON

Fortunately they found enough cedar logs and poles, which had formerly been used by trappers, to make bridge enough to get the wagon across Victoria creek, after which they headed for the breaks and the hills in a north-westerly direction. In about three miles and a half they struck what is known in Custer county at the Big Cedar

HISTORIC RESIDENCE OF JUDGE C. R. MATHEWS, NEAR HELENA Buildings constructed of cedar logs

canyon. The canyon was a dense forest of cedar and other trees. This timber was very valuable, and has furnished cedar logs for most of the early homes within a radius of twenty-five miles. Judge Matthews' present dwelling is made of cedar logs from this canyon, and consists of two log cabins place side by side with the doors facing each other in old Virginia style. At the present time the logs in Judge Mathews' house, if sawed into lumber and sold for market value, would bring money enough to build as fine a home as could be found in Custer county, but the Judge prefers the old home and the old logs with which all the memories of early days are associated. The undergrowth in the canyon was so thick that it could hardly be penetrated, but pushing their way through they came to a clearing in the center of which stood an Indian wigwam. They experienced cold chills in the region of the spine, but their fears were groundless for the wigwam proved to be empty and in it they spent a very comfortable night. After a few days spent in exploring the country they returned to Loup City and proceeded to equip themselves for starting life on the Nebraska claim.

Their return was the starting of the settlement. These settlers consisted of H. B. Andrews, Edward Nelson, Judge C. R. Mathews, George E. Carr, and O. A. Smith. The next winter Ezra A. Caswell and Thomas Loughran took claims further down the creek, near the Middle Loup. About this time Jacob Ross, with a large family of grown-up daughters, made a welcome addition to the community. In the next spring, 1875, N. H. Dryden and family, J. R. Forsythe, and J. P. Bell settled in the neighborhood.

ESTABLISHES FIRST POSTOFFICE

During the winter of 1874-5 C. R. Mathews, circulated a petition asking the authorities at Washington to establish a postoffice at New Helena, to be served by a post route from Kearney, via Loup City, Arcadia, and Douglas Grove. New Helena received the first mail by this arrangement on the 15th day of April, 1875. Aaron Crouch brought the first mail and subsequently served as mail carrier for several years. The mail came but once a week, arriving and leaving on Saturdays. Mathews' commission as postmaster bears the date of February 9, 1875, during President Grant's administration. It locates New Helena in Kountz county, Nebraska.

THE BEGINNING OF LEE'S PARK

In September, 1874, James Lee, discovering a fertile valley in the eastern part of the county located on a central quarter-section, and made it his home. The following summer he entered the quarter on which he lived as a pre-emption, and also the adjoining quarter as a tree claim, under the old law which required forty acres of trees planted.

This gave the name of Lee's Park to the valley. Although parties often passed through the park, no one seemed inclined to locate. Mr. Lee kept bachelor's hall in a sod house, and began to subdue the native soil. He evidently succeeded, as his first wheat crop of one acre testified. He obtained from it forty bushels of wheat, which is supposed to be the largest yield ever raised in the park.

The following spring he continued his operations on the farm, and planted some trees on his timber claim, but the grasshoppers again found him, and ate up his corn crop, as well as his little trees. During these years, as hunters and adventurers passed through, they occasionally stopped at the bachelor's mansion, and the fact of his being the only settler, and working with his trees on his timber claim, caused the travelers to name the valley "Lee's Park." Here then this settler dwelt, year after year, in solitude — farming, planting trees, and doing his sewing, cooking, and washing. He tried to get others to locate, but no one volunteered. Nearly four years had passed by, and his courage, which had remained firm for years, began to wane, with the result that he at last decided to leave his beautiful half-section of land.

About this time, however, Frank Wright offered to locate in the park, providing Mr. Lee surrendered to him his pre-emption, on which was his house and well. This Mr. Lee agreed to do, and soon afterward Mr. Wright started to claim his new possessions. On his way he fell in with some land-seekers who seemed to be headed for Lee's Park, so they went together, and on arriving at Mr. Lee's, Wright asked for the papers, which were immediately surrendered. Soon afterward, however, this Mr. Wright sold the place for twenty-five dollars to F. E. Morrison. These land-seekers were William and Joseph Murray, who, in February, 1878, took claims in the park, and their families arrived in May the same year. Soon after this, in March, Benjamin Knight located in the park. He then returned to his Wisconsin home to claim the hand of his "best girl," and together they journeyed to their frontier home. From this time on, settlers flocked in rapidly, and James Lee, no longer solitary, decided not to leave. His pre-emption right, however, being gone, he proceeded to the extreme end of the park and filed a 160-acre piece as a homestead, on the bank of a little stream afterward known as "Lee's creek."

In July Messrs. Overton, Chandler True, Jay Hamlin, George Hamlin, Jr., E. Stephens, and William Van Alstine settled. In August T. J. Johnson and Amos Smith; then followed Parish Freeman and his son Charles, William Hall, Joseph Peacock, and James Thompson. In 1879 Edward Knight, Philip Lynch, James Wisely, N. Mehrhoff, Nelson Potter, Sam Minchell, and Mr. Abel located here. In 1880 Thomas, David, and Archie Tod, F. E. Morrison, and James Bradford, also Thomas, John, and Sam Berridge, who afterward commenced the importation of English shire horses, under the firm name of Berridge Brothers. They made three importations, among which were some very choice specimens of the breed.

A FINE STOCK BREEDER

In 1881 J. L. H. Knight settled permanently here with his father, Edward Knight, and as this youngster was a lover of fine stock, he early sought an opportunity to obtain some thoroughbred hogs. His first purchase was in 1885, and was a Poland-China pig, which cost him thirty dollars. Two years after this he purchased three head of Shorthorn cattle, and from that time he continued to show his belief in good blood by frequent purchases. He purchased 520 acres of his father and brother in the southern end of the park and named it "Pleasant Hill Stock Farm." Here he had choice specimens of Shorthorn cattle, Poland-China hogs, and the Plymouth Rock fowls. Although not confining himself exclusively to hogs, he made the raising of fine pigs a specialty and was often spoken of as the "hog man."

A SIGNAL-SERVICE MAN

In 1883 the fine section of school land in Lee's Park was put upon the market, and two brothers, C. A. and W. A. Forbes, energetic young men, were fortunate enough to obtain 160 acres. At the same time, J. L. H. Knight purchased the remaining 320 acres for W. S. Delano, who was then in the signal service and who was one of Mr. Knight's classmates in the Michigan Agricultural College. In 1886 his term of enlistment expired, and very willing was he to leave the service of Uncle Sam to engage in farming. He at once commenced raising seeds for D. M. Ferry & Company, of Detroit, Michigan. His two brothers, F. E. Delano and Milton Delano, shortly afterward entered into partnership with him, under the firm name of Delano Brothers.

SPENCER'S PARK

Spencer's Park, located in township 16, range 19 west, is comprised of about 3,600 acres of level land surrounded with hills, and opening in the Muddy valley by a narrow neck one and one-half miles northeast of the town of Berwyn, in Berwyn precinct. Its greatest length is three miles and its greatest width two miles, and it comprises some of the finest land in Custer county. The soil is of a black loam from three to six feet deep, underlaid with a fine light-colored clay from thirty to fifty feet in depth, and is particularly adapted to hold moisture in extreme drought, besides taking moisture readily.

Probably the first home-seekers that looked over the park with a view of locating were George Early and Clark Wellman, who came from near Lincoln, in the fall of 1879. The former entered the southwest quarter of section 10 and the latter the east half of the northeast quarter of section 9, and west half of northwest quarter of section 10, but they did not make permanent settlement on the above land.

The first permanent settler was Ira D. Spencer, with his family, in whose honor the park was named. They came from Jefferson county in the usual way, with prairie schooner, driving their cattle with them and having some thirty head. The family consisted of wife and three sons. On reaching Seneca, which is now called Westerville, on Clear creek, Mr. Spencer made his first stop and began looking around for a location. When he viewed Spencer's Park he said, "This is good enough for me," and in the summer of 1880 he staked out a claim which was nearly in the center of the park, on the southeast quarter of section 10. He began to break the same and put up hay for the winter. The family lived on Clear creek during the winter, until the necessary preparations were made for their new home, which was a large sod house, the latch string of which was always on the outside for weary travelers who chanced to come that way.

I. E. Spencer, son of the above, entered the west half of the northeast quarter and the east half of the northwest quarter of section 10, in May, 1881. Later he built a sod house, furnished it with a stove, bed, table, and a couple of soap-boxes for chairs, and began a bachelor's life in his sod shanty on his claim.

In the fall of 1880 an old man by the name of Gaskell entered the northwest quarter of section 14 as a timber claim, and his son-in-law, H. Dornen, entered the northeast quarter of section 15 as a homestead. They moved their families on their claims. But being unprepared for the hard winter that followed, after losing all their stock, they abandoned their claims and sold their relinquishments, for twenty-five dollars apiece, to W. H. Mauk.

MAUK WAS A GAY BACHELOR

Mauk entered the northeast quarter of section 15 as a homestead, the other as a timber claim, in May, 1881. In the following fall he made a dugout about eight by ten feet, covered with poles, brush, and sod, and began house-keeping in earnest, as a bachelor. His furniture consisted of a stove, bed and bedding, one dishpan, one skillet, one breadpan, one coffeepot, two plates, two knives and forks, and one spoon. The sheet was spread over the bed in a slanting position to run the water and mud off when it rained. His time was about evenly divided between farming, going to the canyons for wood, and thinking which neighbor he would call on next to get a square meal. But the place to-day does not look like it did then. It has increased in value at least one hundred fold and a frame house has taken the place of the old sod. This was erected in the spring of 1888 and was the first frame house in the park.

In the summer of 1881 H. J. Dupes settled on the northwest quarter. On December 15, with his wife and six children, he came from Jefferson county, Nebraska, and began improving his farm, which is a very good one. He also entered the southeast quarter of section 9, as a timber claim, which he sold in 1887, to Charles Kemp.

Miss Julietta Wellman moved from Lincoln in 1881 and located on the east half of northeast quarter of section 9 and the west half of northwest quarter of section 10, as a homestead. Later she built a sod house on it, made other improvements, and lived on it until she perfected her title. She went through all the hardships of frontier life, a great deal of the time living alone, which shows the grit and determination of the ladies who were among the first settlers of the park. She also filed on the southwest quarter of section 2 as a timber claim and improved both claims.

Clark Wellman bought of George Early the relinquishment on the southwest quarter of section 10 and entered the same as a timber claim, in 1883, and later sold it to G. B. Greenwood.

In the summer of 1882 Nathan Davidson came here from Tama county, Iowa, with his wife, three sons, and two daughters, and located on the southwest quarter of section 14. His oldest son, James, who also had a family, entered the southeast quarter of section 15 which is to-day well improved and valuable land. His second son, Henry, homesteaded the northeast quarter of section 14, in the summer of 1883 and began "batching" on his claim, which added another settler.

In the summer of 1883 R. W. Barton settled on the northwest quarter of section 4. He brought his family from Hamilton county, Nebraska, and settled on the northwest extremity of the park, which is mostly table land. Overlooking the park, it commanded a beautiful view of the surrounding country. Barton was a veteran of the Grand Army of the Republic and later was elected justice of the peace. He was among the foremost in organizing schools, laying out roads, and improving and building up the country.

In the spring of 1884 Peter Rapp moved with his family from near Lincoln, Nebraska, and settled on the southeast quarter of section 4, as a timber claim. He came with horses, machinery, and a herd of cattle and has made very rapid improvements. His first residence was a dugout. The stables were built of sod.

In the spring of 1884 C. Coswell located on the northwest quarter of section 3 and led a bachelor's life, made some improvements and then sold out, in 1889. The place has changed hands a good many times.

NOW THEY COME TO LILLIAN

Probably the first men who ever looked upon this valley with a serious idea of possession were J. M. and H. A. Goheen and William H. Gwinn. They located their claims, made a "dugout," cut some hay, and prepared for winter. Some time during that fall John W. Goheen, a brother of the first arrivals, came with their parents, quite old people, who had been pioneers in the settlement of western Pennsylvania. The aged couple, full of the fire of youth, were delighted with the new-found earthly paradise and soon filed on a homestead, which they occupied until the death of the aged James Goheen, which occurred in August, 1887.

The greatest obstacle to the settlement of these table-lands as yet, was the great depth to good water. Many of the first settlers along the streams had seen and admired this valley, but they did not dare venture too far from the running water. The Goheen boys were fortunate enough to secure the services of two settlers north of the Middle Loup river, Charles Bishop and Burton Gates, who owned a rig for putting down tubular wells. They were successful in obtaining a bountiful supply of good water at a depth of eighty to one hundred feet, piercing a soft manganese rock and finding water in gravel just beneath. During the summer of 1881 the Goheen boys built comfortable sod houses, preparatory to moving their families to their new homes.

The next settler to make his appearance was J. E. Gwinn. William Gwinn had returned to Nemaha county to remove his cattle to the rich grazing grounds of the west, and, uniting their little herds these two, accompanied by D. H. Gwinn, on his tenderfoot exploring expedition, started April 17, 1882, with forty head of cattle, an emigrant wagon and a herd of ponies. They were twenty-two days making the journey.

Some idea of the seclusion of this valley at this time may be gained from the fact that while J. E. Gwinn was engaged in breaking fifty acres on his claim in the summer of 1882 he saw only two travelers, and one of these had lost his way.

In October, 1882, came J. O. Bates with his son, J. M., and daughter, Susie, all prospecting for land that they found to their liking adjoining the new settlement. The next spring J. M. Bates removed from Omaha with all his effects, to his future home. A. G. Page and wife, from Vermont, also the parents of Mrs. J. M. Bates, arrived with the Bates family, and settled in section 19. Mr. Bates provided himself with a large tent, sufficient to shelter the whole party. On their arrival it was pitched on the claim of Susie Bates and became the temporary home of the party, while more permanent buildings were being erected on their respective claims. All went merrily enough in their Arab-like mode of existence until the latter part of May, when one day there came the most furious rain and wind storm ever yet seen in this locality, and when the storm was at its height the tent was lifted from over their heads and left them to the mercy of the raging elements. Bedding, pans of milk, wearing apparel, and sundry other unmentionables suddenly sought wonderful affinity for each other, and uniting, attempted to form a new compound. Bedrenched, bedraggled, and almost drowned, the occupants thus suddenly rendered homeless, dodged and cowered, and grasped at straws in the way of shelter until the brief deluge was over. Then, with more haste than grace, they sought shelter, bag and baggage, in the bachelor quarters of William Gwinn, a single room, about ten by twelve feet. One end of the room was devoted to a range of trunks, boxes, and bedding from the ceiling to the floor, a stove in one corner, a table and some chairs,—and where could the eleven animated beings find a resting place for their wet feet? Picture the inter-family dinner according to your imagination. As for sleeping arrangements, they consisted of the airy apartments on wheels, in which the men folks sought nightly repose.

C. E. Bates, a young son, reached his majority some time later, and filed on a pre-emption in section 27.

Two young Englishmen, E. E. Bird and Arthur Clark, built their sod houses in the autumn of 1882. Clark soon tired of homesteading and returned to England. Bird also sold his claim and removed to another part of the neighborhood, a few miles distant. The purchaser of the claim was T. A. Leisure, who resided there for years, and if Clark should return he would hardly recognize the farm which has taken the place of the raw prairie he bartered away.

Clark had, also, a tree claim which was purchased from Jabez Bowman, from Cass county, Nebraska, and Bird had one which was bought by A. G. Bowman, Jabez's father. Clark received a horse from this quarter, which is now valued at eight thousand dollars. Charles Bowman purchased E. E. Bird's homestead and converted it into a fine farm.

Some of the settlers who did not prove to be permanent ones were Charles and Amos Meeker, David Daniels, and E. B. Bartlett. During 1884 came also Joseph Pickner.

Thomas Maupin, a worthy old gentleman from Iowa, came with his family the same spring and filed on a part of sections 27 and 34. On the western extremity of the little settlement had happened a great event which must not be overlooked.

In the spring of 1883 F. M. DuPray and wife made their appearance with a large family of grown-up daughters. It seemed like the advent of full civilization to the wilds of Lillian Park. Lonely bachelors hung up their flapjack pans, scraped the dough from their pantaloons, and hastened to see if Mr. DuPray was, as reputed, a blacksmith, and to consult him about breaking plows, other farming implements, etc. The result was that several of the bachelors were made happy and several new homes were founded instead of the mere staying places, as formerly. Among these were H. A. Goheen, on section 31, and Fred Frances, on section 30, where he began the task of redeeming 160 acres of land from the power of the "Great American Desert."

Joseph Chrisman, the patriarch of another large family of sons and daughters, and Abraham-like, a keeper of a large herd of cattle, with complete gypsy outfit, began in the spring of 1883 a gradual progress toward the "Loup country" from Nemaha county. He found a large, fine stock location about the headwaters of Lillian creek, section 3—18—20. It is not likely that he or his family will ever forget the trials of their first winter here, a severe one, and, being inexperienced in the usages of Custer county blizzards, the shelter and feed provided for their stock were insufficient and many head perished, though since then prosperity has smeared itself all over the old pioneer in great dabs, and a large increase has blessed his efforts.

Mary E. Howard, a widow lady, with her daughter, settled in section 32, and bravely went to work to make a home. She succeeded in bringing thirty acres under cultivation, mostly her own labor.

Rasmus Schritsmier located during 1884 and began industriously to conquer the prairie sod and fit the soil for crops.

SETTLING IN MERNA VALLEY

Some time in the year of 1882 a prairie schooner camped for the night on the site where afterward the town of Merna was built. The travelers attached to the one-wagon caravan were a young lady by the name of Villa Ong and her cousin, a young man from somewhere in the east. The next morning they hitched up the team and drove about six miles up the valley, where one of their horses lay down and died. This compelled the two travelers to proceed on foot to where Mr. Ira Ong, the young lady's father, had a cattle ranch, in what is now the Keota district.

W. G. Brotherton, who was destined to be one of the pioneer spirits of Custer county, had settled in Merna valley early in 1882, and in his sod house on the night referred to in the paragraph above, Gilbert Hogue and Joseph A. Kellenbarger were all-night guests. Kellenbarger and Brotherton had been acquaintances in Iowa previously to the exodus to Nebraska. Kellenbarger and Hogue were in quest of land, and the next morning Brotherton and his team were at their disposal. Both were young, with ambitious dreams of life, and the job of tackling raw prairie and transforming it into an improved farm and comfortable home meant little to them. They made their land selections and put back to Iowa for their families and other friends.

A BUNCH OF IOWANS ARRIVE

On the ninth day of April, 1883, late in the afternoon, a small train of prairie schooners pulled up at the old town of Merna, where W. G. Brotherton was both postmaster and merchant. D. O. Luce, who was a proprietor of a wood yard, was the rest of the town. The schooners were loaded with Iowa people who had come to stay. They were after land, and in that day there was land for everybody. The party consisted of O. G. Gordon, Warren Gordon and his three small children,—Lelia, who is now Mrs. W. G. Brotherton, of Fora, Arthur county, where they are still pioneering and conducting a postoffice, and Lee and Arthur, who are now prominent citizens of the new town of Merna,—John Cosner, wife and one small child, a Mr. Graham, wife and three small children, Gilbert and Edward Hogue, Ben Kellenbarger and family, Joseph Kellenbarger and his family of four small children. They did not all hail from the same place, but they had arranged to come together, and when they reached Merna, which was to be their stopping place, they had been nine days on the trail. During that time they formed acquaintanceships that bind them together still and will never be forgotten.

AN IMPROMPTU RECEPTION

As soon as the wagons were sighted by the few settlers of the vicinity of the little village they began to come in from all directions upon some pretext or other. The principal object, of course, was a pardonable curiosity to find out who the newcomers were, and in open-hearted western fashion extend them a reception, which for simplicity and elegance of stage-setting could hardly be surpassed. Dick Strong and Mr. Morrison wanted to borrow flour to put them through until a fresh supply could be secured from Kearney. John Pollard came to invite the Graham family and the Ben

Mr. Foot, at this time, was sheriff of Custer county

Kellenbarger family to be his guests for the night in his new "soddy." Pollard was a little homesick at the time and he needed the company to cheer him up and replenish his "pep." The Thomas boys wished to see if any of their relatives were in the crowd. W. H. Reader, having no other excuse, came after a barrel of water. "Paddy" Kilfoil, seeing the wagons lined up by the postoffice thought possibly someone might have a plug of tobacco to spare, so he walked down from where the Dale church now stands. "Paddy's" habitation in those days was a dugout. It was early in the spring but "Paddy" rushed the season enough to appear in a straw hat and linen duster. His salutation to the newcomers was, "Ye's have come to a moighty foine place."

The next day the settlers located on their respective homesteads and began active operations. The most of them lived in their wagons until they could build sod houses.

SETTLING IN CUSTER CENTER

On the 28th day of November two young men, Omer M. Kem and Martin F. Blankenship, boarded the train at East Lynn, Vermilion county, Illinois, and came to the grand state of Nebraska for the purpose of homesteading land. On their arrival in Kearney they met with C. D. Pelham and John DeMerritt, two freighters from Custer county, who spoke highly of this country. The young men came with them to Pelham's store, then located northeast of the present site of Broken Bow, about one mile from the public square. There was no Broken Bow at that time as far as the town is concerned, but Mr. Pelham was postmaster of a very small postoffice called Broken Bow. After a few days' prospecting they selected claims near the present Custer Center and went back to Illinois. They returned to Custer county early in March of 1882 and located on their claims,—Mr. Kem three and one-half miles northwest of Broken Bow and Mr. Blankenship about five miles northwest. There were no churches or schools and their neighbors were few, but what they had were very friendly. H. C. Reyner, Charles S. Raymond, James D. Ream, and James Courtney with themselves constituted the number. During the following fall and winter others located near them and by the spring of 1883 they had a lot of new neighbors, and good ones.

DOWN IN ASH CREEK VALLEY

In 1886 C. W. Prettyman pre-empted land in the Ash creek valley down near where the Ash creek empties into the Loup. He tells that he was preceded in that neighborhood by several other pioneers, among whom was his father, G. F. Almendinger, C. H. Landreth, and James King. The Prettyman claim was only one-half mile from the King place, which made the King family his nearest neighbors. Ash creek is to-day one of the best localities in the county and gives no indication of the dugouts, sod houses, and log shacks of the early day.

HOW CUSTER COUNTY GOT BOB HUNTER

History of a country is made oftentimes by seemingly insignificant actions and experiences in the daily routine life of its inhabitants, which experiences are many and varied in the lives of its pioneers. Betimes a very trivial event leads to the location of a home. Sometimes the very name of a city impresses those looking for a new location, as does the name Broken Bow, county seat of Custer county, which at once implies romance and commands interest: at least such was the case of the Hunter family—which consisted of father, mother, and two small daughters—who had moved from a rich agricultural country in Illinois to Buffalo county, Nebraska, in 1885. As the summer of 1887-8 wore on, long wagon trains of freighters on their way from Broken Bow and vicinity, in Custer county, to Kearney, in Buffalo county, passed and repassed the modest prairie home of Robert A. Hunter and family.

Many stormy wintry nights the plain home, typical of western homes in hospitality, was filled to overflowing with the freighters, who always before leaving their own homes, provided themselves with sufficient food for themselves and provender for their horses for the journey and return. Kearney, about seventy-five miles from Broken Bow, being the nearest railroad town, was the shipping point for all Custer county, and furnished an enormous supply of all building materials and provisions for the inhabitants of the north country, as it was called by the residents of Buffalo county. These materials and provisions all had to be delivered to Custer county by freighters, who formed long wagon trails, sometimes as many as fifty wagons being in one trail, each wagon being mostly empty on the way to Kearney, as the settlers then had little to take to market but much to return with for themselves and for the little inland town of Broken Bow.

To these wagons were hitched from three to five horses, mules, or bronchos, sometimes abreast and oftentimes tandem. In pleasant weather the freighter camped by the roadside wherever the night found him, but in case of storms or sudden blizzards he sought the refuge of shelter in the sparsely settled homes along his route. These homes almost without exception were always hospitably open to them at any time, day or night.

Thus it was that the Hunter home was often the shelter of many freighters, and many and interesting tales were told by them of the north country, and of the many different drawbacks and advantages, which often sounded to their willing and interested listeners like tales of romance and adventure. Whether just or otherwise, all countries are to a certain degree judged by strangers according to the people representing them.

So impressed was Mr. Hunter by these descriptions of Custer county advantages that he became convinced that it must be a splendid stock country, and the summer (August 9, 1889) found the family headed for Broken Bow, where they at least hoped to be able to live six months in order to pay out and prove up on a homestead of 160 acres, for the right for which he had traded a broncho and sulky and harness.

THEY FILL UP THE TABLE

One of the first settlers on the west table-land was J. B. Klump, who took a homestead and timber claim in section 12, township 17, range 23, in March, 1883. D. W. Wediman and B. F. Cole were the first settlers on the northeast part of this table. Samuel High also located about the same time that Klump did, and dug a well 350 feet deep, but it was not a success. Within the same year there arrived three brothers by the name of Lang, with their father and mother, and John and Moses Truesdale. In the spring of 1885 came Peter F. Forney, Charles Blakeman, Charles Zachary, Daniel Sweeney, and John Wehling. These settlers dug cisterns near the lagoons and cemented them, which held water from the melted snow and rains for some months. When the cisterns became dry the only recourse was to haul water in barrels from the valley two or three miles distant, and anyone who is acquainted with the steepness of the ascent up to the table-land can imagine what a task it was. In addition they often had to pay five cents per barrel for the water. As they not only had to haul water for their household use, but also for whatever stock they had, Mr. Forney started in to haul water in two barrels, but he soon found that process too slow. He had four horses, four head of cattle and some hogs, and as it took over half of his time hauling water, he almost begrudged the poor beasts what they wanted to drink.

FIRST OF THE DEEP WELLS

Peter Forney was the first man to put down a gravel well on the table. It was an iron-casing well, 444 feet deep and cost him six hundred dollars. For two years this well supplied the families of Wediman, Cox, Maupin, Hill, Blakeman, Taylor, Cooney, and Pike. Mr. Forney had to mortgage his farm in order to put down this well, and by the time it was paid for the interest, added to the principal, amounted to $1050.

At this writing this table-land is thickly settled. It has won the reputation of being the best wheat-producing portion of Custer county, and contains some splendid farms. Most of the sod buildings have given way to fine residences of wood, and the commodious barns and outbuildings impart a most prosperous appearance to the table. Windmills are seen by the score and the water problem no longer troubles the people of the community. The table is fifteen miles long and has an average width of four miles. From its edges, which rise almost abruptly from the valleys below, a magnificent view of the surrounding country can be had. The soil is exceedingly rich and fertile, and in favorable seasons very large crops are raised.

SETTLERS COME TO DALE

J. J. Downey writes as follows concerning Dale settlements:

"About the 10th day of June, 1889, in company with R. D. McCarthy and family and two of his teamsters, we started for our future home in Custer county. We arrived at Seneca, where we found the beginning of a rising young town, it being one and a half miles up Clear creek from the present town of Westerville. We stayed over night at the house of George Copsey, one of the old pioneers of the place. We were now within one day's travel of our destination. We crossed over to the Muddy the next forenoon. We camped for dinner near the present site of Broken Bow. The only settlers we found close by were Wilson Hewitt and Dan Lewis. Mr. Hewitt was the proprietor of a blacksmith shop, which we afterward patronized. That evening we obtained our first view of the Muddy

Flats, as it was called at that time. We paused on the brow of the table and the male portion of the company descended and threw up their hats with a "hurrah," for lo, and behold! there it lay in full view—the promised land. Descending from the table we arrived at the first settler's cabin, which, by the way, was not of sod, but cedar logs, the only one of its kind on the flats as far as I know. There we got some water and a kindly greeting from the proprietor, Sam Dunning. On our way from Dunning's place to our present location we passed the dugout of A. Thomas, a genial young bachelor. There were several other young men staying with him who had not yet erected their future mansions. It was now about sundown and four miles to the end of our journey. At about dusk we arrived at our claims and found there, on land adjoining, William Couhig, who had preceded us by ten days. He had made considerable progress with his work, having put down a well, which proved to be a great convenience. The well was dug by C. R. Krenz, an expert in that line of business, who still resides in Dale valley, and was the father of the first child born in Dale.

"Among the settlers that came in that summer were the following: William Corcoran; Patrick Kilfoil, after whom Kilfoil precinct was named; William Walsh and family; Joseph Sitler, another young bachelor; George

W. Hartley, who was the first settler in Ortello valley; Andy Sommer, Charles Foote, Lenn Thomas, Charles Johnson, and John Jacquot, all of whom built residences out of prairie sod, with some of Uncle Sam's cedar for rafters, which at that time was comparatively plentiful in the canyons from ten to thirty miles west of here. There was no corn raised close by, except a small amount down on Victoria creek, in 1880, and that was held at fifty and sixty cents per bushel, and could be had for no price in the spring. Crops were good in 1881, and those who had ground broken out and raised corn were all right, having plenty for feed and a good home market for the balance, at a price ranging from fifty to seventy-five cents per bushel.

LOHR RUNS SOME STORE

"Several other settlers came during the year 1880 and took up claims, but did not permanently locate here until 1882. J. J. Joyner was the only settler that moved in during 1881, and he located in Ortello valley. In 1882 the following came: Conrad Fleischman, Christopher Nichols, James Daley, James Wood, G. N. Thompson, Charles Fodge, S. H. Reed, James Stanford, G. W. Land, Samuel Trout—all with their families. About this time the Dale postoffice was established, with James Daley as postmaster. Mr. Daley afterward resigned in favor of D. S. Lohr, who went into the general merchandise business at Dale, getting quite a trade from fifty to seventy-five miles west and north of here. In fact it was a typical frontier store. The town of Dale was laid out the previous summer. Dale tried hard for the railroad, but the company could not see it in that way. Dale, however, is admirably located in regard to railroad towns, Merna being five or six miles southeast and Anselmo eight or nine miles northwest.

"The next two or three years the following named settlers moved here: William Moore, Charles Michele, Frank Michele, C. H. Cass, G. D. Grove, C. C. Grove, Henry Sweeney, Dan Foley, A. Glidewell, P. B. Riley, Jason Lucas, A. C. Towle, Henry Barratt, William Brookman, I. A. Coleman, Dr. L. L. Crawford, James Phillips, Thomas Kelley, Joseph Vessels, and R. J. Kelley, the last named being a pioneer merchant—a member of the later firm of Kelley & Duncan, who in 1886 moved to Merna, where he has been in business ever since. Nick Jaquot came about the same time, or perhaps a little before. He is a man of great enterprise, being largely interested in farming, stock-raising, and feeding, also proprietor of one of the Merna elevators, and a hog buyer. C. D. Pelham, the pioneer merchant of Broken Bow, afterward moved to Dale, where he did business for several years, finally moving to Anselmo."

MORE ABOUT LILLIAN

In 1875 James L. Oxford made the first settlement in what is now Lillian township. He built log buildings and established a ranch on the east bank of Lillian creek, near where his frame buildings now stand. His father-in-law, John Henderson, and family, came from

Missouri and settled near him in 1878, until the spring of 1879, when the level and fertile plains became so attractive to those seeking homes that they began to wend their way up the south side of the Middle Loup river. During this season Perry Lyle, J. E. Ash, J. C. Hunter, J. M. Ash, S. Gates, with their families, and David McGuigan, A. C. Ash, and Ervin Ash, old bachelors, settled on the river bottom and J. O. Taylor, Ole Johnson, N. K. Lee, S. K. Lee, John Lee, and Nelson T. Lee, with their families, settled in Round valley. As if by magic the sod houses arose one by one, and dotted the valley and plain in every direction. In the spring of 1880 Jesse Gandy started a ranch at the place afterward known as the Hartley ranch, and the following named settlers, with their families, if they had any, and with good digestive organs, if they were bachelors, made their appearance on the scene of action and became permanent residents, or homesteaders as they were then called to distinguish them from ranchmen: Thomas Lampman, Frank Luse, E. N. Bishop, Frank Doty, Hugh M. Goheen, John Goheen, J. M. Goheen, Austin Goheen, James McGraw, D. O. Luse, Jarvis Kimes, A. W. Squires, O. S. Woodward, Charles Griffiths, J. E. Gwinn, J. N. Peale, A. N. Peale, and Samuel Oxford. The winter of 1880-81 was what has been since known as the "hard winter." To convey some idea of the difficulty of traveling where a track was not broken out, I will endeavor to give a short description of a trip I made one day of but two miles and back, which took me from early morning until after dark. The layers of sleet cut the horses' legs so that instead of wading through the snow they would jump upon it as if climbing on top of ice, which kept breaking and letting them through. In a few minutes they were so exhausted that I had to stop and let them rest. Their legs were cut and bleeding so badly that they left a crimson trail behind them in the snow. To make matters worse, the grass was very short and entirely covered by snow, so that one could not tell what was under the drift ahead. The first thing I knew the horses dropped down into a draw about five feet deep, where they floundered about, unable to get out. I went to work with a scoop shovel I had brought along with me, and by noon had the team out on the level ground. Although it was dinner time and I was somewhat hungry, yet I had no dinner to eat, as I was on my way with a sack each of wheat and corn to be ground in a feed grinder that was owned by one of our neighbors, T. J. Butcher, where I arrived about four o'clock, having had to dig my horses out of draws four times on the way. It took but a few minutes to grind my feed and as I had broken the road on my way over pretty thoroughly, the return trip was made with comparative ease and without incident.

During the winter of 1880-81 S. Gates and the writer circulated a petition for the formation of Lillian precinct, this territory at that time being a part of Victoria precinct, with the voting place at New Helena. As some of the citizens had to go twenty-four miles to vote, the county commissioners readily granted our request and established Lillian precinct, with nearly the same territory as the present township of Lillian embraces. From this time forth, public improvements were made as fast as the financial condition of the county would permit. Among these were three bridges across the Middle Loup river on the northern boundary of Lillian precinct.

On February 16, 1880, Eri postoffice was established at the residence of J. E. Ash, with his wife, Alice Ash, as postmistress. It was named Eri, after Mr. Ash's brother, and was located on section 14, township 19, range 20. It was on the route to New Helena, and connected with the Kearney and New Helena mail at the latter point. The mail was carried twice a week, by way of Westerville and Round Valley, the latter office being established some time in 1880. Mrs. Ash resigned in favor of Frank Doty and recommended the removal of the office to his residence, three miles distant, which appeared to meet the approval of the authorities at Washington. The office was removed and remained there until it was discontinued, when the Walworth postoffice was removed to the bridge, by W. H. Predmore, 1885. Mr. Gates sent in a petition for the establishment of Gates postoffice, with himself as postmaster, which was granted, and the first mail was delivered there July 4, 1884. Soon after this Mr. Gates put in a small stock of groceries, added hardware and dry goods, and in 1886 he built a good frame store building. For several years, during the prosperous seasons, he kept a good store and did quite an extensive business. But in 1893 it had all evaporated except the postoffice. But like everything else in this western country, it could not be stopped entirely. Another small store was started by Joseph Beckwith, the new postmaster, who in about two years sold out to S. M. Hinkle. Mr. Hinkle kept the store and postoffice about a year and then sold out to Peter Fackley. When the railroad was built to Ord, the mail route was changed, and came from there to New Helena instead of from Loup City, and ran tri-weekly until the B. & M. Railroad was built through Anselmo, when the route was changed and ran from Anselmo to Sargent, daily, via New Helena, Lillian, Gates, Walworth, and West Union, giving to all this section, as at present, a mail service that it may well be proud of, especially since the railroad was completed to Sargent.

DOWN ON THE REDFERN TABLE

For the following statement of the settlement in Redfern Table we cull from the writing of James Whitehead.

Up to 1880 cattle men had undisputed possession of thousands of acres of land that in the three years following its occupancy yielded an average of twenty bushels of wheat per acre. But the settler came, and he came to stay. Many were veterans of the Civil war, in the prime of vigorous manhood, and held life as cheap and could shoot as straight as the dare-devil cowboy, and not unfrequently "got the drop" on those who had heretofore boasted of having things pretty much their own way. Thus, in part, the problem of settlement had become adjusted and the way made easy for those who in 1883 and 1884 were pioneers in the settlement of the southwestern part of Custer county.

The way of approach in those days was from Kearney along the Wood river valley to its confluence with the South Loup, at a point near the present site of Callaway. Further west were Plum creek and Cozad, points on the line of the Union Pacific,—the former about thirty miles from the south line of Custer, the latter fifteen miles nearer. At this point there was a gently undulating tract of country then known far and near as "Buffalo Table," located in townships 13 and 14, ranges 22 and 23, being within the twenty-mile limit. Every odd-numbered section of this entire table land was included in the grant of the Union Pacific. Inviting as it was, with its deep, rich soil, none of its lands were appropriated until the latter part of 1883. The first entry made in this locality was by no less a personage than Patrick Egan, of Lincoln. It was on section 34, township 14, range 23. No breaking being done the first year, by contest it passed into the hands of Ernest Schneider. The first homestead entries were made by Harvey Stockham and Otto Jaster, November 14, 1883, and by Charles B. Drum, December 13th, which comprised all entries made during that year. February 11, 1884, James Whitehead made homestead entry for lands adjoining Charles Drum, and with the opening of spring, Ernest Schneider, John Helmuth, Charles W. Redfern and his son Frank, with Henry, Chris, and John Miller, appeared upon the scene, selected and settled upon their lands and immediately begun improvements.

PLENTY OF ROOM IN A SMALL HOUSE

It was the purpose of the writer to secure by purchase a half-section of railroad land adjoining or as near as possible to his homestead; this he supposed he had done, but on reaching his home in Wisconsin he was apprised by Hon. J. H. MacColl, of Plum Creek, agent for the railroad company, that the lands selected by him had passed into other hands. This necessitated his immediate return to Nebraska. Accompanied by J. A. Mahaffy and George Healy, we reached Plum Creek about the 10th of March. The morning following our arrival we started for the table-

lands accompanied by Mr. Huey, surveyor of Dawson county. It was after night when we reached the divide. The weather, which had been warm, had turned cold and snow began to fall. It had been our intention to pass the night upon the prairie and we had come prepared, bringing robes and blankets and a supply of provisions to last us several days. The increasing cold and falling snow, which Mr. Huey, who was an "old timer," assured us might develop into a regular blizzard, made the outlook anything but encouraging. After traveling some distance in the darkness we saw a glimmering light and heard the barking of a dog; this led us to the claim of Ernest Schneider. Though he had arrived but a day or two before, he had a frame dwelling partly erected, which, with his own and other families, and belated travelers like ourselves, seemed full to overflowing; notwithstanding this we received a hearty welcome. The building was but partly roofed and through the night the snow descended upon those who stretched themselves upon the floor and sought rest and forgetfulness of discomforts in sleep. Beneath a pile of blankets, in one corner of the room that was better protected from the storm, lay the sick wife of our host. She never recovered, but died shortly afterward and was buried nearby,—the first death and burial that marked the early settlement of that vicinity. In addition to those I have named, William Greenfield, Joe Malson, Ezra Wright, R. E. Williams, J. W. Bissell, John Matz, William Gibson, Chris Helmuth, the Wysharts, were pioneer settlers of the table or its environments, followed in time by John McGuigan and the Armours, also Joe Gilmore, A. P. Cox, Oliver Whitehead, Willis Hines, the Langes, David and William Bain, John Runcie, and John Berwick. The all-absorbing question that presented itself to every settler was water, and how it might be obtained. Away to the east in Wood river valley, Van Antwerp and Thurman had wells, but they were from six to ten miles distant; there were none nearer and the combined means of all was not sufficient to put one down. To meet this exigency cisterns were dug on the edge of draws or bordering lagoons, the supply depending upon the rainfall and their ability to secure and conserve it. All that was met, endured, and overcome, the difficulties and obstacles to success in the way of those early settlers will never be known or written. Water there was in abundance,—the best, purest, and most wholesome that could slake the thirst and gladden the heart of man or beast, but it was from four to five hundred feet below the surface and the means of securing it an unsolved problem.

AN ACCOMMODATING ENGLISHMAN

Among those who had come into this locality were two men, Mr. Edward Crewdson, a wealthy Englishman who had purchased three section of railroad land and was engaged in stock-raising, and Mr. Gregory J. Campau, of Detroit, who had purchased a large tract of land and was also a man of considerable means. These men put down hydraulic wells and secured a never-failing and abundant supply of water to which the settlers had free access. The last-named even put down a large cistern into which a stream of water was pumped continuously for the use and accommodation of those who had no other means of securing the life-giving beverage. On several occasions Mr. Crewdson deprived his cattle of the water they craved, in order that the wants of his neighbors might be satisfied. These men have passed away; but monuments have been raised to perpetuate the deeds and memory of many whose claims to remembrance were not so well founded. But their names are cherished and their unselfish generosity remembered by those whose gratitude could alone compensate for their kindness.

TOO MANY ROOSTERS FOR REAM AND JEFFORDS

The first settlers in the vicinity northwest of Broken Bow were J. D. Ream and C. H. Jeffords. J. D. Ream settled in the neighborhood now known as Custer Center, in the spring of 1880. To show the innocence of those two unsophisticated bachelors, who had only just enough farm education to be able to drive a yoke of oxen hitched to a farm wagon, which contained all of their possessions, the old settlers tell this story at their expense:

As they began to leave the settlements on their journey west into the wilderness, they thought it would be a fine thing to have fresh eggs during the summer, in their new home, and in order to be able to enjoy this luxury they struck a bargain with a thrifty housewife for a dozen fine young chickens, the flock being shortly afterward increased by the addition of six hens which they got at an astonishing bargain from another housewife along the way. When they arrived near the present site of the city of Broken Bow they camped with Wilson Hewitt, and as that kind and accommodating pioneer invited the wayfarers to make their headquarters there until they got their claims located, they turned their chickens loose, inviting Mrs. Hewitt out to inspect the flock. Mrs. Hewitt looked them over with the eye of an experienced housewife and then fell into such a fit of laughter that the boys thought she had gone crazy. When she recovered her composure she informed the young poultry fanciers that their flock consisted of eleven young roosters, one pullet, and six old hens that had probably come over in Noah's ark and that had long since passed the period of their usefulness as layers of eggs. The boys were of course very much crestfallen as their visions of fresh eggs were thus suddenly dashed to the ground, and also very indignant at the unfair advantage that had been taken of their ignorance by the women who had sold them the chickens. They promptly made Mrs. Hewitt a present of the whole flock and did not again attempt to embark in the poultry business until after they were married.

The next settler to locate in the vicinity was H. C. Reyner, with his wife and one child. He also imported two mules and one cow, and from the latter Mrs. Reyner supplied the whole settlement with butter during the following summer, churning it in a half-gallon crock. The baby, Paul, grew to manhood and served as a soldier in the First Nebraska Regiment in the Philippine Islands. These settlers celebrated the Fourth of July, 1880, in a canyon south of the table-land which lies east of Merna, together with a number of others from the vicinity of Broken Bow, among whom were Wilson Hewitt, C. D. Pelham, Moses Lewis, and others, with their families.

Mr. Jeffords located just east of what is known in Broken Bow as the West Table, in a section of country known at that time as South Muddy Flat. Among the next settlers in the vicinity were R. M. Longfellow and Sebastian Neth, the latter widely known for his energy and business capacity, having served the people ably several times as a member of the county board of supervisors. The neighborhood was also favored in the acquisition of a couple of school teachers from Ohio, named Mary E. and Agnes A. Price, but they soon ended their career as school teachers and formed partnerships with two bachelors, Jeffords and Brown, and the result of these partnerships is a number of young bug-eaters who will probably figure in Custer county history long after their parents are forgotten.

SETTLEMENT OF GEORGETOWN

In June, 1872, W. A. George, then a boy of eleven summers, with his father, mother, brother, and four sisters, bade adieu to his New England home and friends near the old witch town of Salem, Massachusetts, and started westward by rail. Their destination was Nebraska. The boys, of course, had to shrink considerably in size and age whenever the conductor came around, in order that they might get through on half-fare tickets, but it may be remarked right here that they took full rations whenever the grub basket was passed around. At Omaha they saw their first Indians, robed in their red blankets, as they sold their trinkets alongside the train and through the car windows. They arrived at Gibbon, their destination, tired and hungry, and being turned loose on a box of sweet crackers, W. A. George ate so many of them that he has never had an appetite for that form of bread since. Gibbon was at that time an ideal western town, being the county seat of Buffalo county and surrounded by as fine land for homesteaders as the most exacting could wish. The sound of the hammer was heard from early morning until late at night. Many people were living in box cars and tents until they could erect something to call a home.

W. A. George made his first trip to Custer county in 1875. They had some horses stolen and his father thought he had a clue to their whereabouts. He and his son started to hunt them up. They traveled about fifteen miles to the north the first day and stayed all night with a settler whom the father hired to go with them the next day as a guide. They struck the South Loup river about where Pleasanton now stands. From there they worked up the river for several miles, seeing but a cowboy with a fine deer strung across his saddle, and a little further along they met another cowboy, who was carrying a saddle over his shoulder. He said that his horse had broken its leg and that he had to kill it and walk into camp.

HELP YOURSELF

In a short time they came to a lone dugout, but no one was at home. On the door was a card which read "help yourself but for God's sake shut the door." The "shut the door" part was in a good deal bigger letters than the rest of the sentence. They had not yet been educated to the point of walking into a man's house and helping themselves to whatever they might find, so they passed the invitation up. They did, however, dig some potatoes, which came in very handy at the camp-fire that night.

The next trip W. A. George made into Custer county was in 1878, when he came to visit a sister living near where Berwyn now stands. He made the trip on horseback and was so pleased with the conditions in the county that he made a resolve to locate permanently. Accordingly, he became a Custer county citizen some years later. In 1901 he wrote an account of his early experiences, mentioning some of his neighbors who were among the early-day landmarks, and from his writings of that day we gather the following:

In 1887 W. A. George returned to Custer county and located permanently. He leased land of his uncle, H. W. George, and launched into the stock and farming business very extensively. Later he was able to buy the land and also additional territory, until at one time he owned 1550 acres of good deeded land and held a lease on 640 acres more of school land, all on the South Loup river.

The next year he bought out the small store at Georgetown, then operated by a firm named Sterk & Means, and for the next five years George ran the store as a side proposition while still improving and developing his ranch. The ranch kept growing, quarter-section after quarter-section was added until when Mr. George sold the place he had in all nearly 5,000 acres, on which were more than forty miles of fence with all kinds of barns, sheds, and outbuildings which go to make up good farm equipment.

"GETTING IN BAD"

It was in May, 1882, after the first pioneers had made a dim, shadowy trail over the border into Custer county.

John M. Morrison and J. D. Strong left the main road leading from Kearney to this upper country at a point in Buffalo county, in Pleasant valley, and went north through the hills, following a very dim trail which persisted in growing dimmer, and which, as darkness came on, disappeared altogether. Their hope was to reach McEndeffer's, on the Muddy, that night, so they pressed on, over high hills and down long, winding canyons, one of them walking in front of the team to figure out the trail, and the other driving as directed by the guide.

A more gloomy and desolate prospect could hardly be imagined than that presented to them as the shades of night began to come down over the brown prairie, tumbled and piled about in the most haphazard manner,—high hills, long and terraced ridges, each line seeming higher than the other,—two "tenderfeet" alone amidst all this waste, was enough to make them wish they were back in civilization again.

After some hours—or ages, they could hardly tell which—they began to see cattle and horses on the range, which gave them hope. They soon struck a broader trail, made by the stock, leading to the ranch, and had less difficulty in keeping the way. After a time they saw, just ahead of them in the darkness, something that they took for a post, and, believing they had come to a fence, Strong walked up to it and felt on both sides for the wires, but finding none, he put his hand on top of the supposed post and discovered to his consternation that it was a stovepipe, and still warm.

By the time his investigations had resulted in this warm discovery, Morrison had driven the team up quite close to him and demanded a reason for his stop. He explained the nature of his find, and suggested a careful backing up of the team for fear of a tumble through the roof, which would be likely to disturb the sleepers below. He had seen enough of "dug-outs" to know that they had discovered one, but just how to get inside they did not yet know. After getting the team out of all possible danger, Strong started on a voyage of discovery. The problem of the lay of the dugout was soon solved to the satisfaction of all concerned. Of course it was dug out of a bank, but just where the bank ended and the house united with it he could not make out in the darkness; but he soon discovered that there was a space of about four feet between the end of the dugout—which had a wall of logs at the end—and the bank which sloped towards the house. The way he discovered this opening was by the happy one of falling into it; the way he gained admittance into the house was by rolling down the sloping bank and in at the window, and the way he aroused the household was by alighting on a promiscuous collection of tinware, which made noise enough to stampede a bunch of plow horses.

From the time he had started across the hills with the intention of asking the hospitality of Mr. McEndeffer's roof and board for the night, it had been with misgivings, if not with fear, as it will be remembered that he had been in some measure connected with the Olives in their fight with Mitchell and Ketchum. He was a cattleman, and his interests were not enhanced by the settlers. What were Strong's feelings to find himself precipitated in that fashion into the house and finding himself clawing and kicking around among the dish pans and milk pails, while a gruff voice was demanding: "Who's there?" "Get out!" "Scat!" "Get a light!" "Get the gun!" and like exclamatory remarks, interspersed with more or less profanity and a chorus chiming in from other members of the family?

Had a team fallen through the roof it would have raised no greater row than did Strong's plunge through the window. But he finally extricated himself from the tinware, kettles, and frying pans, and beat a hasty retreat under cover of the darkness and the excitement of the enemy out through the window and around to the door, where he gave a loud rap, more in accord with civilized ways. When a light was procured and explanations made, and an inventory taken of the kitchen utensils to find what actual damage was done, they were made welcome, and as the ceremony of "breaking the ice" was not necessary after breaking his head and a milk crock, McEndeffer's cob pipe, and several other articles of less importance, they were soon comfortable and quite at home.

CUSTER COUNTY PIONEER HONORED

The next morning Strong and Morrison started for Merna, and at noon of that day they stood upon a hill that overlooked the beautiful valley that was to be their future home. Merna at that time consisted of one small sod house, with an annex of one room. The sod house was filled with sundry articles of merchandise, such as tobacco, soap, codfish, buttons, and thread. A cubby-hole in the wall served as the postoffice, which was kept by W. G. Brotherton. The annex was occupied by Mr. Brotherton and his wife as a living room, and was presided over by Lizzie, whose chief business seemed to be looking after the wants of new arrivals and making them comfortable and happy.

One-half mile north of Brotherton's store, and the site of the future lively little railroad town of Merna, they struck their tent on claims previously bought of Samuel N. Dunning and Floyd Field. Mr. Dunning had located farther north, on the Dismal river, going into the cattle business. When the B. & M. Railroad was extended through the Black Hills, a town was located near his home and given the name of Dunning, which perpetuates the name of one of Custer county's pioneers. Floyd Field also located on the Dismal river, or on the Loup, and from a modest beginning in the cattle industry, he and his brother, Fred, have grown into two of the wealthiest ranch owners in this part of the state. The post-office of Merna was first kept by Mr. Dunning and the name of Merna was that of his youngest daughter. After the railroad had been built, and the town finally and for all time located by the Lincoln Townsite Company, it was quite natural that the infantile city, struggling for life and metropolitan honors, should be given the name of the original post-office, so that Merna became a fixed geographical landmark.

PELHAM STRETCHES THE QUILT

The next day the journey of Mr. Strong and Mr. Morrison was uneventful, and they put up for the night with C. D. Pelham, at or near where the present city of Broken Bow stands. Pelham kept the postoffice and a small stock of groceries, and the first hotel in Broken Bow. They had often seen the puzzle of the innkeeper who could put thirteen men in twelve rooms, but Pelham could discount any such Cheap-John mathematical problem as that. He could easily stow away thirteen men in one small room. It is related of him on good authority that he had a most ingenious way of making six blankets suffice for a dozen or more guests. When late arrivals were ready to retire they were tucked snugly away under a blanket that was deftly removed from some guest who had gone to bed earlier, and who, being fast asleep, would never know the difference. Of course if the weather was very cold the uncovered sleepers were liable to wake up after a time and make a roar, but before this stage was reached the other fellow was sound asleep and the covering was restored to the original sleeper. By shifting the covering judiciously and systematically during the night, Pelham always succeeded in keeping all of his guests as warm as a pie in the coldest winter weather, although in cases of a rush of business every one of them would be uncovered two-thirds or three-quarters of the time.

A FLOCK OF BACHELORS

Standing at Brotherton's store in May, 1882, and looking out over the valley spreading to the west and north, one could see a few marks that indicated the beginning of a small settlement. A group of "old bachelors" off to the northwest were holding various claims in various parts of the valley, but were mostly "batching" together in Al Thomas' dugout, where they discussed the future greatness of the country, and studied the faces of the four queens they usually held in their hands, while they mentally cogitated upon an improbable consignment of femininity to be shipped out to supply wives for this miscellaneous assortment of masculinity.

It is only justice to these men who cut such a sorry figure at stag housekeeping, to say that they were all men of liberal education and refined tastes, and to leave behind them the influence of eastern homes and the society of women were the worst hardships they had to endure in the wild west. Most of them in time found good wives, who have helped them to make comfortable and happy homes. In this bachelor dive were Al Thomas, Joe Sitler, A. Sommers, John Jacquot, Len Thomas, Charles Thomas, Scott, Hanna, McWorthy, and others whose names are not now recalled.

At this time had one looked inside all of the houses within a radius of five miles from Brotherton's store, he would have found but three women within the entire circle — Mrs. C. P. Foote, Mrs. Brotherton, and Mrs. Dunning. What they lacked in quantity, however, they made up in quality, for no new settlement was ever blest with better women to mother the community than this trinity of maternal excellence. They have all gone on before to another country, but the blessings of all early settlers in this vicinity will follow them.

GIBBONITES ON THE LOUP

[This volume is indebted to Miss Marguerite George, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Nc

George, for this account of the settlement on the East South Loup.]

In the spring of 1875 many settlers left their homes at Gibbon, Nebraska, on account of the grasshoppers. Among the first to leave was Nc George and family. They took a little band of cattle and a lumber-wagon load of household goods and started for the Loup. Will Trew and Nc's sister Cora (the late Mrs. A. L. Morgan) helped to drive the cattle. They were three days on the road, making the journey without any unusual event except a little trouble with one old cow. The men left Mrs. George in the wagon with her baby, seven months old, and went ahead to help Cora drive the cow. They were gone so long that Mrs. George became greatly worried, thinking that they had been made way with by desperate characters, perhaps. She made up her mind what she would do if they did not return soon. She climbed down from the wagon and went to the top of the hill to see if she could see anybody, and when she looked back to her team they had turned around and were headed towards Gibbon. Not daring to set her baby down she held him in her arms and ran as fast as she could to the team; managing to reach one of the traces, she finally got to the bridle and stopped them. In a little while the men returned and the journey was resumed without further mishap. They reached their destination on Deer creek May 21, 1875. There was not another settler in that vast expanse of prairie. Only a few transit cattlemen, with their small camps here and there, were their companions.

FIND AN OLD DUGOUT

An old hunter's dugout was found in the bank along Deer creek and this became the home of the new settlers until another dugout, with more room in it, could be made. The cattle were allowed to roam at will, grazing on the prairie but staying near the water.

The country abounded in deer, elk, and other wild game. The men spent a great deal of their time in hunting and trapping. Often trappers spent much time in this locality and when they had secured a good supply of skins they would come to Plum Creek, now Lexington, where they received a good price for them.

TWIN FAWNS AT THE CENTENNIAL

One day when Mr. George was out hunting he found two little fawns hidden in the cat-steps, while their mother was away feeding. He took them home and made pets of them. They were about a week old, he thought. They were red in color, like a calf, with white spots on their sides but were not as large as a calf. They lay in the brush until called to their lunch, when they would come bounding towards the house like two rabbits. They drank milk from a pail, sticking their noses clear to the bottom of the pail, even if the milk covered their eyes. Mr. George kept them until they were a year old, when he sold them to the Fairmont Park Association, Philadelphia, receiving fifty dollars for the two. They were one of the unique attractions at the Centennial exposition at Philadelphia, in 1876.

In the spring of 1877 a fierce storm came up which developed into a cloud-burst. The rain fell only twenty minutes but in that time, the level prairie was covered with water. A hole as big as a stove pipe was washed in the roof of the dugout where Mr. George lived, and the water swept in in torrents. Luckily the door was directly opposite the opening and the water had a straight course through the house. After this the dugout was abandoned and a small log-house built. Later Mr. George moved this house two miles further down the river to the place where he now resides. An election was held in 1878 in which this log cabin was used as a polling place. Josh

WOULD NOT STAND FOR THE NAME

A mail route from Plum Creek to Loup City passed near the George homestead. Ne George applied for the appointment of postmaster but the officials demanded his full name and could not understand his explanation of a name consisting of two consonants so Ne failed to be appointed. Mr. Kilgore received the appointment and the postoffice was called Georgetown.

In the meantime many settlers had come to the Loup. Most of them lived in hunters' dugouts. Those arriving during the years 1875 and 1876 were John E. Myers, John Mahon, and Christopher Hazelbaker.

A TYPICAL DUGOUT

THE HAUMONTS

Belgium gave Custer county a contribution in the early '70s when Ed. and Jules Haumont settled in the county and located claims northeast of Broken Bow. During the first winter they endured many hardships, but managed to look after a small flock of sheep.

One of the unique achievements was the building of a two-story sod house with shingle roof, sod kitchen annex, and round-tower corners. This was the most aristocratic building ever constructed of prairie marble in the county. Edward Haumont is now deceased. His widow still lives on the place and is very resourceful in reminiscences of early days.

WHERE BROKEN BOW NOW STANDS

The first settlers on the Muddy in the vicinity of where Broken Bow now stands were Wilson Hewitt, who had moved up from the South Loup country, and Dan Lewis, who came with a wife and two children. Mrs. Lewis' step-father, Henry Graham, came at the same time with Lewis. Lewis found a bachelor named Jesse Garringer holding by squatter's right a claim on which he had a dugout. Lewis bought the right and settled in the dugout. This place is now the Willis farm, just west of town. Graham filed on the Cornelius Tierney place, east of the present town. Later C. D. Pelham, Moses Lewis, Ed and Mark King moved in. Mrs. Dan Lewis, who is now Mrs. Tuttle, had her experience in the dugout. It was a common experience for her to go out at night and wave a sheet to scare the cattle away. Her second daughter, Ida Lewis, born June 14, 1881, was the first child born in Broken Bow or vicinity.

Mrs. Eliza Graham, the mother of Mrs. Lewis and wife of Henry Graham, died August 10, 1880, and was buried down on the Tierney place. This was the first death in this part of the county.

EARLY DAYS — HARD TIMES

[The following paper, read by Mrs. Alice Dowse Sims at the old settlers' picnic in Broken Bow, 1903, contains enough of historical value to entitle it to a place in this chapter. While some statements are duplicated on other pages, the article, nevertheless, presents the viewpoint of the first white person born in Custer county and one who was reared to womanhood amid the scenes and in the times she describes.]

Much of what I have written for to-day is sketches of life among the early settlers of this county, which have not found their way in the published history of this county. Also what I have written is from direct dictations from some of these old settlers. Therefore they will vouch for its veracity.

Thirty years ago, in the summer of 1873, my parents, Lewis and Sarah Dowse, with two little babies — Willis and Eliza — came to Loup City. There they made their acquaintance with Mr. and Mrs. B. D. Allen. My mother stopped there while my father and Grandpa Wagner came on up into the Middle Loup valley in August, 1873. My father picked out his land and went back after his tools. He came back and put up hay during September and October. He left his tools and things and returned for his family, but had to make two trips to Grand Island for provisions before he brought his family up.

To his knowledge there was only one claim taken in all Custer county, and that was what is known as Douglas Grove, taken by Ed Douglas, an old soldier. Next Mr. Ohmes picked out his land and sent men up to begin building. In January, 1874, my parents moved from Loup City to Douglas Grove. Father came first with a load. In those days the Middle Loup had no bridges above the one they had just erected at Loup City. By the time he reached the banks of the river on the opposite side of the Grove it was very dark. He was uncertain as to the safety of the ice for crossing his team, so he unhitched and left it there. He then crawled across to Douglas Grove on his hands and knees. Mr. Douglas had not moved up on his claim yet, but a man by the name of Henry Snell had arranged a kind of a dugout, a little above the Grove, the way of entrance being a small hole at the top to slide down through. It was nicely arranged, so as not to be easily discovered by Indians — my father thought by white people as well, before he was able to find it. He beat up and down the river, yelling and hallooing to awaken Mr. Snell, but the resounding of his echo was the only response. Finally he gave it up, came back to the Grove, built a rousing fire to keep away any wild animals that might be lurking about, and rested as best he could till morning.

He returned immediately for mother and the children. From oft repeated stories I have formed a little picture. I see my mother, then only twenty years old, glance over that lonely valley and note the wild herds of deer and elk grazing on the hillside or roving up and down the valley. I see her survey that insignificant little dugout, and imagine her heart beats wildly as she clasps those little ones close to her bosom, praying that God would protect them in that wild and lonely place. She has often told me of the lonely hours and days she spent in that solitary hut, during the greater part of the next four months. Day after day she was alone with the babies and her little sister, Clara.

In the month of February my father had gone to Loup City after a load, leaving his family in the care of Henry Snell. The evening they expected him home, supper was prepared and waiting. It was a very dark night and little Willie was fretful and began crying. Clara tried to think of something to say to keep him still. Jokingly, she said,

"There's some Indians at the door; let's go and see them." At this the little fellow hushed and started with Clara to see the Indians. A small door to this little dugout had been made since the arrival of the family. As Clara and the baby slipped outside, there stood four large Indians right in front of them. Poor, frightened Clara darted back into the dugout, leaving the baby to entertain the Indians as best he could. They pushed their way into the room. The scent of the cooking supper had guided them to the dugout. Mr. Snell was sitting reading. They demanded supper, by grunts and motions. Mother seated them at the little table and placed before them all the victuals she had prepared. While they were filling themselves my father arrived. Mother had on the stove a very large tea-kettle, full of boiling water. When they had drunk all the coffee in a large coffee pot, they grunted for more. Father kept filling the coffee pot, from the kettle of boiling water and pouring it in the large coffee cups, until the water in the tea-kettle was exhausted, then they seemed satisfied. They were not hostile Indians, however, but were some poor Pawnees whose ponies had been stolen by the Sioux Indians up on the North Loup river. After they had eaten all they could get they wanted to pile down on the floor and go to sleep, but father would not let them.

Mr. Connell was then living in the Grove in Ed Douglas' house. Henry Snell took the Indians down and left them with Mr. Connell. Before they would leave him the next morning, they grunted and motioned for him to take them through the settlement down by Loup City. So he wrote a pass and gave them. The papers stated that they obtained fourteen square meals by presenting that pass, which read as follows: "These are four good Pawnees. Grease them and let them slide."

The following March, 1874, Grandpa Wagner came up again, accompanied by Mr. Will Comstock, Mr. Caswell, and Mr. Allen. They selected their land and returned for their families. (Mr. Comstock filed on his claim April 15, 1874.) A few days later Denio, Eubank, and Darnell come up, looked at land, and then they returned east for their families. About the latter part of April Grandpa Wagner, with Mr. and Mrs. Allen and their little baby, Jennie, came up and father boated them across the river. Then father hitched his team to the wagon and they all went just a short distance above the present site of Westcott, and began making garden. Grandpa Wagner said while they were making garden he would go and find something for dinner. He took his gun and strolled off across the hills. Shortly he returned with a piece of antelope, built a fire and soon had a roast prepared for dinner. Mr. and Mrs. Allen went back and soon returned in time to tend to their garden, stopping with my parents at the time. In a few days Grandpa Wagner brought his family up. Father's little slab house couldn't hold them all, so Mr. and Mrs. Allen moved in with Ed Douglas for a few weeks.

Soon following came other men with their families — Mr. Ed Eubank, Darnell, and Oxforde. About the last of May, Mr. Allen and his family moved from the Grove into their new house, which was just one-quarter of a mile north of Captain Comstock's present dwelling place. Immediately Mr. Comstock and wife came, and they stopped with Mr. Allen till their little dugout was completed. Later other families came, but moved east again on account of the Indian scares.

No new story is so fascinating as are the oft-repeated stories of the early events as given to me by these old settlers. Mrs. Allen says she thought then, and she believes to this day, that the best bread she ever ate in her life time was made out of wheat ground in my mother's coffee mill. She verily declares she would gladly exchange her present luxuries for the happy days she spent in those little dugouts, with her neighbors — Mrs. Wagner, Mrs. Comstock, and Mrs. Dowse. One sweet little story is connected with Mrs. Allen's little Number 7 cook stove. Grandma Wagner's and Mrs. Comstock's stoves had no ovens to them, and they would carry their bread to Mrs. Allen's little Number 7 to bake it. "And," says Mrs. Allen, "many a nice loaf of bread did that little stove bake. I would look out the door and see Mrs. Wagner and Mrs. Comstock both coming, carrying their bread — then I'd think: 'Well, Mrs. Comstock will have to bake her's first, for she makes salt-rising, then Mrs. Wagner's turn.' And such a nice time we had." Mr. Comstock declares yet that the best biscuit he ever ate were baked on top of their little stove, and he still likes them best baked that way.

Mr. Darnell and Grandpa Wagner ever kept broken the monotony of life, by their quaint lives among their old neighbors. Mr. Darnell spent most of his time killing snipe and catching fish, and, says Mr. Comstock, "When the snipe all left, and the fish wouldn't bite, Mr. Darnell left too." He also said he was going to start a town while he was here. He sent his neighbors up the river to cut cedar trees and float them down the river. They tried it but the trees wouldn't float; therefore Mr. Darnell's town never got started. And the old neighbors all still express their deeply felt gratitude to Grandpa Wagner for his abundant supply of deer, elk, and antelope, which kept many families from starving. Mr. Comstock tells of once when they crept up on four deer; of course the deer ran as soon as they saw them, but by Mr. Comstock handing him cartridges, Grandpa shot them before they were out of range. He never missed his game when it was in range of his old rifle, and his marksmanship was still remembered long after the large game had left the country. About the latter part of August, 1874, the sun began to darken, and within a few days the air and every nook and corner were alive with grasshoppers. Most of the settlers had some kind of crops nicely started, and fair prospects, by close management, of raising enough to carry them through till the next summer. But now, what could those poor families, who had toiled so hard through the summer months, do to save their small crops, which were all they possessed? Must they stand, as it were, and see the food taken from the mouths of their little ones? My father thought he would save a little corn by shocking it up, but as soon as he would complete a shock it was covered with millions of grasshoppers. And thus everything was almost entirely annihilated.

February 22, 1875, I was born, and as far as we know I was the first white child born in Custer county. The following summer was a little more prosperous. The small crops that were put in grew nicely and unmolested. 1876 brought again those dark and gloomy days. Innumerable millions and millions of grasshoppers came. The hardships and privations of the previous years of drought in Custer county would have seemed luxurious and plentiful to those poor settlers during the following winter of 1876. Dear mothers and fathers who have come to Custer county in later years, feeling discontented because your children have not the luxuries and accommodations of life that you desire they should, let me lead your minds back to Custer county's earlier days, and that gloomy winter of 1876. Drifts and drifts of snow blocked the roads between our little settlement and Loup City. I should have mentioned before that Loup City consisted of a few small families living close together, and one little store in a little sod building. No provisions could be obtained short of there and Grand Island.

When I hear my mother tell of the cold winter nights that she placed the little ones in bed crying for something to eat, (she had nothing in the house to give them, and her only consoling words were that papa would come soon with something to eat) it makes me feel that we are very ungrateful for the blessings that we enjoy at the present time.

ONE OF THE OLD SETTLERS

Before the buffalo was the coyote; before the Indian was the coyote; before the white hunter and the trapper was the coyote; before the cattlemen was the coyote; before the settlers was the coyote; before the yellow-haired scrub cur of former and latter days was the coyote; before the deer-hound, foxhound, greyhound, Russian wolf-hound, was the coyote. When the coyote first settled in the county, records fail to disclose. He was here before the first and hangs to his location with a tenacity that prophesies he will be the last. If he has been credited with priority, he deserves it. He is fleet-footed enough to maintain his advance position when pursued by fastest horse or hounds. Consequently it is perfectly proper to describe him as being "before" all the rank and file of his enemies. He has been the object of every pursuit—the phantom of every chase. He is the fastest member of Custer county society and has but little difficulty in maintaining his lead, no matter what is after him. Velvet-footed, willowy-formed, Gibson-necked, keen-scented, he comes and goes without advance agent or press comment by the society editor. No matter where he goes or how he goes, he carries an appetite for chicken that outrivals the combination of a colored Methodist preacher. His habits have gotten him into ill-repute with the sheepmen and cattlemen. His fondness for lamb for Sunday dinner is in a measure offset by his fondness for small pigs during the week. He has always possessed a latent propensity that entitles him to be called a "sport." If there is a circle hunt staged in any portion of the county, he is sure to be there and likely to be one of the leaders.

Whether he deserves it or not, the versatile

quill of George B. Mair pays him the following tribute and prophesies his "nunc dimittis." It is far easier to subscribe to the Mair description and tribute than to swallow his prophesy and hopefully await its fulfillment. Mair says:

"The coyote is quite a large animal, although some of them are not so much so. They do most of their rustling nights, when honest folks are supposed to be in bed, and attend to their sleeping in the daytime. Once in a while he stays out until after daylight. On such occasions he may be seen making a sneak across the prairie in the direction of his hole, with his tail between his hind legs, looking about to see if he has been discovered, and trying to invent some story to tell his wife when he gets home.

"What he lacks in beauty is more than made up in ugliness. The knowledge that he is no beauty has undoubtedly soured his originally sunny disposition and caused him to shun society and look out of the corners of his eyes.

"The crowning glory of the coyote is his magnificent voice. We have heard the roar of the fierce Numidian lion in his den at Forepaugh's circus and the melodious ya-hoo of the jackass, but we never realized the weird and sublime power of music until we attended a moonlight rehearsal given by a pack of coyotes the first night we struck Custer county.

"But civilization and poisoned meat are getting in their deadly work for him. Some day the last gray-headed patriarch will sit on the brow of yon beetling cliff, with his form silhouetted against the rising moon, and then he will be seen no more. And a weatherbeaten pelt hanging on the end of an old corn crib will be the only remaining relic of a vanished race."

The sum total of all history is the recital of events just as they occurred, by those who were actors in the scenes, and had a chance to see and hear. First hand, or personal, knowledge is the authority of final appeal. Thousands of things happen in every country that by the very nature of conditions could not be recorded, in accessible files. If these things are ever unearthed and published the old settlers must recite them. Matters of personal experience, hand to hand struggles with early conditions, incidents both humorous and tragic, views of private life, and countless other things, told by the old settlers, have been collected and grouped in this chapter.

Each story is complete in itself and has no relation to any other in the chapter. In each case the truth is vouched for by the one to whom the story is credited. In the aggregate they cover the entire range of county history and will give to any reader a realistic view of the conditions which have prevailed in the county during the developing years. Read the stories of the settlers and you will see the settlers, their homes, their farms, their schools, their churches, their difficulties, their defeats and triumphs, and with all you run the gamut of the years through which they have passed. The humorous vein which runs through the entire collection is a fine tribute to the heroic actors, who cultivated the spirit of cheerfulness under the most trying circumstances.

ENTERTAINS BOB OLIVE

[C. R. Mathews gives the following account of a visit paid him by Bob Olive and some of his cowboys. The judge was at home to his visitors and furnished plenty of corn and hay while the neighbors furnished plenty of camphor, as the narrative discloses.]

I had been contemplating a trip to Douglas

Grove late in November, and had gathered ten or twelve bushels of corn to leave at the house to feed my stock while I was gone. It was in sacks in a wagon, and I intended to start the next morning. That evening Bob Olive, alias Stevens, rode up with about a dozen of his cowboys and twenty-five or thirty ponies. He walked into the house without going through the formality of knocking at the door, and remarked that it was "awful d——d cold." He kindly told me that if I would give him enough corn to feed his herd of ponies that he would not turn them out to help themselves. I told him that I hoped he would not turn the horses out, as they would tear down my stacks and that he could have all the corn he wanted if he would go out in the field and husk it.

"What is the matter with this corn in the wagon?" he inquired. "That is corn I brought up for my hogs while I am gone to Douglas Grove," I explained.

He made no further remark, but deliberately emptied the corn out on the ground, where it was soon eaten up by the horses. The outfit concluded to stay with me all night without asking my permission, helped themselves to my coffee and anything else they could find, wrapped themselves up in their blankets and went to sleep. Olive was taken sick during the night with cholera morbus and routed his men out to see if anything for his relief could be found in the settlement. There was no doctor within eighty miles, so they went to Mr. Boley's and came back with a bottle of camphor. Mrs. Ross also let them have a bottle of camphor, and Mrs. Forsyth, for a change, sent another bottle of camphor. Mrs. Loughran and Mrs. Merchant, having no other kind of medicine in their houses, also sent a bottle of camphor apiece. As the men came in one after the other with the camphor, Bob got as mad as a hornet and smashed the bottles on a saddle that hung in a corner of the room. During the same night our neighbor, Smith, had the honor of entertaining two or three of the cowboys. They piled into the bed alongside of him, with their clothes on, and enjoyed a good night's rest.

A WILD NIGHT FOR HANS

Early in the '80's the pioneers on the Middle Loup put in most of their time in winter hauling wood from the canyons and getting out cedar for posts. They also went on the islands in the river and cut white willow for making corrals. There was a fine willow island about ten miles above the settlement, near the Rankin ranch, which the ranch people rather laid claim to, but for all this the settlers hauled a great portion of it away, especially a German, whom we will call Hans. He would go up and get his load, pull to the ranch for supper and lodging and breakfast. Of course, no charges were made by Mr. Rankin for such trifles.

It finally became an old story. One night Hans came as usual and it happened on this particular night Billie Erickson (better known among the cowboys as "Bill America"), Charles Austin, and Wright Rankin were at the ranch, and all you have to do after twenty years have elapsed to get a hearty laugh out of the boys is to say "Hogs in the ranch." It seems it was a put-up job to have some fun at Hans' expense. Rankin was to play crazy, and after supper the boys very confidentially told Hans that Rankin was crazy, and no difference what he did he musn't make him mad. Presently Rankin took a fit, chewing soap to make foam run out of his mouth, grabbed Hans and danced him all over the room until he almost wore the poor man out. There was a red-hot cook stove in the room and Rankin in his grand right and left would try to force Hans on top of the stove, which he avoided by nimbly jumping over it, taking the whole thing as a huge joke rather than get the crazy man mad. Finally they unrolled their beds on the floor, and Austin and Rankin occupied one bed, while Bill and Hans took the other. In a little while Rankin took another fit and declared there were hogs in the ranch. "Listen, Charlie; can't you hear 'em breathe?" "No, Wright," responds Austin, "that's Hans and Billie." "But I say it is not and, I am going to kill one and we will have some meat. Hand me my Winchester, easy, so as not to scare 'em."

Charlie tries to reason with him, while poor Hans is scared till he daren't hardly move. At last Rankin makes a grab for his Winchester, while Charlie shouts to warn the boys to look out, Rankin has his gun. Bang! Bang! goes the gun, shooting just over their heads. Billie jumps up and yells like a Sioux and he and Charlie grapple with Rankin to get the gun, while Hans fairly splits the wind to get out at the door. The boys finally get Rankin back to bed and succeed in convincing him there are no hogs in the ranch. It is a bitter cold night and Hans did not stop in his flight even to secure his clothes. After a while he knocked timidly on the door, when Rankin jumped up and wanted to know who was there? "It's Hans." "Why, sure enough, Hans, it is you; come right in; have you fed your horses? Of course, you haven't had any supper; the coffee is warm yet, and I will have you a bite in a jiffy." "Oh, no; Mr. Rankin," replied Hans, his teeth chattering with the cold; "I will just go to bed."

After a while Rankin again imagines there are hogs in the ranch — Bang! Bang! Bang! goes the old Winchester in that direction. Another scuffle with Rankin by Billie and Austin to get his gun, while poor Hans darts out into the chilly night very thinly clad, and after a while manages to slip in without disturbing the crazy man who sleeps quietly till morning. While Hans is out next morning caring for his team, Charles Austin bored a hole about six inches above Hans' pillow, blackening it so it would appear like a fresh bullet hole, and to this day Hans thinks his life was spared only by a miracle.

BOB HUNTER HAS CLOSE CALL

Bob Hunter was one of the early-day cattle buyers and went through the usual experiences of cattle buyers at that time. He says, "I have been in the saddle buying cattle, a head or two here and a few more at another place, for days and weeks at a time. We had to drive through heat and cold, fording frozen rivers and generally at night had to camp out on the prairie without very many camping accommodations. Houses were very few and far between, and with a tired bunch of cattle you generally had to stop where night overtook you.

"I remember one night especially, when my men and I were driving a bunch of white-faces which we were bringing to the home ranch. We camped near a deserted sod house and as soon as we could round up everything, we turned in for the night. Toward morning we were awakened by shots which we thought were altogether too close for comfort. On investigation we found the house surrounded by a posse who were after a Mexican and an Oklahoma white man who had been committing stock depredations and were wanted down in Oklahoma for horse stealing. If I hadn't been a smooth talker they would probably have taken us along with them, but as it was, I succeeded in convincing them that they were mistaken."

MRS. HUNTER LEARNS THE WAY OF THE WEST

The present generation will never know the peculiar conditions and privations under which the pioneers began life in Custer county. These experiences were especially hard on the women. Mrs. Martha A. Hunter, who with her husband, pioneered in the vicinity of Broken Bow, and who is a very versatile writer, gives us this glimpse of early sod house life:

"Ere long the little sod abode was ready for occupancy and as the family brought little or no house furnishings, two beds were improvised by nailing split saplings to the rafters above and to the floor below and the same across, upon which were placed bed ticks filled with dry hay and above all feather beds, making a very comfortable resting place.

"Fuel was an object of much concern to the family as the winter drew near, but corn, which was the principal fuel used by the neighbors, could be obtained readily for eight cents per bushel, and the supply of buffalo and cow chips to be had for the gathering, added to the supply, which proved adequate for the winter.

"In the summer of 1890 occurred the first of the only two complete drouths in the history of Custer county. The second followed four years later, in 1894. The first drouth was especially hard on the Hunter family and others who had stock. They had not been long enough in the country to know the rich food properties contained in the short, curly buffalo grass that covered the hills like a thick mat and which was abundantly rich in food properties,—so much so that stock turned loose upon it during the winter time not only lived but also kept in good condition. But this we did not find out until after this hard winter, because we had to drive the cattle up into Cherry county for the winter.

"I worried much about the education of our two small daughters, and felt that it was not right or fair to them to keep them in the hills, but God opened the way not only in providing for their education, but in furnishing a support for the family, which in those days was very welcome and much appreciated. I was appointed teacher in a school district seven miles from our home. We drove these seven miles to school each morning and returned in the evening, but thought that no hardship. Even though we faced many a storm and blizzard yet we always got through; and in the end had the pleasure of seeing our daughters graduate from the Broken Bow high school."

"A WISE COW TALE"

Al Wise of the South Loup country tells this one:

"At the time of the Olive trial most of the men connected with that ranch were absent as witnesses, help was very scarce at the ranch, and the few that were left there were principally engaged in 'tailing up' cows that were so poor that they got stuck in the mud along the river and were not able to get up without assistance. Did you ever attempt to 'tail up' a spirited, ambitious cow? If not, you have missed a whole lot of fun—and so has the cow. A little experience of mine in that direction may be entertaining—it was to me. I had been down at the corral attending to some horses when I noticed a cow on the bank of the river trying to get on her feet, but falling back after each attempt. Not wishing to take the trouble to saddle a horse, I went over to her on foot to assist her out of her difficulty. I soon saw that there was fight in her, but concluded she was too weak to make me any trouble. Grabbing her tail, I passed it over my shoulder and gave it several twists around my arm, getting as much of it in my hand as possible. The old cow puffed and shook her head in protest. I paid no attention to her objections, but bent my back and lifted. The cow did likewise, and the way that old heifer got on her feet took the breath out of me. I saw that she was on the warpath, and that my only hope of safety was to keep hold of her tail. With a bellow she turned her glaring eyes around on me and took after me, spinning around like a top. By keeping a firm hold on her tail I just managed to keep a few inches ahead of her long horns. After a few turns to the right she tried it a while to the left, but with no better success. The waltz was becoming awfully monotonous to me, and as we worked toward a bank about ten feet high, by the edge of the river, I dropped her tail and jumped over the bank with one bound. The cow was a little dazed by the performance, but as soon as she realized the situation she made for the bank, probably with the intention of following me, but gave it up when she came to the foot of it, pawed the ground and bellowed her defiance, and walked away shaking her head, probably hooking me in her mind. Two days after this, as I was riding along the bank of the river, I saw the old lady down again, but I concluded to leave her to her fate, and for all I know her bones are buried in the mud where I last saw her."

TERRIBLE FALL IN A DEEP WELL

The depth to water on the table-lands of Custer county entailed many hardships on the early settlers. None of them had the means to sink modern wells to such a depth, and had consequently to resort to the laborious method of hauling water in barrels from the lower lands, often having to go as far as six miles for it. Some of the settlers on the tables dug wells from 200 to 300 feet in depth and hauled water out of them by horse power. The existence of these fearful holes in the ground, mostly without curbing, resulted in many accidents, some of which will be found described in others parts of this work. In the fall of 1895 F. W. Carlin fell into a well 143 feet deep, and in the Custer County Beacon of September 5th of that year, he thus describes the manner in which he climbed out:

"While driving through the country about fifteen miles northwest of Broken Bow on the evening of August 14th, it became quite dark and I found I had taken the wrong track and driven up to some old sod building. I turned around and started down what looked to me like a good road into the draw, when one of my horses seemed to step down into a place. I got out of the wagon and started alongside of the team to be sure that the road was all right, when without a moment's notice I became aware of the fact that I had stepped into an old well and was going down like a shot out of a gun.

"I placed my feet close together, stretched my arms straight over my head and said, 'Oh God, have mercy on me!' and I honestly believe that saved my life, but I went down, down, and it seemed to me I would never reach the bottom. The further I went, the faster I went and never seemed to touch the sides at all.

"I supposed, of course, it would kill me when I struck bottom, but God had heard my prayer. I struck in the mud and water, which completely covered me over. I was considerably stunned, but was able to straighten up and get my head above the water. I scrambled around, gradually extracting my legs from the mud, and finally stood on my feet in the water, which came just up to my arms. It was very cold, and I tried a number of times to get out of the water only to fall back. The curbing was somewhat slimy. I finally managed to break off a small piece from the curbing and found a crack in which I managed to fasten it and perched myself upon it until morning. While sitting there I heard my team running away. In them was my only hopes of rescue. For I was aware of the fact that I was at least a mile and a half from the nearest house, and that no one knew that I was there.

"There I sat till morning. It was about nine o'clock when I fell in, and I was drenched with water and plastered with mud. The only serious injury I received was a badly sprained ankle, which gave me great pain. I also had a sore place on my back, which I found a number of days afterward to be a broken rib. As soon as daylight appeared, I began to look around and take in the situation. In looking up, it seemed to me at least 100 feet to the top. But I learned afterward that it was exactly 143 feet deep.

"The well was curbed in places with curbing about three feet square. There would be a place curbed for about six to sixteen feet and then there would be a place that was not curbed at all. The curbing was perfectly tight, not a crack between them that I could get my fingers into, and covered with a slimy mud. I at once concluded that my only chance for rescue was my knife, if it had not fallen out of my pocket while floundering in the mud, so thrusting my hand into my pocket, there it was, and a good one too. I took it and began cutting foot-holes in the sides of the curbing; it was very slow but sure. I never went back a foot after I had gained it. When I would get to the top of the curbing, I took the boards that I had cut out and made me a seat in one corner, and in this way I think I got up about fifty feet the first day. Some time in the afternoon I came to a curbing which I thought I could not get through; it was of solid one-by-six boards closely fitted together and not less than sixteen feet to the top of it. So I made myself a good seat, fixing myself as comfortable as possible. I concluded that I must stay here and await assistance, or die there.

"I stayed there all the next night and slept one-half of the time, for the night did not seem very long. I would have been quite comfortable had I not been so wet and cold, and my feet pained me terribly, which was the greatest drawback. I had to do most of my climbing on one foot.

"I remained at that point the greater part of the next forenoon, calling often for help. One thing was in my favor; I was neither hungry nor thirsty. I began to give up all hopes. I thought of my wife and little boy, who were always so glad to see me when I came home from a trip. I thought how the little fellow would never see his papa or run to meet him when he returned home again. That was too great. I made up my mind that I would get out or die in the attempt. So I took a piece of board and put some sand on it and got the point of my knife good and sharp and began cutting away the curbing and making one foot hole after another. I cut, climbing higher and higher, and was at last on top of the curbing. From there I would have been comfortable if my feet had not hurt me so badly. But I cut holes in the clay for my hands and feet with my knife and finally I got within about sixteen feet of the top. Right there I had the worst hindrance I had met yet. It was a round curbing four feet high and perfectly smooth on the inside. It was washed out around it until it was only held from dropping by a little peg on one side. I knew if I tried to go up through it, it was pretty sure to break loose and go to the bottom with me. So my only chance was to go up between the curb and the wall. This I was fortunate in doing. By going to work and digging away the wall, in half an hour I had a hole large enough to let me pass through. After that it was but a short job to reach the top, which I did, and I lay for some time exhausted.

"I then knelt down and thanked Almighty God for sparing my life, as I had prayed for him to do, time and again during the past two days and nights that I had been in the well.

"But my trouble was not at an end yet. I was one and a half miles from a house, with a foot I could not step on. I cut some large weeds and made out to hobble and crawl to the road, about four rods distant, and there I lay until nearly sundown, looking for a team which never came. After getting out in the sun, I became very thirsty. At last I gave up looking for any one and started to crawl on my hands and knees to find a house, but I soon gave out and had to lie out another night. In the morning I felt somewhat better. Starting out again I finally arrived at the home of Charles Francis just at daylight, where I was given food and drink, after being without for two days and three nights.

"My team was found the next day after I fell in the well, by a man by the name of Green, with the doubletrees and neck yoke attached to them. To Mr. Green great credit is due. He took them to a justice of the peace, filed an estray notice and turned them into the pasture, thus complying with the law and taking away my last chance for being discovered."

A THOUSAND ELK IN ONE HERD

A thousand elk in one Custer county herd—that sounds extravagant, yet State Surveyor Robert Harvey says he saw a herd that large on Victoria creek. He also notes a death battle between two elk bulls. The following is Mr. Harvey's story:

"Custer county was a magnificent game country. Antelope on the hills and deer and elk in nearly every canyon, especially where there was brush. My party was not out of fresh meat for more than a day or two at the most. Returning from the completion of the work in Custer county, we crossed the county line and traveled down the old military trail made by Lieutenant G. K. Warren, in 1855 or 1856. We noticed small bands of elk moving from the bluffs to the south across the valley, in direction of the Victoria, and when we came opposite that stream we saw perhaps a thousand elk gathered on a plat of flat, clay ground, south of the river and just east of Victoria creek, visiting, grazing, and fighting. For miles we could hear the clear ring, like bars of metal, when the horns clashed together. That was the largest herd of elk I ever saw.

"One evening while hunting in a large cedar canyon, now known as Cedar canyon, with numerous side pockets containing berries and plums, I came upon two pair of elk antlers, still attached to the skulls, securely locked together around a small ash tree, perhaps five or six inches in diameter. They had become locked together in conflict around that tree. The sod had been worn away and was then overgrown with small weeds. They had fought up and down the tree until the bark was all peeled away as high as they could reach on their hind feet, down to the ground. Locked to the tree, they died there. I intended to have returned that day and cut the tree out at the roots, lop off the limbs and carry home the trunk with skulls and antlers still locked, as a trophy of a remarkably strange and rare occurrence. But I had lost so much time, I concluded that they could safely wait until winter, when I would be able to return. I heard that a party of Iowa hunters had found them and carried them away. I have heard or read of only one other similar occurrence and that was of two deer that became entangled in each others' horns."

MADE HIS OWN POWDER

Prominent among the interesting relics shown to visitors when calling upon the hospitable old-timer, Judge Charles R. Mathews, of New Helena, is a bottle of gun powder that the Judge keeps as a relic of former days, when ammunition was scarce and good powder very hard to obtain. The powder is some that he manufactured himself. He gave to his visitors in this instance a very interesting description of how the powder was manufactured, together with its formula, effectiveness, etc.

It is said to be a very powerful explosive. The granulation is rather coarse, and the appearance almost white. It must not be imagined that because we are talking about white powder that we are giving a description of ladies' face powder, for Judge Mathews has been a bachelor all his life and it is altogether probable that he knows nothing about the face powder in general use by the ladies. It is gun powder, pure and simple, and chickens, quail, rabbit, or any other denizen of the canyon that got in front of the Judge's gun loaded with this explosive about the time he pulled the trigger, found out what the powder was for and could generally bear witness to its effectiveness. Accordingly credit the Judge with being the only manufacturer of gun powder in Custer county.

WON BY A NOSE

James Lindly, who came to Custer county in the springtime of 1880, arrived at New Helena with twenty-five cents in money and with a cheerful disposition which enabled him to overcome all difficulties and remain in the country up to the present time. The first year after his settlement in Victoria precinct he was elected justice of the peace, in which capacity he served six years. He relates the following incidents which occurred while he was administering justice in these early days, and they may not be out of place here. Upon one occasion two Irishmen had some difficulty about the boundary line between their claims, and the result was a collision. The one who came out second best in the row came to Mr. Lindly to get justice, his face covered with blood and his nose in a very demoralized condition. The justice issued a warrant for the arrest of his antagonist, handed it to him and directed him to the home of the constable. In due time the constable appeared at the home of the justice with both of the men. After reading the complaint the defendant pleaded not guilty, and a trial was had without counsel or witnesses, each man pleading his own case. The plaintiff alleged that defendant had come to his place and commenced the row. The defendant promptly denied that he had commenced the row, but admitted that he had gone to the plaintiff's house, and said that the plaintiff had attacked him with a pitchfork. The plaintiff then turned toward the defendant, laid his index finger on his nose and asked: "How was that done?" "Ye did it yerself whin I was takin' the pitchfork away from ye," replied the defendant.

The plaintiff then offered his nose in evidence by turning to the court and saying: "The court knows very well that nose was chewed." And sure enough it had that appearance—and well chewed at that. The plaintiff was fined one dollar and costs and the two departed together, apparently satisfied with the result of the suit.

A BACK-ACTING WEDDING FEE

Upon another occasion Mr. Lindly had occasion to go to the sod house of three bachelors, when one of them, in a joking mood, asked him how much he would charge him to perform a marriage ceremony. Not being rushed with business of that sort, Mr. Lindly replied that he would do it for half price. The second bachelor then spoke up and wanted to know how much the justice would charge to marry him. The accommodating justice said he would marry him free. Then the third bachelor was anxious to know what the charge for marrying him would be. "O, I'll marry you for nothing, and board you and your wife free for a week," laughingly replied Mr. Lindly. The first two never called upon Mr. Lindly to assist them into wedlock, but not very long afterward number three appeared with a fair maiden and insisted that the justice fulfill his agreement, which Mr. Lindly did, and the groom being of a generous disposition, the couple boarded with the justice two weeks instead of one. From the small capital with which Mr. Lindly commenced business in Custer county he has accumulated an independence. He is the owner of 1,580 acres of land, 600 under cultivation, twenty acres of trees and all free from incumbrance.

A PLUCKY CUSTER COUNTY WOMAN

In the crowd that assembled to witness the execution of Haunstine for the murder of Roten and Ashley, Mrs. Roten was in the crowd. When it became known that the governor had granted a reprieve which would stay the execution for thirty days, there was considerable commotion in the vast assemblage and a few leaders tried to incite the mob spirit. At this time, in an excellently written account of the exciting events that followed the announcement of the governor's reprieve, the State Journal thus alludes to the presence of Mrs. Roten, wife of one of the men murdered by Haunstine: "She is a splendid-looking woman, but twenty-six years of age, and the mother of four children rendered fatherless by Haunstine's crime. She stood in the very midst of the thickest part of the struggle with a nerve that excited the wonder of all who witnessed the spectacle. The leaders of the mob circled around her, whispering to her for counsel, as if she were their queen, and if she had finally insisted on Haunstine's execution, no power at the command of the sheriff could have prevented them fulfilling her command. The peacemakers besought her earnestly, with every assurance of the justice of the outcome, to ask the men to disperse, but she called attention to the fiendishness of the crime and to her fatherless children as an excuse for refusing to say a word in the culprit's behalf. Failing in this aim, the peacemakers turned their endeavors toward preventing her from giving encouragement to the mob, and succeeded."

Old-timers say that the city reporters catered to the spectacular and gave their descriptions more of the thrill and red paint than the facts merited.

WAS A JUSTICE ALL RIGHT

In the olden days T. B. Buckner, of Oconto, was a justice of the peace. A case was brought before him, and Judge Sullivan and Judge Humphrey appeared as the attorneys. At the beginning of the case Sullivan questioned the jurisdiction of Justice Buckner. "Buck" listened to the argument on both sides until weary, then pulled out a big six-shooter and laid it on the table, and said, "Gentlemen, the decision of this court is that I am a justice of the peace and a hell of a good one." The case proceeded without further interruption.

GOD AND BOBLITS

Judge Boblits, who was the first judge of Custer county, married a couple of youngsters during the first day in his office and closed the ceremony with this remark, "Whom God and Boblits hath joined together, let no man put asunder."

A COURTSHIP IN THE COURT'S OFFICE

found the authority for the following story:

Dates seem to be lacking, but it was probably some time in the year 1888 that an attractive young lady who had just finished a term of school in the Berwyn district accepted a position as assistant in the office of the clerk of the court, J. J. Douglass, who was the first clerk of court in Custer county. In speaking of her four years' experience in that office the authority relates that many famous cases were tried during that time, such as the Demerritt case and the Haunstine case, and many others. She had to work in an office from the window of which she could watch the erection of the scaffold upon which Haunstine was to be executed. Relating the experience in her own words:

"As the nails were being driven into the structure, how I shuddered when I thought that a human being was to be suspended from that beam. Early in the morning on the day of the execution people began to arrive from miles around to witness the only execution that ever occurred in Custer county. My heart ached and my soul was stirred to its very depths in sympathy for a fellow-being who was so soon to pass into eternity. Yet I was utterly helpless so far as extending any aid or consolation. And now the thought comes to me, will the day ever dawn when there will be no law in Nebraska permitting men to take the life of another man to avenge a crime?"

Notwithstanding the varied and exciting experiences in the clerk's office the young lady remained during the entire four years of the term, after which she and the ex-clerk were married, and they have ever since been foremost among the prominent citizens of Custer county. They have a beautiful home in Callaway.

EXPERIENCES OF A "SCHOOL MARM"

In July, 1881, Mrs. J. J. Douglass arrived in Broken Bow. That village looked strange to her, with not a tree in sight excepting a few little cuttings of cottonwood and box-elder here and there upon the few lawns. After having lived all her life in a country where every home was surrounded by groves and ornamental shade trees, it seemed that she was in a desert.

She had just completed a course of study in a normal school, prior to coming to Nebraska, and was worn out in mind and body, so naturally her first consideration was the climate of the country and its corresponding effect upon life and health. She wondered how the people stood the heat of the day, but soon discovered that a light breeze was blowing nearly all the time, so that the heat did not seem so intense as it did in her Iowa home.

After she had been in Broken Bow about two weeks she was offered a position in the mortgage loan office of Trefren & Hewitt. The latter was the first county clerk of Custer county. She held this position a few weeks and then resigned to take charge of the Berwyn school, at the request of Charles Randall, the county superintendent. Berwyn was a village situated ten miles east of Broken Bow. It consisted of one general merchandise store, a postoffice, depot, and a blacksmith shop. It was not daylight when the train stopped at the little depot and a feeling of loneliness came over her as she watched the train speed on its way behind the eastern hills. She found her way to the home of J. O. Taylor (who was then living in the back end of his store building), informed him that she was the teacher who had come to teach the school and asked him to direct her to her boarding place. Being a member of the school board, Mr. Taylor gave her the necessary information and then sent his hired man with a team and buggy to take her farther east to the home of Ben Talbot, where she was to stay.

The Talbot home was a little sod house consisting of two small rooms. On entering she found Mrs. Talbot preparing breakfast for the family. She was given a cordial welcome, and after breakfast, started in company with Mrs. Talbot's little girl to the schoolhouse. The sense of loneliness which had taken possession of her on her way to this place now began to be dispelled. She found Mrs. Talbot to be a woman of kind heart and generous impulses, the mother of two little girls, the older one being of school age. She could see the schoolhouse up on the side of a hill. It was made of brush and weeds and some sod and was twelve by fifteen feet in dimensions. The roof was of brush and weeds and some sod, and she could see the blue sky by gazing up through the roof at almost any part of it. She looked out upon the hills and valleys and wondered where the pupils were to come from, as she saw no houses and no evidence of habitation anywhere excepting Mr. Talbot's home. By nine o'clock about twelve children had arrived from some place, she knew not where.

She found in that little, obscure schoolhouse some of the brightest and best boys and girls it was ever her good fortune to meet. There soon sprang between them a bond of sympathy. She sympathized with them in their almost total isolation from the world, and they in turn sympathized with her in her loneliness and homesickness.

On opening her school that first morning, great was her surprise to learn how well those children could sing. She had never been in a school where there were so many sweet voices. Her attention was particularly directed to the voices of two little girls, as they seemed remarkable for children of their years. She often recalled one bright, sunny evening after she had dismissed school and stood watching the pupils starting out in various directions for their homes, her attention was called to a path that led down the valley through the long grass. She heard singing and at once recognized the voices of these two little girls. The song was a favorite of Mrs. Douglass and she could hear those sweet tones long after the children were out of sight in the tall grass. She will never forget how charmingly sweet that music seemed to her.

LIFE TOO SHORT FOR A SOD ROOF

The roofs on the early sod houses were made by putting up small logs for ridgepoles to support cross poles and upon these was placed a thatch of brush and hay and then over the hay, a layer of sod or clay. This kind of a roof was often open to both storm and criticism. Mrs. H. C. Stuckey relates her experience:

"From hardly any rain we soon had more than we needed. Our roof would not stand the heavy downpours that sometimes continued for days at a time, and it would leak from one end to the other. We could keep our beds comparatively dry by drawing them into the middle of the room directly under the peak of the roof. Sometimes the water would drip on the stove while I was cooking, and I would have to keep tight lids on the skillets to prevent the mud from the roof falling into the food. With my dress pinned up, and rubbers on my feet, I waded around until the clouds rolled by. Then we would clean house. Almost everything had to be moved outdoors to dry in the sun. But I never complained much. It has been said that a spirit was given us to stand all these trials—for they were indeed trials, and hard ones, too. Would I again go through with what I then did? No, indeed! A thousand times, no! Life is too short to be spent under a sod roof."

ENTERTAINED THE PAWNEES

On one occasion the home of H. C. Stuckey and wife was visited by a band of Pawnee Indians. Mrs. Stuckey gives the following account of the way they entertained them:

"We had but one Indian scare. One day fourteen big, ugly fellows came in, squatted down on the floor, and, as usual, wanted something to eat. We stirred up corn dodgers for them and gave them syrup. I can see them yet, licking and daubing their corn cakes with many grunts of satisfaction. They played with my baby and called him 'heap good papoose.' I was very much frightened and could stand their presence no longer, so I took my baby and went into the other room and got a large revolver and held it in my hand until they went away. I do not know what I intended to do with the revolver. The Indians were Pawnees and very peaceful. They were on a hunting trip, and before leaving showed my husband a piece of well worn, dirty paper, written at the reservation and signed by the agent, requesting settlers to give the Indians food,—dead dogs and chickens, or anything else that would serve to fill up their capacious stomachs. These were the only Indians that ever came to our ranch.”

ALL READY FOR INDIANS

In the fall of 1878, while Uncle Swain Finch and John Finch were at Brady Island, on the Platte, after supplies for their South Loup ranch, a dispatch came from the commander at Fort McPherson that three hundred well mounted Cheyenne Indians had broken away from the southern reservation and were headed north, and that having barely enough soldiers to protect the fort, the settlers would have to look out for themselves. From the way the Indians were headed it was thought they would probably cross the Platte river at the old Indian crossing east of Brady Island. The boys had no arms with them except one rifle, which Uncle Swain generously left with the little settlement of four families at Brady Island with which to protect themselves in case the savages came upon them. Shortly after dark they started out for their home on the Loup, thirty-five miles across the prairie, without even a trail to go by. It was intensely dark, and raining a part of the time, but occasionally a little patch of blue sky, with a star or two shining through it, could be discerned. When about eighteen miles out, the darkness increased and the rain also, until the travelers began to think they had lost their course. John asked Uncle Swain if he thought they were on the right track.

“Well, I don’t know, boy; it’s so dog-goned dark I can’t tell if we are right or not; but if we are we ought to come to the water hole where old Sailor died, about half a mile ahead.”

Soon they stopped, and while John held the horses, Uncle Swain felt around in the darkness and a few moments later returned with some of old Sailor’s bones in his hand. Old Sailor was a dog belonging to Uncle Swain which had died there a year before, while chasing a deer, and this incident shows with what unerring accuracy an old frontiersman could find his way over these trackless plains, even in the darkness. They had proceeded about five miles further, and were on what is now known as Tallin Table, when they saw a flickering light some distance ahead of them. They halted, held a council, and decided to steer clear of the light, as there was no telling whether the makers of the fire were friends or enemies. The detour which they were obliged to make in order to avoid the light threw them off their bearings and bewildered them to such a degree that they thought it best to stop and wait until the morning began to dawn. As soon as it was light enough for them to get the direction they resumed their journey and arrived at the ranch before any of the occupants were astir. The boys at the ranch were immediately routed out of bed and set to work molding bullets and loading cartridges, while Uncle Swain and John lay down to snatch a little sleep. A few minutes later John Woods, who had been outside of the ranch house trying to see if he could discern any Indians, came rushing in, his hair on end, and his face as white as a sheet, shouting: “The Indians are coming! The Indians are coming!” It is needless to say that Uncle Swain and John were soon out of bed and that the whole ranch was in a commotion; but as the moments passed away without any blood-curdling war whoop, they began to feel a little easier and sent a scout out to reconnoitre. He reported that it was a false alarm. Woods had seen a bunch of cattle coming out of the hills single file and his excited imagination had formed them into Indians. The relief, however, was but temporary. The Indians would no doubt be along sooner or later, and all went to work to prepare for the worst. The horses were rounded up in a log corral, and a rifle pit dug, in which John and his uncle David slept to watch the horses, while Uncle Swain and Woods guarded the house. John was only eighteen years of age at that time and very averse to having his hair cut by the red devils, an operation which he felt, however, was likely to be performed at any time. While he and Woods were digging the rifle pit he remarked to the old man: “I wouldn’t be surprised if we were diggin’ our graves." The old man replied, "Well, John, I have been thinkin' the same thing."

Fortunately no Indians troubled them. They really experienced a sense of disappointment and were inclined to regret that the affair had ended so tamely.

MYSTERIOUS DEATH OF A TRAPPER

In 1875 a trapper by the name of Bly came over from North Platte into Custer county to ply his vocation. One day an Indian outfit of cattle came to his camp and he bought some animals that were sore-footed and not able to travel. After a while the cattle became rested and ran away, followed by a yoke of oxen belonging to the trapper. Bly took after them on foot, having no horse, but after pursuing them over the prairie for a day he gave up the chase. He came over to the South Loup, striking the river at the Lovell and Sheety beef camp, near where Arnold now stands. This outfit had moved further down the river, and had sent John Finch and E. S. Slater, two boys, up to the old camp after a rawhide rope that had been left behind. While the boys were at the old camp they saw Bly approaching in the distance, and as he was dressed in moccasins and leggings and had a red blanket over his head they took him for an Indian. They hid their ponies, got behind an old dugout, and waited for him to come up, which he did, the boys discovering their mistake before he reached them. Bly cooked his breakfast and ate it. He then went on down to the new camp, where he bought a horse, after which he returned and rounded up his straying stock. He then worked for the Lovell and Sheety outfit until August, 1876, when he left to go to North Platte to visit his family, driving his yoke of oxen, which were hitched to a wagon. He stopped the first night at the ranch of Swain Finch. Among other things he told Mr. Finch that he had sold his rim-fire Winchester for twenty-three dollars in cash and that he was going to buy a new gun when he got to the Platte. He resumed his journey in the morning, but was never afterward seen alive.

About a week afterward Sam Ritchie, of the firm of Ritchie & Arnold, was returning with his men from Pawnee Creek when they came across the wagon, with the dead body of Bly in it. The oxen had become detached from the wagon in some manner and were afterward found on the Loup river. Some thought that the trapper had been shot. His hat was found a few yards away, with one side badly torn. There were no marks upon the body except a small hole at the butt of the left ear and another at the back of the left heel. Word was sent to North Platte and the sheriff of Lincoln county came out and buried the body, wrapping it up in some tanned elk skins and putting it only about two feet deep in the ground, not wishing to be to any more trouble than actually necessary. The coyotes soon dug the body up, and for many years the bones lay bleaching in the sun.

Twelve years afterward John Finch, while passing through, about twelve miles southwest of Arnold, picked up the skull by the shallow grave where the unfortunate man had been buried. The locality is known to this day as Bly's Flats. David Finch was present when Bly was buried, and knowing that the trapper had received twenty-three dollars for his gun, he searched the clothing, but could not find any money. Mr. Finch noticed that the clothes on the body were not the same as those worn by the trapper the night he had stopped at the ranch. The wagon was then searched and the money found in his old clothes. It was afterward sent to the trapper's widow by Mr. Finch.

A very careful search was made to see if any indications of foul play could be found, and the conclusion was that the man had been struck by lightning. It was remembered that a dark cloud had been seen in the direction the trapper took on the day he left the ranch. The tracks left by the oxen and the marks of the wagon which had been dragged about when the animals were becoming detached from it, indicated that the ground was in a muddy condition at the time. Finally an examination of the skull found by John Finch proved beyond a doubt that the man had not been shot, as no bullet hole was found in it.

A FIGHT FOR "DEER LIFE."

Uncle Swain Finch, a pioneer character whom all the early settlers remember, was somewhat of a deer hunter in the early days. The following incident is constructed from his own writing.

One day in 1883 he started out on a deer hunt. He was not feeling very well that day, and was creeping along rather slowly until finally he discovered two deer just around a point of a hill a short distance ahead of him. He crept up to the top of the little hill behind which they were standing and blazed away at them, the distance being about 200 yards as he thought, but he afterward found that it was 300 yards.

As soon as he fired they jumped up and ran, followed by another shot from him, which apparently took no effect. A third shot was sent after the one he had picked out, and he thought he could see him stagger, but they ran about three-quarters of a mile, stopped for a few minutes on the top of a hill, and then went off on a lope about a quarter of a mile further. All this time he had been standing on the spot from which he had fired his first shot. After stopping again for a short time, the deer commenced feeding and walking down over the top of the little knoll on which they had been standing, disappearing from his sight. He followed, and when arriving at the place where they had disappeared he again saw them walking and feeding some distance ahead of him. As soon as they saw him one of them ran about 250 yards to his right, but the other was not to be seen. He proceeded on down the hill, saw the other deer about seventy-five or eighty yards ahead of him, near the bottom of the hill. It was a big buck. He gave him a shot and he rolled over on his back. He threw in another cartridge, walked down to him, opened his knife, took him by the horns, and placed the knife at his neck to cut his throat.

Before he could do it, however, the buck jumped up as if he had been shot out of a cannon, sent the knife whizzing through the air, and in order to save himself and keep the deer he grabbed hold of the other horn. The buck doubled himself up and kicked Swain, and jerked him down the hill, and they had it hot and heavy for some time. Sometimes the deer was on top and sometimes Swain, but at every turn the deer gave a vicious kick, and Swain had to keep a death grip on him to save his life. Every little while the deer would stop to get his wind, then go at it again harder than ever. Swain's clothes were literally torn to shreds, about the only whole thing on him being the collar of his shirt.

The situation was serious, and he dared not let go, for the deer would have made a lunge at him, and there did not appear to be any way out of the difficulty except to hang on and worry him out. He looked over his shoulder to see how far they were from the gun, and found that it was not less than twenty-five yards away. The only hope he had was to get the gun before turning the buck loose. In their struggles they worked down the hill, of course, and Swain started in to pull the deer back in the direction of the gun. Whenever he made a lunge he would pull with all his might and move him up a little, every time he lunged getting a little nearer to where the gun was lying. It was a slow and laborious job, but they were getting there by degrees, and at last Swain had the satisfaction of seeing the gun within six feet of him.

The next question was could he let go of the deer, grab his gun, and shoot him before he came down on him with his sharp hoofs? It was a dangerous experiment, and the slightest hitch in the operation might cost him his life. At this particular moment he thought, for the first time during the whole adventure, of the Lord, and he is not sure but that he prayed just a little bit as he suddenly let go of those horns, grabbed his gun, and shot his antagonist dead before it had time to regain its feet.

SAVED ONE BED

The late Captain W. H. Comstock is the authority for this story. He says:

"In company with D. J. Caswell I started from Moingona, Boone county, Iowa, in March, 1874. In due course of time we arrived at Loup City, the metropolis of Sherman county, which consisted of a log hotel kept by C. Y. Rossiter, and a general store of which Frank Ingram was the owner and proprietor. About this time Frank had some friends who had come to make him a visit. His family consisted of himself, wife, one child, and a hired man and hired girl. The house was small and sleeping rooms scarce. But Frank's mind was active, and he soon had a plan to help himself out of the difficulty and provide sleeping apartments for the visitors, without seriously inconveniencing the family. He went to the room of the hired man and told him that it would be necessary for him to vacate his bed, as he had company that would have to be taken care of. He then went to the room of the hired girl, woke her up and laid the situation before her. He said either her bed or the hired man's must be given up for the company. He didn't like to make one of them sit up all night, but he thought as the hired man and the hired girl had been keeping company, and intended to get married, anyway, they might just as well get married then and there and thus settle the whole difficulty about the beds. This seemed to meet with the approval of the two parties most interested, and Mr. Ingram, being the county judge, immediately issued a license and married them on the spot.

J. D. HASKELL'S PERSONAL EXPERIENCE

"In February, 1874, an acquaintance, who had just returned from an excursion trip to Nebraska, told me in glowing colors of that wonderful western country. He wanted me to go to Cozad and handle the butcher business. I was then twenty years old, and being full of a boy's love for adventure and fired by the glowing tales of the west, I did not ask many questions. In March, 1874, I was on my way west, having chartered a car for my one horse, two milch cows, four sows, butcher tools, and a bulldog—every real butcher had to have a bulldog. The freight on the car was $200. The different railroads passed me to Omaha, but there I was obliged to pay twelve dollars and fifty cents for a ticket to Cozad, a distance of 250 miles. When I reached my destination I was a discouraged lad. My aircastles collapsed like a balloon. There was no depot, and only five buildings in the town. The first question was how to unload my property. I got some planks and the stock slid down them from the car to the ground. We had landed in Nebraska. In a short time things looked fairly prosperous. Excursion trains were coming in every month bringing new settlers, we were getting the spring rains, more houses were being built in the town and country, and the prairie was being plowed up and put in crops. People had to eat, and being the butcher, I commenced business. My business as a butcher lasted about sixty days. In July we had hot winds and grasshoppers, the latter in such number as to shade the sun when passing over the country. Everything was eaten by them. I bought flour to make slop for my pigs, and there being no mowing machine in the country I bought a scythe and cut grass in the sloughs to winter my horse. That winter we had lots of snow, with the mercury thirty degrees below zero. The new settlers were short of fuel, clothing, and provisions. The latter part of that winter the government sent out a lot of army shoes and clothing that was out of date for the soldiers, and flour and beans were issued to the settlers. No clothing was issued for the women, but you would often see a woman wearing army shoes and a blue army overcoat. We had the grasshoppers and hot winds again the summer of 1875, and times were harder than ever that winter. The spring of 1875 I went to the Ozark mountains of Missouri, and an Ohio boy (Lew Williams) met me there. We bought 600 head of sheep, which we trailed across the country to Cozad. We had a good deal of trouble in crossing the numerous streams. At night we slept on the ground or in our wagon, and made a corral out of muslin to pen our sheep in. We sold the sheep soon after reaching Cozad. That same summer we made two trips to eastern Kansas, by wagon, and on each trip brought back milch cows, which we sold to settlers from Hastings to Cozad. The spring of 1876 I went to Ellis, Kansas, on horseback, and when the Texas cattle drive came in I bought 100 yearling heifers for $700. I put my cattle in with a herd that came to the Loup valley. We located about eight miles this side of Callaway. I worked for my board and furnished my own saddle horses and bed. We hauled our supplies from Cozad and Lexington (then Plum Creek). This county was not organized. There were no mail routes and we got our mail only when we went to the railroad. That fall I wanted to cast my first vote for president, consequently, I made a fifty-mile ride to Cozad and voted for R. B. Hayes. The spring of 1877 I hired out to Gassman and Dufree, ranchmen, for thirty dollars per month. That fall (1877) I took charge of a ranch as foreman. The owners lived in Illinois. I had the whole responsibility of managing the ranch in all its details. I have ridden all night to get to the railroad to send out important mail to the ranch owners. The spring of 1878 I was appointed county commissioner, and I held the office continuously until township organization went into effect. During 1881 I moved to my present home, in Arnold township. My first house was a log cabin. In 1882 I hauled lumber from Lexington (seventy miles) to build a house. In December of the same year I went back to Ohio, my home state, and was married. When my wife and I reached Cozad, the sleeping room at the hotel was a large room containing six beds, no stove. About midnight a drunken man came stumbling in, looking for a bed. The next day we started for our home on the Loup with a span of ponies and a buckboard. It was dead winter and deep snow covered the ground. That night we stopped with a farmer in the Platte valley, fifteen miles from Cozad. The house was not plastered and we could look out through the holes in the roof and see the stars shining. The second day we started bright and early. We had to break our road through the snow. There was no house between our own home and the Platte valley, a distance of thirty-five miles. When we reached home, Grandpa Hughey had supper ready, with some of his good hot biscuits, coffee, and beefsteak. As we had gone without our dinner, we did full justice to that supper, and here we have been ever since, wrestling with the ups and downs of western life."

DOUGLASS FINDS RELICS

J. J. Douglass says: "Relics of unusual interest have at different times been found in this country. In the summer of 1880, while riding on the Middle Loup, with others, we came to a bed of charred wood near where the Milburn bridge now crosses that stream. A number of beads were scattered about, and upon closer examination we found among the coals the under jaw of a man, and also a silver medal, two and a half inches in diameter, with a hole in it. On one side was the bust of a man, with the name, 'Pierre Choteau,' under it, while on the other side were the words: 'Upper Missouri Outfit.' Our supposition was that some Indian trader had been in that country trading beads and other trinkets to the Indians for furs, that they had gotten into a quarrel and that the savages had killed and burned the trader."

JESS GANDY JOINS THE ELKS

Once during the summer of 1881, while Jess Gandy still lived near West Union, he and his wife were out gathering wild fruit. Jess was a short distance from the wagon. He heard a shot, and rushing out, found his wife had shot a four-pronged buck. But he proved to be only stunned. What was to be done must be done quickly, as the buck was liable to jump up and get away at a second's notice. The suddenness of the thing rather rattled Jess. He had no more ammunition, and not even a jack knife to cut its throat. He was indeed in a dilemma. A dozen different plans flashed through his mind in a few seconds as to the best way to kill the buck, and he saw with alarm that it showed signs of reviving. Jess was so excited he forgot he could take off his neckyoke and dispatch him, but what he did do was about as funny as Judge Kilgore is said to have done in the winter of 1880. The judge packed water two miles for several weeks through two feet of snow, till some one suggested that snow, when melted, made water. But we left Jess with the buck showing signs of returning life. All at once a bright idea occurred to Mr. Gandy, and quick as a flash he had acted on it, and had dumped Mr. Buck into the wagon and tied him with his halter ropes. Then, sitting astride its head and neck, he yelled, "Let 'em go," and Mrs. Gandy did "let 'em go," for Jarvis Kimes' farm, a distance of half a mile east across the prairie. They had gone but a short distance when the buck came to his senses, and finding Jess astride of him, a struggle for life ensued between the two. It was just about an equal match, and for some time it was a matter of doubt which would come out on top. The buck had free use of his hind legs and when he brought them down on the sides of the wagon box it looked as if he would soon kick the wagon to pieces. The noise frightened the ponies and away they flew, up hill and down hill, over the rough ground, Mrs. Gandy holding them straight ahead and letting them go. The sharp feet of the deer tore Jess' clothing into ribbons and bruised his body fearfully. He had a veritable white elephant on his hands, and when the ponies dashed up to the door of Mr. Kimes he was about exhausted, panting and gasping for breath, his face flushed and perspiration rolling down in big drops. Kimes helped him to let go the buck.

MRS. GANDY ENTERTAINS A STRANGER

In September, 1881, Mr. Gandy was making hay with a neighbor, Mr. Lyle, three miles west of the river, coming home only on Saturday nights, Mrs. Gandy being left at home to look after the cattle. One Saturday evening a man came to the house and got his supper, telling Mrs. Gandy that he had eaten nothing for two days. He was a pitiful-looking object. He had a blanket rolled upon his back and carried a pair of shoes in his hand, his feet being so swollen that he could not wear them. After he had eaten his supper he requested of Mrs. Gandy the privilege of staying all night. She told him that she was alone, and that he would have to seek accommodation elsewhere. As he had come down the river in a boat, and there was a settlement at West Union, two miles further on, he started off and Mrs. Gandy got her pony and proceeded to round up her cattle. She returned, attended to her milking and other duties, and went to the house, it being by this time quite dark. When she entered the house, what was her consternation to discover the stranger sitting upright in bed, with two huge revolvers lying by his side and a number of papers scattered about him. When she came in he remarked to her that he was making himself at home. She replied: "I should think you are," and left the room. As it was Saturday night, she knew that Jess would be home about eleven o'clock, so she took her horse and started for Mr. Lyle's, meeting her husband on the way. When they returned to the house they found the man still sitting up in the bed, groaning with the pain in his swollen limbs. He begged so piteously to be allowed to remain that they had not the heart to turn him out, and he was allowed to remain until morning, although they suspected that he was a criminal. The supposition proved to be correct, as it was afterward learned that he had robbed a postoffice at Stem's ranch.

JESS GANDY RIDES A BUFFALO

A funny incident is related of the experience of Jess Gandy in trying to ride a buffalo. He had made his boast that he was going to ride the first buffalo he saw. Shortly after that, while out hunting one day, he came across four or five of the beasts. He fired at short range and shot an old bull through the lungs, which dropped down on his haunches and dropped its head, the blood coming out of its nostrils. Jess thought this would be an excellent opportunity to mount and to make good his boast. He succeeded in getting on the back of the dying buffalo, but soon found that he had mounted a very lively corpse, as the old fellow came to his feet with a bound and started off at a rapid pace. Dave Hickman, who was an eye witness of the performance, declares that at the second jump of the scared buffalo Jess was thrown about fifteen feet into the air. He came down on his feet and lost no time in making for a tree about a hundred yards distant, into which he climbed while the buffalo was flying in the opposite direction.

THE MASONS BURIED HIM

Eber Barber, who came to Custer county a little while before the buffaloes got out of it, has had some experiences that do not fall to the lot of every pioneer. He was here before he was married, and as a cowboy and an all-round utility chap was in much demand on the big ranches. He was here in time to kill a buffalo in the county. In speaking of his experiences he tells the following:

A young Englishman by the name of Dan Todd died at the "White House," down on the South Loup, in the winter of 1882. It was very cold at the time and two feet of snow covered the ground. It was impossible to dig a grave and nobody seemed disposed to take the initiative in the obsequies. Barber says he knew that Todd was a Free Mason and accordingly he resolved to take the body to Lexington and turn it over to the Masons there for burial. He loaded the body on to a sled and with a yoke of oxen hauled it down to the head of Wood river, where a man named Marve Henry hitched on his mules in the place of the oxen and accompanied Barber and the dead man the rest of the way. All day long they wallowed through the deep snow with their uncomplaining passenger. It was as gruesome as it was tiresome and hazardous. All day they bucked the snow and encouraged the mules. Early in the morning, as they started out from Henry's place, they had a chance to send word to the Masons in Lexington, by the mail carrier, that they were coming. Along with this announcement went a description of their bill of lading. When within six or eight miles of Lexington, and nearly exhausted, they met two teams with eight men, all Masons, coming to meet them, and help them into town. Barber says, "Jimmy crackey, but I was glad to see them."

He adds that the Masons took care of Henry and himself while they were in Lexington, gave them every comfort, besides holding funeral services over the remains of Todd and paying the entire bill for Christian burial.

THE FIRST GREAT FLAG POLE

In the summer of 1880, as the Fourth of July drew near, the people of Westerville were desirous of celebrating the day. Mr. Westervelt had a red-cedar log which he said he would give for a liberty pole, but it was not long enough, and Mr. Baker was patriotic enough to go to the cedar canyons and get another. The two were spliced together and raised, so that "Old Glory" waved above the people upon that eventful day. The pole stood in the middle of the main street, which was named Loraine, in honor of Mrs. Westervelt.

For years afterward this pole stood proudly erect, ready to receive the old flag and float it upon the winds in full view of all the surrounding country upon the occasion of every natal day or time of every public celebration. The pole is gone now, but other poles have been erected all over the county to take its place, and in these war times the patriotism of Custer county people keeps the flag floating all the time.

THE FIRST COUNTY SEAT CONTEST

The first contest over the county seat in Custer county, was over the removal of the county seat and postoffice from Custer, Nebraska, to Broken Bow. This was in 1881. Custer was on Frank Young's ranch, near the mouth of Spring creek.

The far-sighted ranchmen saw that the logical place for the county seat was in the center of the county. Mr. Young and his neighbors were for keeping it at Custer and argued that it might have to be brought back if moved, and that would mean a big bill of expense. This argument prevailed with the board of county commissioners until John E. Myers, then chairman of the board, said if it had to come back he would pay the bill. Then it went through with a whoop.

A HOSPITABLE ROOF

J. J. Douglass gives the following account of two early settlers, one famous for his hospitality and the other equally as famous for his hostility.

"One of the interesting characters of this region at that time was Louis Wambsgan, one of the very earliest settlers, who located near where Oconto now stands. His house was the only stopping place for a number of years between Plum Creek and the South Loup, and there was hardly a night the year around that two or three cowboys could not be found at 'Louie's' as he was familiarly called. He could always furnish sport for the boys in some way, and his annual turkey shoots during the holidays became famous throughout this region. I have heard many a good story told under Louie's hospitable roof. Wambsgan was the first county judge, being elected at a special election held July 31, 1877.

A LITTLE SPORT WITH GUNS

"Frederick Schreyer was another interesting character. He was the first homesteader on the South Loup between Callaway and Arnold. He was a very resolute German, about fifty years of age, and as eccentric as he was resolute. He constructed a dugout in which he imagined he would be secure from the depredations of the festive cowboy. As we have said before, there was a natural antipathy between the cowboys and the settlers, and the breach became wider and wider as time passed by and the settlers became more numerous. Armed encounters were frequent and bloodshed was often the result. Schreyer often had encounters with the cowboys and at one time was wounded in two places. He thought he was going to die, and had Charles Rockwood draw up his will. He had a ford near his house which he called his ford, and without his consent nobody was allowed to cross the river at that place if he could prevent it. He also surrounded his house with a high sod wall, which he called his fortifications. On the morning of April 1, 1878, J. D. Haskell and the writer put some tools in a wagon and went up the river to repair a corral. In going we crossed the river at Schreyer's ford. We saw nothing of him at that time, but during the day he sent us word that if we attempted to cross there in coming back he would shoot us. When we arrived at the ford on the way back, and while watering our horses, we saw Schreyer and his son running toward the house with guns. As soon as we got within range they raised up from behind their fortifications and began firing at us. We were unarmed, and, thinking discretion the better part of valor, put the whip to our team and got out of the way. In our flight we had to pass pretty close to the house, and one of the shots tore the step from the side of the wagon. From that time on there was trouble. Young Schreyer was arrested on the Platte, but escaped and went to Lincoln, where he remained a month. He came back to Kearney, was again arrested and was brought up into Custer county. He and his father were taken, handcuffed, to Custer for preliminary examination, and were bound over to appear before the district court. Not giving bonds, they were lodged in the Lexington jail. In July they were tried and sentenced to serve a term in jail, by Judge Gaslin. They served out their time and got home the next winter.

LASSOED AN ELK

James Farley tells this elk story: "Toward the end of my cowboy career I worked for the Bar-7 ranch, of which David Rankin was principal owner. This ranch was located on the Middle Loup.

"Large herds of elk roamed over the country at that time. While on the round-up in 1881 we sighted a large bunch, which had winded us. The boys off with their ropes and after them. C. W. Stern, John Carney, Bert Wilder, Charley Peterson (a green hand at the cattle business), and six or eight others were in the chase, and there was enacted one of the most thrilling incidents ever witnessed on the plains of Nebraska. Peterson singled out the biggest buck in the bunch, and as soon as Charley began to press him hard, he left the bunch and ran in another direction, Peterson close at his heels. I knew that Charley would never let up until he had secured the buck, and I knew full as well that he would have trouble when he threw his rope over the powerful beast, as he never carried a gun. I followed him as fast as my horse could carry me. I lost sight of him for a while in the chop hills, but soon discovered him again as I rode up a little hill. He had the elk at the end of his rope about eighty rods from me. The first move I saw was the elk making a run on the rope, and when he came to the end of it he fell heavily to the ground. He then jumped up and charged Peterson's horse. As he came on, head down, at the rate of about fifty miles an hour, Charley spurred his horse to one side and let the elk pass, and gave him another tumble as the rope tightened up. I waited to see no more but galloped as fast as my horse could carry me to his assistance, as I knew that it was only a question of time when the infuriated brute would catch the fearless boy in one of his charges. As I rode up, the elk was making his third charge, but Peterson evaded him again and gave him another tumble at the end of his rope. When about 300 feet from Peterson the elk had again regained his feet, lowered his head for another charge, his eyes flashing fire, and with terrific bounds made for the plucky boy. It seemed to me that it would be impossible for him to get out of the way of those terrible horns. But again he let the elk pass by without touching him and again he brought the brute to the ground at the end of the rope, pulling him square over on his back. Quick as lightning Peterson reined his horse backward, tightened the rope, jumped out of the saddle, whipped out a big jack knife, and slashed it across the throat of the prostrate beast. I shouted to him with all my might to desist, as I expected to see him killed every second, but he heard nothing and saw nothing but that elk and before I came up Peterson was back in his saddle. 'What the devil did you do that for?' I shouted, as soon as I reached him. 'I did na want loossee ma rope — da boys da laugh at ma.' The other boys followed the bunch and C. N.

Stern succeeded in roping two of them at one throw, but one of them got away. None of the boys that saw the sport will ever forget it."

LOST IN THE SAND HILLS

"Once seventy-five men started from Raymond lake, fifteen miles west of the head of Middle Loup river to go to the Newman ranch on the Running Water. We were driving 1,500 head of cattle for the northern ranches. We missed our course and traveled for two days in a circle, among the sand hills. We had water for neither horses nor cattle, and on the third day the poor brutes became frantic with thirst. It took the utmost efforts of the men to keep them from breaking away, and their bellowing was something absolutely heart-rending. Men could be seen on every hill around us trying to see if water could be discovered. At last I saw two men standing on a hill some distance off motioning in such a way that I knew they had found something. I rode up to them and found the nicest little lake of pure water I have ever seen among the sand hills. We all filled our kegs before letting the cattle into the water. After the rejoicing at our find had somewhat subsided we discovered that we were within half a mile of the place from which we had started three days before. We had a good compass, but all the men had declared the compass was no good. Stern had told them of an old trail which led to the Running Water, and they expected to follow that, but it was so dim they crossed it without noticing it, and kept traveling in a circle for three days. After a good breakfast and all the water we could drink, John Darr, two other cowboys, and myself, were sent out to find the old trail, which we soon did, and led the party out of the wilderness, reaching our destination safely in due time."

HUNTERS FIND GAME IN THE BED

Jess Gandy tells the following: "In the fall of 1876, in company with Charles Penn, I left York, Nebraska, and came up into Custer county on a hunt. We arrived after dark at Mr. Murphy's place, on Clear creek. On our approach the dogs began a violent barking, and suddenly the lights went out. We thought this rather strange, but proceeded to knock on the door several times before we received any response. Finally a childish voice rang out on the night air with a determined and rather angry accent: 'Who are you and what do you want?' 'We are hunters, and wish to stay all night.' 'That's too thin. Leave or I will shoot through the door.' 'Say, Sis, where is your pa?' 'That's no concern of yours. Leave or I'll shoot.'

"We thought discretion the better part of valor, got out of range of the door, and finally convinced the two plucky little girls within, who were only about ten and fourteen years old, that we were friends. They had heard the dogs bark, took us for Indians or horse thieves, and had turned out the light, got the gun and proceeded to 'hold the fort.' We learned that Mr. Murphy and his wife had not yet returned from a cedar canyon near by, where they were loading cedar to take to Grand Island the following day.

"There could be quite a romance written about this family. Mr. Murphy had a few cattle and the two children had to do the herding and have had to subsist for three weeks at a time on a small grass nut which they dug while herding their cattle. But to return to our story. Mr. Murphy and his wife came in presently and we were hospitably entertained. The next morning we were directed to Mr. McEndeffer's place, Mr. Murphy's closest neighbor, on the Muddy, about ten miles in a southwesterly direction. We had only proceeded a short distance when we sighted a band of elk, and everything else was forgotten in the exciting chase which ensued. We found ourselves at night over twenty miles out of our course, and in the midst of a genuine Nebraska blizzard. We selected a sheltered place on the banks of the Muddy, where we could obtain fuel, and camped until morning. We lost sight of the elk the previous evening among the hills, not having been able to get a single shot at them at less than 700 yards.

"In the morning it was still storming, and we retraced our steps and arrived at McEndeffer's the following evening. We hunted with Mr. McEndeffer about a week, and had splendid success, having killed several deer. I will say Charley Penn is the only man I ever saw who could shoot quicker than I.

"While on this trip we camped all night in an old deserted sod house and found a large heap of tumble weeds and tickle grass blown up into one corner of the room. Being very tired, we did not stop to investigate what might be hidden under this immense stack of debris, but proceeded to spread our tarpaulins on it and make our bed.

"After a little, Charley was snoring away at the rate of about three knots an hour. I felt our bed move, but thought it must be my imagination. After a little the movements beneath became so violent there could be no mistake that there was something underneath our bed. I remembered when a boy of hearing that circumstances sometimes make strange bedfellows, and I thought we 'had 'em sure.' I nudged Charley quietly and whispered, 'Charley, there's something under our bed.' But I might just as well have talked to the sod walls. He kept right on 'sawing wood.' The rolling and tumbling motion continued with still greater violence every minute, until I was beginning to get seasick. I got desperate, and, springing up in bed, fairly shouted in Charley's ear: 'Charley, there's something alive under our bed,' and Charley came back from dreamland with a snort and puff just as we began slowly sinking toward the ground and the heaving and surging motion ceased. Looking out toward the door we saw a long procession of little dark-looking objects, with white stripes on their backs, filing out of the door, and then realized that we had been sleeping on top of a family of skunks which had taken up their winter quarters in the place."

HAD NO RELIGION

An amusing incident happened in Judge Ford's court one day during a trial in which the Rev. Albert M—— (colored) and his wife were trying to enforce claims against an estate being probated at the time. Al. Johnson was conducting the cross examination. Mrs.

M—— was upon the stand. It was revealed by the witnesses that the claims of the "Rev-run" and his wife were somewhat antagonistic and at the moment Al. said to Mrs. M——, "Your husband is a preacher, is he not?" And to the consternation of all present, she answered. "No, sir, he aint no preacher; dat man aint got no religum." How could he be a preacher? It is reported that the dignity of the court relaxed.

ONE OF THE COUNTY "DADS"

In the days when the old court house was in existence there was an antiquity in the district-court room in the shape of an old, smoky stove. At that time "Scotty" was the superintendent of the court house and he alone knew how to regulate the stove so that it would not smoke. One day while the county "Dads" were in session in the district-court room the old stove began to "smoke 'em out," and about that time Colonel Cooper came into the room. He punched the fire until he had the room full of smoke and then he put this conundrum to the crowd. "Why is this old stove like the County Dads?" No one could answer it. "Because it smokes all day and is out all night," responded Cooper.

A PRAIRIE FIRE

We have already mentioned the names of T. W. Dean, Leroy Leep and Gus Cosler. A peculiar incident happened to these parties on November 20, 1875, after the settlement in the precinct. About three o'clock in the morning Mr. Dean was awakened from a sound sleep, and discovered that his room was as light as day—the whole heavens seemed to be on fire. He sprang out of bed, gathered his pants, and proceeded to put them on. At this moment Gus Cosler came dashing up shouting "fire! fire! fire!" It was a prairie fire coming from the northwest—a grand and awful sight, never to be forgotten. Property and life were at stake. The head fire was coming on in the west of them at the speed of a race horse. A stiff gale was blowing from the northwest. One hundred yards in advance of the main body of fire, Dean had turned his horses loose, and they proceeded south toward the river. A pony was lariatied near the house and Lee Leep, then being present, quickly mounted the animal and followed the loose horses, the only hope being to find them and drive them east across a piece of breaking before the fire reached them. He almost reached the place where he knew the horses were, after having left the strip of breaking which was just mentioned. Just as he came to a deep ravine, he saw the flames shoot twenty feet high and dash madly forward. Being too far from the river to make his escape in that direction, he wheeled his horse through the blinding smoke and madly lashed him toward the strip of breaking. Blinded with smoke, burned by fire, and almost suffocated, he reached the breaking, hands and face burned, hair and eye-brows scorched, panting and exhausted. After the fire had passed, one of the horses was found on the river bank, so badly burned that it lived but a few days. The other ran into the river and made its way nearly to the opposite side, where it became mired in the quick sand and was found during the day by Mr. Dean. The neighbors were summoned, and an effort was made to save the beast, but it was so bruised and burned that after trying to get it out for half a day it had to be killed.

This left Mr. Dean without a team, but this matter was adjusted, however. Gus Cosler had an ox team, but no wagon, so they formed a partnership. Dean furnished the wagon and Cosler the team, and thus they succeeded in getting along until they could devise means to do otherwise.

TWIN TRAGEDIES

Ex-Judge H. J. Shinn is to be credited with this recital of a double tragedy which occurred on the table land of Cummings Park in 1883 and 1885, by which two respected citizens of the park met their death in a way so similar that the coincidence is remarkable.

The park is an elevated portion of the precinct, and wells to the depth of 200 feet or more are the rule, while there are some wells that would exceed 250 feet. In the first settlement of this locality the well or water question was a very perplexing one. It was known that the whole country contained sheet water on a certain level, and of course on hill land it was farther to water than on low land. Settlers were poor and as a rule were unable to bear the expense of a hydraulic or a casting well, as they now have it. As a consequence they resorted to digging wells, even at that great depth, casing them with lumber through the sand and gravel, and drawing or elevating the water by means of a horse, or two horses, as the case might be, with a rope extending over pulleys, attached to a half barrel, with a valve in the bottom. Among those who had wells as above described were Samuel Abernathy and James Cummings, and by reason of that fact a sad coincidence happened. In the fall of 1883 Samuel Abernathy caused a well to be dug on his premises to the depth of 196 feet, having procured an inexhaustible supply of water. Soon after its construction, one morning, while attempting to draw water, the bucket, or barrel, caught at the bottom of the well against the curb. Mr. Abernathy, thinking that it would be necessary to go to the bottom of the well to unfasten the bucket, there being no rope convenient except the one that the bucket was fastened to, told his brother that he could fasten the rope at the top and twine it around his foot and slide to the bottom of the well. His brother protested against such a hazardous undertaking, but to no avail, and he at once attempted to make the descent. After having proceeded about six feet from the top of the well his hold gave way and he fell to the bottom of the well, 196 feet. To the surprise of his brother he was found to be alive and conscious. Help was summoned, and on investigation it was found that by his falling into the bucket or barrel he had jarred it loose, whereupon he gave orders that he was able to hold on to the bucket or rope until they could raise him from the well. They proceeded to draw him up, and to the surprise of all they were successful in doing this, landing him at the top conscious, yet badly bruised and mangled, one arm broken in several places, his legs broken and his body badly bruised.

Although everything was done that could possibly be done for his comfort, he only lived about four hours.

Later on, in September, 1885, James Cummings, one of Cummings Park's respected citizens, met with a sad and similar fate to the one just narrated. Soon after his settlement he caused a well to be dug after the style of the one mentioned above, but to the depth of 210 feet. This well had been dug for about three years, and Mr. Cummings, thinking that possibly the curb had become rotten to such an extent that it would be necessary to recurb, said to his wife one morning that he would hitch a team to the end of the rope and tie a stick to the other end, and she might let him down in the well for the purpose of examining it. Thereupon the rope was drawn out its full length, laid upon the ground, one end extending over the pulley and tied in the center of a stick about two feet long, and a team was hitched to the other end, face from the well.

Mr. Cummings, taking a small stick in his hand, and sitting on the stick and astride the rope, directed his wife to back the team and let him down slowly. Slowly and slowly the team backed. The wife could hear the rapping of the stick on the curb until within about ten feet of the bottom of the well she heard the cry of "stop!" Then again she heard the rapping of the stick on the curb, then instantly came loud and clear a tremendous crash. The wife, well knowing the cause, instantly screamed at the team, but they could not raise the husband from the earth that had fallen upon him. She hastened to the well and called to her husband, but no response was heard. She called again and again, but everything was as still as death. Excited and terror-stricken, she called for help. Friends and neighbors, hearing her cry, hurried to the rescue. What could be done? Buried alive two hundred feet below the surface of the earth! News of the disaster spread like wild fire. Stout men and sympathizing women hurried to the scene to lend such aid as might be necessary. On investigation it was found that the well had caved in for a distance of over twenty feet, leaving a large cavity above Mr.

Cummings. After examining the situation, it was decided to send for one William Garlock, who was an experienced well man. During this time nothing was done, but upon his arrival he took charge of the rescuing, and said that it would be necessary to procure lumber to recurb the portion caved in; consequently teams were sent to West Union, and the work of rescuing proceeded as rapidly as possible. He first directed that it would be necessary to shovel dirt into the well for the purpose of filling up the cavity before proceeding with the digging. After this was done and the curb cut, ready to place in the well, Mr. Garlock, with the aid of helpers, proceeded to uncover the doomed man. At this time he was covered with dirt to the depth of about twenty feet. Soon after the digging began, Mr. Garlock reported that Mr. Cummings was alive, for he could hear him breathing. This was a great surprise to the friends and neighbors who were so anxiously waiting. The work proceeded with more rapidity than before, and report after report came up from the well digger that Mr. Cummings was still alive. After about ten hours of constant work the head of the doomed man was uncovered, and to the surprise of all it was found that he was conscious and able to give instructions. Slowly, slowly and persistently, the noble well-digger proceeded, until the entire body down below the knees was uncovered.

At this time everybody was anxiously listening for orders to pull the doomed man to the top, but instead a voice was heard from below: "Let the rope down! I want to come up!" The rope was quickly let down and the well man taken from the well. Everybody wondered what was the matter, and gathered about him for information. He told them that he could do no more; that the man's feet were under the curb, and that he could not extend his curb on account of the dry ground — that if he undertook to dig below the curb, as he would have to do in order to get his feet out, the ground would run in and cause the well to cave, and that it could not possibly be done. He further said that the only thing that could be done was to fasten a rope around him and pull him loose by force; that there was one chance of saving his life in this way, but that he was entirely exhausted, and could do nothing more. Another man being present who had some experience in well-making, volunteered to go down and fasten the rope around him. After this was done, as many as twenty-five men took hold of the rope above, and at a command, began pulling gradually, pulling harder and harder until the rope broke.

As quick as thought, some one present suggested that he had at his home a three-quarter rope that he thought was strong enough to pull him out, and accordingly some one was dispatched for the rope, and in a very short time returned with it. Again the well man descended and securely fastened the rope around the body, and again returned to the top of the well. On his arrival, as many men as could get hold of the rope did so, and at a command began pulling as before. Steady, stronger and stronger, they pulled until the body was released, every man falling to his knees, the rope having been drawn so tight that when he became loosened he was thrown up several feet. Orders were given to raise him fast, lest the well should again cave. After he was drawn out of danger, orders were given to go slow. This was done, and in a few seconds Mr. Cummings was at the top of the well, alive, rational, and able to tell his experience. He said that he did not realize that he had been in the well so long, although he was conscious all the time; that he knew when they were throwing dirt into the well, and knew when the well-man began digging; he thought, however, that the falling of the dirt in the well was a heavy thunder storm.

Dr. Wamsley was present and took charge of the case, but found it a bad one. The body was bruised, and the bowels so badly torn that inflammation set in and in four days the poor victim died. The accident happened about eight o'clock on Saturday morning, and it was two o'clock Sunday afternoon when Mr. Cummings was taken from the well. Thus he remained in the well about thirty hours, eighteen hours of this time being under ground a distance of about twenty feet, and his having lived while in this condition was due, doubtless, to the fact that an iron pipe, used for pumping purposes, was hanging in the well and his face was against it, thus affording him sufficient air to keep him alive.

This sad accident will ever be remembered by the old settlers of Cummings Park with sadness, as Mr. Cummings was one of our best citizens, and his untimely death cast a gloom of despair over the entire community.

A WATERMELON STAMPEDE

James E. Farley, who was in an early day one of Custer county's cowboys, and later one of our substantial citizens, followed Texas cattle and the trail to Ogallala in the spring of 1879 and from Ogallala shuffled into the South Loup country. He was employed for a time on the Finch-Hatton ranch and was familiar with all the famous characters who operated in the days of cattle. Aside from throwing side lights on the difficulty of handling wild cattle, he refers, in a worldly way, to watermelons:

"Cattle generally follow some leader, stringing out in single file, and they will follow the leader as long as he runs. If we were able to keep up with the leader or head him off we could get the cattle to going in a circle, and after a while to bunch them and get them stopped. Sometimes we were not able to get ahead of the cattle in a stampede, but had to follow alongside, catching glimpses of them when the lightning flashed, strung out a long distance ahead of us. Many of these cattle were five or six years old, had never been near a man since they were branded, and were as wild as a herd of buffaloes. When we started out with them the first week they were on the constant lookout to get away. After succeeding a few times, some of them became spoiled to such an extent that they had to be killed to keep them from demoralizing the rest of the herd. One time there were two cow camps of us holding cattle on the head of Cow creek. Jim Dalzell, a lone settler, had a fine watermelon patch and he told the cowboys that they could have all the melons they wanted, but some of the boys in the other camp thought it would be so much nicer to steal them, and our camp, in connection with one of their men, put up a job on them that caused all of us to have three weeks' extra work. We found out the time set by the boys of the other camp to make a raid on the melons, and stationed our men in the patch to welcome them when they entered. They soon made their appearance, tied their horses, and came over into the patch, Billy Kessler, the man in the plot, leading them right up to where we were hidden in a bunch of weeds. We had taken the balls out of our cartridges to prevent any accident in the darkness. 'Come over this way, boys; here's some fine ones,' shouted Billy, as he led them toward us. We could hear them scrambling, through the melon vines, thumping the melons as they came. When within a few feet of us, we sprang out with a yell and 'bang, bang, bang,' went the revolvers. Billy bravely held his ground, returning our fire, but the other boys took to their heels, dashed through the creek, with us after them, and firing at every jump. In their fright they rushed through both herds of cattle. The cattle stampeded and scampered away over the prairie and it took us three weeks to get them together again after this adventure."

IT KILLED THE TOAD

Uncle Swain Finch, as he was familiarly called by those who knew him in his pioneer days, was one of the unique characters of the early times. Things seemed to happen at his place. He and his family have furnished the details of some very interesting stories. Some of the boys tell this one on him.

A funny incident happened at one time while they were "keeping batch" for a short time at the new ranch they were opening up. One morning the cook had an extra fine brew of coffee, and all showed their appreciation of it by drinking more than usual. Uncle Swain had passed his cup the third or fourth time, when he observed something white in the coffee pot. He remarked:

"Say, Jim, where did you get the egg to clear yer coffee with this morning?"

"Didn't have any egg," grumbled Jim, who appeared to be a little out of sorts and not in a talkative mood.

"What's the use of yer lyin' about it, Jim; I seed it when you was pourin' out that last cup of coffee."

"You didn't, nuther," snapped Jim.

The Finch boys had as a guest a stylish friend from Iowa, and he was called upon to examine the coffee-pot to settle the dispute between Uncle Swain and the cook. The young man poured the grounds out in the yard and made a critical examination. He gave a sort of convulsive gasp, turned deathly pale, placed his hand near the region of his stomach, and disappeared around the house. The antics of the young fellow caused the others to push their unfinished cups aside. Uncle Swain alone excepted—and to make an investigation of the contents of the coffee pot. Among the grounds they discovered a large, warty toad, swollen to three times his natural size. The old fellow had evidently climbed up between the logs of the cabin and fallen into the coffee-pot, which sat close to the wall and had no lid.

DAN GOT THE LOGS

Along in the '80s and early '90s, when crop failures were the regular order, it was a common thing for homesteaders to prove up on their claims, mortgage them for the high dollar and then pack their belongings and start for wife's people back in God's country, as they used to call it. The settler was not decently out of sight before the neighbors would swarm in on that ranch and proceed to gather up all wood and posts, lumber, etc., that could be found. They generally pulled the roof off the sod house to get the planks or the cedar poles, as the case might be, which had been supporting the roof sod. In this connection an amusing incident occurred in the sand hills up at the head of Ortello valley. There were two characters in that community whom the old settlers would recognize if they are merely called Tom Doe and Daniel Blank. Tom had rather a shady reputation—he had been a lawyer and several other things which Dan said were fully as bad. These men did not get along well. When they met in the road the conversation was generally not printable. Tom got into debt as deeply as possible and also became involved in several shady transactions. When he heard rumors of a warrant for his arrest he abandoned his claim. Unfortunately he had been so busy during the day that he didn't get ready to leave until after dark.

A day or so later old Dan, riding past, observed that the place was abandoned and made up his mind that he would even up the scores as far as possible that night. He left his team and wagon some little distance from Tom's house and went on foot to see how the land lay. He had not yet reached the house when he heard the rattle of an approaching wagon and two men drove up to the house and immediately climbed up on the roof and began to shovel off the clay and sod. Old Dan kept out of sight until the roof was cleared and the planks and poles pulled off and thrown on to the ground ready for loading into the wagon, then he jumped out of his hiding place, let out a howl that would have raised the dead and wanted to know what in blankety, blankety, blank was going on? The men sprang into their wagons and whipped their horses away at a gallop. When they were well out of hearing old Dan loaded up the poles and planks and hauled them home.

INDIAN SCARES

Captain W. H. Comstock is responsible for this one:

"In the spring of 1875 a man by the name of Eberlin, with his wife and a companion by the name of Hancock, started on a hunting trip up the Middle Loup river. When about eight miles above our settlement their attention was called to the peculiar antics of a horseman on the east side of the river. He was riding at a furious pace, coatless and hatless, with his long hair streaming in the wind behind him as he flew along. The hunting party was badly frightened and immediately started back to the settlement, arriving there with their team covered with foam. As soon as they were able to tell a rational story, they reported that they had seen Indians on the east side of the river. Every settler was at once notified, a council held, and a decision reached to proceed at once to make preparations for the protection of the settlement against an attack from the red men. Volunteers were called for to go to Fort Hartsuff and notify Captain Munson, the commander, and ask him to send two or three regiments of soldiers down. D. B. Allen offered to perform this duty, while four or five others volunteered to go up the river to investigate the story told by the hunters. All were instructed to ride all night and report at eight o'clock the next morning. It was laughable to see Ben Allen as he started for the fort, and a photograph of him taken at that time would be a most valuable contribution to this history. His dress suit consisted of an old pair of blue overalls, with a heavy fringe around the bottom, he was barefooted, and had on no other clothing except a striped shirt and an old straw hat. He was mounted, bareback, upon an old horse belonging to Mr. Higgins. About eight o'clock the next morning the people met to consult and to hear the report of the scouts when they should return. Soon a solitary horseman was seen coming from the direction of the river, and four or five others from the north.

"The single horseman proved to be the valiant Ben, and before he was fairly within speaking distance he shouted: 'It's all right, General Munson said if we were killed by Indians to let him know and he would come over and give them h——!' The other party now rode into camp and reported that they were unable to discover any Indians, but they had found out that the horseman who had frightened the hunters was a half-crazy fellow who lived on the east side of the river. The news was a great relief to the settlers, but they nevertheless decided to build a fort where all could congregate in case of any sudden attack from the savages. It was afterward named Fort Disappointment, for the reason that no Indians ever appeared.

THE GRASSHOPPER A BURDEN

The Scripture says that "the grasshopper shall be a burden," and its prophecy came true in Custer county. The following experience of Swain Finch will illustrate the fulfillment.

In the spring of 1870 the boys planted about sixty acres of sod corn, which was just beginning to make fine roasting ears, when one afternoon they discerned what appeared to be a prairie fire, a dense cloud of smoke arising in the northwest. They wondered at a prairie fire at that time of the year, when the grass was green. They watched it intently as it came nearer and nearer, until it obscured the sun and darkened the air like an eclipse. When it had come within a hundred yards of them they heard a continuous cracking and snapping sound, which increased to a perfect roar as it approached them, when they discovered to their horror that a cloud of grasshoppers was upon them. The insects alighted, and in a few seconds every green thing in sight was literally covered and hidden with a seething, crawling mass, several inches in depth. The beautiful field of corn melted down as if each leaf was a spray of hoar frost in the rays of the noonday sun. Uncle Swain was dumbfounded for a moment, but when he saw that corn fading he came to his senses, cut a large willow brush and went after those grasshoppers with a vengeance. He proceeded down a corn row, threshing to right and left, killing his thousands with every sweep, and mowing a swath of death in his track. When he had gone about a hundred yards he stopped to get his breath and discovered to his extreme disgust that there were as many grasshoppers behind him as there were ahead. This disheartened him and he gave it up as a hopeless task. The hoppers ate up everything in the shape of grain and garden stuff on the place, leaving it as brown and bare as if it had been swept by fire. They would settle on a post the thickness of a man's arm, and in a few seconds it would appear to be as big as a log. When the hoppers left it it would look as if it had been scraped with a knife, every vestige of bark and fiber being eaten off. Aunt Sarah and her sister-in-law had a fine patch of cabbages which they thought to save by covering the plants with hay; but the hay served only as a convenient shade for the hoppers, who crawled under it and dined off the juicy cabbage heads at their leisure. They then laid the hay around the patch and burned it, thinking to smoke the pests away, but to no avail. When they left that cabbage patch nothing remained but a few bare stalks, eaten almost to the ground.

A LAND QUARREL

In all new countries in which men are homesteading there are bound to be quarrels over homesteads, lines, and entries. This county has been no exception. Hundreds of incidents, like or similar to the one following could be recited, but they are a minor part of actual history, and have still less to do with county development.

One George Hartley located in section 23, township 18, range 23, in the summer of 1880, although he had not made a filing on the claim. He rented it to one Sipes and went away to work on the railroad. In the summer Hartley came back and wanted possession of the land. Sipes refused to vacate until his crop was harvested, but he allowed Hartley to go ahead and make such improvements as he saw fit. During the summer and fall the two men had a number of quarrels, and when it came time to gather the corn,* Sipes refused to gather Hartley's share. This resulted in a violent quarrel, and in the encounter that followed Hartley attacked Sipes with a knife and cut him so badly that his liver was exposed. Hartley left the county, thinking that he had killed Sipes, but the latter recovered, followed Hartley, but up to date has never heard a word as to his whereabouts.

GRASSHOPPERS CHEWED TOBACCO

Captain Comstock takes the floor to tell this one:

"At Loup City we became acquainted with B. D. Allen and Sherman Wagner. We all started in April, 1874, and drove to Douglas Grove, where we selected our homesteads and commenced to improve them, but just as the ears of corn began to form, the grasshoppers appeared, and in a few hours completely ate up every green thing. In the edge of a draw Uncle Dave had some tobacco plants which were very choice, and he anticipated the pleasure of smoking the weed of his own raising the coming winter. But, alas! his hopes were blasted. He covered the plants with anything he could get, but the festive hoppers ate holes in the covering and chewed Uncle Dave's tobacco as long as it lasted.

"The settlers were left entirely destitute, not having produced a thing for the support of themselves and their families during the winter. The government at this time had troops stationed at a point about nine miles above Ord, the county seat of Valley county, and it had been decided to erect more commodious quarters for the soldiers. There was plenty of sand and gravel, and work was commenced on the garrison. The walls were constructed of red cedar, of which there was an abundance in the canyons not far distant. A saw mill was put in operation and teams were hired to haul the logs and lumber, as well as all other material needed in constructing the fort. The settlers flocked in from all directions and were given employment by the government. Allen and myself and Caswell went over. Allen got a job working in the mill, while Caswell and I hauled gravel from the pit and assisted on the walls of the building."

THE SENATOR WAS NOT HANDSOME

A good story is told at the expense of Senator Frank M. Currie, who is not noted for his chesterfieldian appearance. During Currie's candidacy for state senator, Uncle Swain Finch was very energetic in his support of the senator, although he had never met him. Later, after the election was over, both met on the street and a friend introduced them. Currie was profuse in his thanks for the work that Uncle Swain had done for him. "Yes I voted for you," responded Swain, "but if I had known that you were so d—n homely I wouldn't have done it." They were the best of friends from that time until the death of Uncle Swain.

BURLIN AND KELLENBARGER HAVE SOME EXPERIENCE

Concerning early days when all goods had to be freighted from railroad towns in the eastern part of the state, the late Bradford Burlin wrote an account of a trip he made to the eastern part of the state in the year 1883. On this trip he fell in with Joe Kellenbarger from whom this manuscript was obtained and who vouches for its authenticity. This is the way Burlin tells it:

"Do any of these latter-day saints have any idea what a trip to the railroad meant in the early days, especially if one got caught in a storm? Now let me give you newcomers a correct account of one of these trips and if you should think that this picture is in any way overdrawn, just ask Mr. Joe Kellenbarger, who was there with me. In the latter part of July, 1883, I lived near New Helena. On the 11th of July a destructive hail storm destroyed sixty-five acres of corn, also the last vestige of our garden and all other crops. Being nearly out of supplies at the time, I concluded to start for the railroad for a few months' supply. And here the troubles of that trip began; my wife declared I was never going to the road again unless I washed my feet and put on socks. So I went down and waded in the creek for a while and came in and called for the socks but she had already made the discovery that I was short on socks to the extent that I lacked just one pair of having any, but she also made the discovery that she had one pair of those then, up-to-date, stockings, in red, white and blue rings or stripes, and looked like barber poles. She said they were so long she couldn't quite touch the bottom of them when she stood up in them, but when I came back they would need washing, and that would shrink them up so they would be right for her. So I donned the stockings and started. It rained almost continually until I got back. I went to our old home at Silver Creek, forty-four miles below Grand Island, and when I came back, left the railroad at Chapman and hit the trail eight miles further north. Here I fell in with another fellow who was not much more pleasantly situated than I. It was Joe Kellenbarger. He was trying to get back to Dale with lumber with which to make some show of building on his claim. As we were both going to practically the same place, we soon became quite chummy and between showers cussed and discussed matters in general, but a storm was on and it was slow traveling.

"One day Joe said that if we could only make it to Gregory's that day, that Gregory had a roof that did not leak and we would have one night without being drowned. So we pushed our teams all day and got there just before sundown. There were six or seven covered wagons in the yard and a raft of women and children around the house, so we figured that a dry bed was out of the question. We said we would water our teams and drive out on the prairie and camp. While we were watering the teams, a young lady, of perhaps eighteen or twenty, came down to the well to scrape acquaintance and she told us they were a colony from Missouri, twenty-nine of them. They were most all relatives to the Gregorys except two that sat out on a log, who were two old maids that had come along to look for land, but she thought they were looking for a man about as much as they were for land. All of the men had gone out in the hills hunting to kill some elk or deer, for they were out of meat.

A RACE THROUGH THE STORM

"We drove about one hundred rods and camped on a side hill. There was a storm brewing in the north but as that could not be helped, we fed and staked our horses. We spread Joe's tent cloth over the wagon-pole, took off our coats and boots and crawled under and got a nice sleep until about twelve o'clock, when the worst thunder, lightning, and rain storm that I ever experienced came up. First we were drowned from the under side, then the wind blew the tent cloth away and we were drowned from the upper side, and there we were without coats, boots, or hats. We ran for the house. Joe had on just plain Nebraska, three-for-a-quarter socks. The mud began to stick to our feet, making our socks so heavy that every time we took a step they would slip down a few inches. Joe's being short, he had not gone but a few rods until he got clear of them entirely, and in every flash of lightning I could see him going down the road, running like a jack rabbit; sometimes he was up in the air and sometimes on the ground. Those long zebras of mine went to playing the same trick and pulled off until there was about a yard hanging to each foot, loaded with mud. They kept flopping in front of me. I could not run around them nor jump over them, nor get away from them. I had to stop there in the rain and climb on those rings and get out at the top. Then there was another jack rabbit show down the road, but I made time and caught up with Joe just as he got to the door. He did not wait to knock but pushed the door open and went in stumbling, and was in the middle of the room before he could stop.

SOMETHING OF A "MIX-UP"

"Now talk about the thunder and lightning, here is where they both had to take a back seat. We found that all the men and boys had come in from hunting and had made their colony bed on the floor. The bed was just as big as the floor and when they all got to bed it was just full and Joe was treading around right in the middle of it. The men were hollowing, 'Who is there?' and 'What is wanted?' and the two old maids that were way over in one corner were piping out 'Man in the house. There's a man in the house.' We finally succeeded in getting them all quiet except two or three of the children whom Joe had been walking on. I called for a light so we could see something, then away went the old maids again. They said there was not going to be any light. It was a pretty mess and with strange men in the house they didn't want a light. They added that if that was the kind of carryings-on they had out west they would go straight back to Missouri. But some one got a light and I started to apologize for Joe's getting into the bed with his muddy feet, but they said never mind apologies, they were glad we came in and they wanted to talk with us about Nebraska.

"We stayed an hour or more, until the worst of the storm was over, and told them plenty about Nebraska. Don't remember whether any of it was true or not. They insisted on our staying all night, but we said we would go back to the wagons and see if any of our horses were dead or loose, but might come back and stay until daylight. We started out, it was still raining some, and we got into that cold mud and Joe got into some cactus, so both said, 'Let's go back and stay until morning.' Joe said there was one or two of those fellows that he did not like the looks of, and believed they would just as soon go through a fellow's pockets as not, but those two old maids were mighty nice people. He said, 'We will go back and lay down, if we can find room, and you go to sleep for a while and I will keep one eye open, then I will wake you up and I will take a nap.' We went back in and the boss of the colony hustled them around until they got a little room in one corner and told us we could get over there and lie down. The boss asked if we were all right and we said we were, so he said: 'Some one turn out the light,' and away went the old maids again. They said the light was not going to be put out. It was bad enough with strange men in the bed, and to put the light out would be worse. They talked some more about going back to Missouri. But they fixed the matters up among themselves and, I believe, turned the light partly out. The last I remembered, Joe was telling me something about going to sleep with one eye open, and then waking me up, but I went to sleep with both eyes shut and the next thing I woke and it was broad daylight. I looked over at Joe and if I ever saw a man that I thought was dead it was he; and for a minute or two if ever any fellow wished he was in Custer county and had stayed in Custer county it was I.

NEARLY RUINED HIS EYE

"Just then Joe gave a little snore and I saw that he 'was not dead but sleeping.' He had one eye open all the same and that was twisted around in the socket so that it was looking at right angles with his nose and was pointing straight over to that corner where the old maids were. Then the other side of the situation presented itself to me and I got to laughing, and the more I tried to stop the more I couldn't stop. Finally Joe woke up and wanted to know what the matter was and seemed to be quite grouchy. He said if we could not behave ourselves we had better leave and not wake the whole house up, so we crawled out, Joe very quietly and I as much so as I could. I couldn't keep from looking at Joe and every time I looked at him I had to laugh. Finally he said, 'What is the matter with you, man, are you drunk or going crazy?' I said, 'Why, man, don't you know that one of your eyes is cross-legged?' He said it didn't feel altogether right and guessed he must have strained it keeping watch last night. We kept a sharp lookout for our socks on the way back to the wagons but the water had carried them away and we never found them."

HARD WINTERS AND HARD TIMES

THE BLACK WINTER OF 1880-81 — A TOUGH TIME IN 1880 — HEAVY LOSSES — AS THINGS LOOKED TO BISHOP — ACCIDENTS AND TRAGEDIES — NO CHRISTMAS PRESENTS — AN EARLY BLIZZARD — DOWN TWICE BUT NOT OUT — FROZEN TO DEATH IN POWELL CANYON — THE BLIZZARD OF 1888 — A HARD TIMES CHRISTMAS — CHRISTMAS ENTERTAINMENTS IN THE VARIOUS CHURCHES IN BROKEN BOW — FILLED UP ON CHRISTMAS — THE GLOVERS WEATHER NINETY-FOUR — DIDN'T CARRY OFF THE MORTGAGE — FOURTH OF JULY HAILSTORM — DRY NINETY-FOUR — HE WON OUT — HAD TO BE HELPED — POOR BUT HAPPY — A HOME-GROWN CYCLONE — WORST BLIZZARD IN THIRTY YEARS — SHEEP PERISH IN TRANSIT

During the early years of any country hard winters and hard times are twin born. No way by which they can be divorced has been invented by any genius yet born. Hard winters, when people are ill-prepared, insure hardships and privations. The brave pioneers of Custer county weathered their share of storms and endured their proper quota of hard times.

The first houses were poorly constructed, fuel was exceedingly scarce, warm clothing was not over-abundant, the heating plant was often the kitchen stove, the country was open, without groves or wind brakes, and under these conditions weather that could hardly be reckoned as cold under present conditions, was considered then very severe and oppressive. Feed was scarce, stock unsheltered, or, at best, poorly sheltered, and all these things combined to entail hardships which none but the brave could endure and conquer.

Hats off in the presence of those men and women who stemmed the tide of early winters, who met, without grumbling or complaining, the conditions of early days, lived to enjoy the steam-heated, plastered house, and who ride through the winters of the present time wrapped in flannels and furs and snugly ensconced in a stove-warmed auto, into which the northern blasts can bring no discomforts.

It serves them right. Their pioneering years have earned all the comforts the present day can bring them.

In presenting this chapter on hard winters and hard times the stories of old settlers have been compiled. The people who endured the storms and years tell their own stories.

THE BLACK WINTER OF 1880-1

The winter of 1880-81 will never be forgotten by those engaged in the cattle business in Custer county. Men who in the beginning of that winter were wealthy, found themselves bankrupt in the spring.

Early in the winter a rain began falling. The grass became thoroughly saturated; then it suddenly turned cold, and every stalk, spear and blade of grass at once became an icicle — all matted together in one sheet of solid ice. Immediately following this came a heavy snow, from ten to twelve inches deep, which was again followed by another rain, and this in turn by another sudden cold wave, the result of which was to cover the surface of the snow with a thick, strong crust.

The country was covered with ice and snow until spring. The winter was very severe, the temperature ranging for days and weeks at from ten to twenty below zero. The conditions were such that it was almost impossible for the cattle to get to the grass. The winds, which ordinarily blew the snow off the hills and left the grass thereon free to the cattle, could not affect this solid body of ice and snow.

The legs of the cattle, traveling about in a famished condition seeking food, soon became bruised and bleeding from contact with the sharp crust on the snow. There was plenty of feed on the ground, but the cattle could not get at it. They died by the hundreds and thousands. It was estimated that from seventy-five to ninety per cent. of the cows and calves on the range perished that winter and sixty per cent. of the steers also perished. They lay in piles behind the hills where they had sought shelter.

The following spring many who had engaged in the business in Custer county, and who until this winter had believed there was no grazing country equal to it, quit the business in disgust and left the county.

Nothing like this winter had preceded it in the history of the country, and nothing like it has been experienced since.

A TOUGH TIME IN 1880

H. Lomax, who at the present time is a resident of Broken Bow and prominent in Custer county banking activities, has served his time as an early settler, and concerning his experiences makes the following statement:

"My first introduction to the South Loup river occurred in April, 1880, at a point about half a mile above the mouth of Ash creek. Having made the journey from Plum Creek in a heavily loaded wagon, we struck the river just as the sun was sinking into the western prairie and tinging the tops of the eastern hills with a glow of red. The log shanty in which we intended to camp was on the other side of the stream, and we started across. Before proceeding ten feet our team stopped and the wagon settled to the axles in quicksand, the water gently washing the bottom of the wagon box. A portage was necessary, and not only was the cargo all carried across, but we had to wade back and forth with the different parts of the wagon, taking out a wheel at a time. Having at length arrived at our destination, cold, wet, and weary, we proceeded to prepare our supper. Our log shanty, in the middle of a dense grove of cottonwood and willow, had the river on one side and a bayou on the other. Before supper was ready a whirr of wings called me to the door. O, land of ducks! Hundreds were there before me of all colors and sizes — flying, swimming, diving, in the security of their ignorance. After this, duck was too common a food to be mentioned in our cuisine. Our shanty had been shingled with cow-hides, thrown on the roof. During the night a cold north wind whistled through the crevices between the logs of our dwelling, which had not been chinked, and we arose, took off the roof covering and pinned the hides up against the wall to serve as siding. After this, whenever it rained we put the hides on the roof to keep out the water and when it blew we put them on the side of the house to keep out the wind — a very simple and effective device which furnished additional proof of the truth of the old saying that 'necessity is the mother of invention.' One of the settlers in this part of the country was Saul Garringer. He was a perfect architect in the construction of dugouts, and he evolved from the original trapper's hole in the ground a series of apartments which lacked only electric lights and steam heat to make them equal to any modern palatial residence. Whenever he was not making a new dugout he was building some addition to the old one. He was also a lineal descendant of Nimrod of old, and hunted exclusively with the rifle. He it was who gave me the first clear conception of the possibilities of rifle-shooting. While hunting ducks with him one day he observed that I always aimed at the body of the bird; he explained to me that this cut the flesh up too much, and that he always hit them in the head.

"The spring of 1880 was extremely dry, so dry that the wheat in the Platte valley refused to sprout, and had to be plowed up and corn planted in its place. On the third day of July it began to rain and the rest of the summer was excessively wet. August 10th a cloudburst occurred in the vicinity now occupied by the village of Callaway, which caused a serious flood in the South Loup and Wood river valleys. The Loup bottoms were running with three or four feet of water for twelve hours, and the fringes of willows that lined the river banks were filled with cedar posts and rails that had been washed down from the corrals of ranches above. The rain, which fell during the greater portion of September, turned in October to snow, which continued to fall in enormous quantities all winter. During the fall, the work of the beaver, which was plentiful along the river, amounted to a veritable massacre of the timber which lined the banks. During the months of October and November they could be seen working in droves, preparing for the long winter which their instinct warned them was coming on.

"Thousands of sheep had been driven into the country during the summer of 1880, and the winter which followed left in many cases not more than twenty per cent. of the herds alive. After a severe snowstorm in October and cold weather in November, the ice on the river was strong enough to bear heavy loads. The real winter snow began to fall December 16th, and from that time until March the ground had a covering of eighteen inches on the level, with drifts twenty feet deep. The wind was almost continuous and the cold at times intense. The cloudy days were unusually numerous for Nebraska. In December the clear days amounted to seventeen, in January sixteen, in February eighteen. The average temperature at eight o'clock a.m. in December was 33; in January 25.9; in February 30.4. Cattle on the range stood day after day, week after week, chewing leaves, twigs, branches, and bark, until the trees were eaten bare as high as a cow could reach, and the branches were chewed so they looked like frayed ropes. Thousands of the poor animals died, and it has always been a mystery to me how any survived. In the spring many of them which survived lost their horns and hoofs, which had been frozen, and dropped off when the thaw came. When the ice broke up in the river it was a month before it could be crossed in safety. John McGinn was then located two miles up Ash creek, where the Plattsmouth ranch now is. He had purchased some corn in Wood river valley but was unable to haul it across the Loup river, and it had to be dragged across with a rope, one sack at a time. At that time there was not a bridge across the Loup in Custer county."

HEAVY LOSSES

It is estimated that sixty to sixty-five per cent. of range cattle perished during the winter of 1880-81, which until the present time is referred to by old settlers as "The Hard Winter."

Blessings sometimes come in ill-shaped disguise. It was so in this case. The enormous loss of stock put the cattlemen out of business and delivered the range over to the settler and his breaking-plow. The growing feud between the rancher and the settler was over. This was to be an agricultural rather than a range country. This decree was written irrevocably on the white banks of the drifted snow during the winter and fulfilled in the yellow harvests that have succeeded each other since that winter.

AS THINGS LOOKED TO BISHOP

The following is taken from a July, 1918, issue of the Custer County Chief and describes the impression Custer county made on a visitor who came here in March, 1881:

"J. C. Bishop, brother of the late E. N. Bishop, of Gates, arrived in this city Friday of last week, from Boston. In a conversation he told of the first time he saw Custer county. He came to Nebraska from Virginia, upon the solicitation of his brother, to enter the cattle business in the winter of 1881. March 1, 1881, he arrived in Broken Bow, coming overland from Grand Island. A big blizzard had just passed over the country. Cattle were dead by the thousands, frozen to death in the willows along the streams. Mr. Bishop says he thought he saw at least 100,000 in all before he got to his brother's place. The cattle business did not look good to him, notwithstanding old settlers told him that every winter would not be like the last. But he contended that he might work for years and then lose all his increase in one storm, so accordingly he returned to Virginia. He states now that he was never more surprised than by the progress and development of this country. He declares that the climate is different entirely and he attributes the change to the number of trees which now are to be found everywhere."

ACCIDENTS AND TRAGEDIES

Trials and hardships are the common heritage of all pioneers. In March, 1878, J. F. Henderson, from Harrison county, Missouri, settled on Lillian creek. February 27, 1879, he went into Hunter's Shanty canyon to cut cedar for fuel and posts. He had nearly completed his day's work when in felling a twenty-two inch tree it turned on its stump as it fell, in such a way as to strike Mr. Henderson, throwing him down the steep canyon side, where he struck on a pile of brush. His left arm was broken in two places, his left hip dislocated and the leg broken below the knee. In this condition, with snow on the ground, he lay from sundown until after sunrise the next morning, when he was found by his wife. Unable to move him in any way, she went for help to the nearest residence, that of her daughter, Mrs. James Oxford. It was noon when, with oxen and a wagon, they came back and the bruised and broken sufferer was taken a mile to the home of James Oxford. To get help was the next thing, and remembering that three trappers had been at the mouth of Lillian creek, Mrs. Oxford started for the camp, two miles away. One man was there, and when she told him of the accident to her father and asked him to go for help to the nearest neighbor's place, on Victoria creek, eight miles distant, the trapper said: "I know how to sympathize with you, for I lost my wife and child in a blizzard." He started on his sixteen-mile run, and came back the next morning with Isaac and Temp Merchant. Temp was dispatched for the nearest doctor, having to go to Loup City, fifty miles down the river. Dr. Hawkins reached the Oxford home Sunday morning, the fourth day after the accident, under the influence of liquor, and incompetent to do the surgical work required. Running his hand hastily over the broken leg, he said: "Your leg is all right, but the arm will have to be amputated." With knife and saw he cut the arm square off, took two or three stitches from skin to skin across the freshly cut flesh, and said it was all that was necessary for him to do. Mr. Merchant insisted that the leg was broken and must be dressed. With reluctance, the doctor roughly tried to put the broken bones in place and bound them with splints, then left for his home. Seven months Mr. Henderson lay in that pioneer home, unable to get from his bed, when he was moved to Mrs. Comstock's home. Every settler from Loup City to Victoria creek vied with each other in rendering kindness to the sufferer. Connected with this incident is the pathetic death of little Daisy Oxford, the pet granddaughter of Mr. Henderson. A slender child of eighteen months, she sat at his bedside on the Saturday before the doctor came; rocking forward, she, in some way, caught the bail of the tea kettle, sitting on the edge of the stove, and the contents of boiling water was poured over her head and hands. The little sufferer, under the care of Mrs. Comstock, who had been sent for, lived nearly a week. Mr. Eubank preached her funeral sermon, and then remained four days, expecting to be called to preach the funeral of Mr. Henderson. Mr. Henderson did not die but lived to express his gratitude to the old settlers who filled the office of good Samaritan to him in those days.

NO CHRISTMAS PRESENTS

Another incident that speaks of the privations of the pioneer's life and his love for his family, was the death of Arnett, on the Bayhoffer place. Christmas was near, and there was no money to get the loved ones a present. The father took his gun, in which the breech pin was secured with a piece of wire, and went to the cornfield, thinking to get chickens to sell and buy Christmas presents. They found him next day with the breech pin blown through his head.

AN EARLY BLIZZARD

When C. W. Prettyman moved his family on to the new claim he had pre-empted in the Ash creek valley in November of 1886, he domiciled the family in an improvised shack while he was building a more substantial sod mansion. The shack was made by setting up two-by-fours on the ground in roof or V shape and covering them with shiplap. The gable ends were closed up by nailing up the wagon-covers.

On the 15th of November a snow storm set in, and before night it developed into one of the worst blizzards the country has ever known. He relates the experience of himself and family during the storm, as follows:

"The snow fell into our roof house like meal through a sieve. The situation was very serious and I was actually afraid that my wife and little ones would be frozen to death. I had sent my oldest son over to Mr. King's to look after the horses before dark, and I hoped that he would remain there all night and that they would come and rescue us in the morning. In this I was not disappointed. Soon after daybreak we saw them coming, plowing their way through the snow. I had slid out of my bed under the eaves of my roof, where I had laid under a sprinkle of snow about eighteen inches deep, and after digging around in a snowbank piled up in a corner I unearthed a suit of clothes and a pair of boots, which I got into. I then waded through another drift to the stove, dug it out and started a fire. By this time the wagon of Mr. King had arrived and we dug the children out from under their covering of snow, steaming like pigs in a straw stack, piled them in the wagon and set off for Mr. King's, under whose hospitable roof we stayed until the storm was over. When we returned to our shanty it was full of snow, which I scooped out and got out dry goods. Soon afterward we finished our house, having to cut the frozen sod with an ax."

DOWN TWICE BUT NOT OUT

M. E. Brandenburg came from Saratoga, New York, in March, 1878, and started a cattle ranch at the mouth of Sand creek, on the south side of the Middle Loup river, two and one-half miles southeast of the present site of Sargent.

He came at the beginning and has probably endured as many privations and hardships as the average pioneer. The hard winter of 1880-81 took from him his all, as it did that of many others, and he was compelled to begin life anew. He went to work by the month to get a new start, and had succeeded very well — when, in the early '90s, a series of disasters — an unfortunate business venture, the loss of his hogs by cholera, and nearly all of his cattle through chronic abortion, together with the loss of his crops — again floored him and left him a bankrupt at the beginning of 1895. A change in the tide of his affairs then turned the current into the channel of prosperity, and in a few years he had one of the best stock farms in central Nebraska, the same comprising nearly 600 acres, valued at $8,000, and an equipment worth very nearly as much more, including one of the best herds of short-horns in the state, roadster, horses, a splendid drove of hogs and the necessary complement of farming implements, — all accumulated during the last eight years. Verily, the resources of the average Nebraskan are almost boundless.

FROZEN TO DEATH IN POWELL CANYON

In speaking of hard winters and hard times J. D. Haskell stands sponsor for the truth of the following account:

Elisha W. Clark, a hunter and trapper, was frozen to death in Powell canyon, northeast of Arnold, in December, 1879. Clark had been a colonel in the war of the rebellion, was a widower, and had for a number of years followed hunting and trapping for a livelihood. He established his camp in Powell canyon on December 2d, his only companions being his team and a couple of large greyhounds. About a week afterward he was seen by a cedar hunter on his way to Mr. Goodyear's hay stacks after some hay for his team, and said that he intended to carry the hay in his arms to his camp, which was three miles away. No more was thought of the trapper for some time by the few residents of the neighborhood, but one day the dead bodies of his two hounds were found near Mr. Goodyear's haystacks. The weather was intensely cold, and the ground was covered with snow, and it was feared that Clark might have shared the fate of time. They had gnawed the bark off the tree to which they were tied and eaten every bush and twig within reach. One of the horses had eaten off the limb to which he was tied, thus saving his life. The party scoured the vicinity thoroughly, without result. The county commissioners offered a reward of fifty dollars to anyone finding the body of Clark. During the following spring, while hunting for some horses, C. W. Hughey, of Arnold, came across the dead body of the unfortunate trap-

Powell Canyon, near Arnold, where some years ago a hunter and trapper lost his way and was frozen to death, his body not being found until the following spring that had apparently overtaken the dogs. A search was immediately instituted, but no trace of the missing man or his team could be found. On the 1st day of January a party of cedar haulers reported that they had found a wagon and two horses in one of the numerous pockets of Powell canyon, and a party went at once to the place, where they discovered the horses. One of the horses was dead and the other nearly so. As Clark had been missing for three weeks, it is supposed that the poor animals had been there about that length per, at the head of a small pocket in the canyon, his gun by his side. He had evidently died on his knees, apparently crawling into the narrow place to get such protection from the cold as its walls afforded.

It was nearly night when he had been seen at the stacks after hay, and it is the supposition that in attempting to return to his camp in the darkness he became bewildered in the maze of pockets that indent the canyon, until, overcome with weariness, he sank down and was frozen to death. The body was found five miles southwest of where his camp had been, and had he proceeded another mile in the direction in which he was apparently traveling when he succumbed, he would have come into the South Loup valley within sight of Chapin's ranch.

THE BLIZZARD OF 1888

Old settlers shiver yet, when the famous blizzard of January 12, 1888, is mentioned. That was one of the fiercest storms that ever struck the country. Shortly before noon the wind veered to the north and west and without warning came the whirl and swirl of a blinding blizzard, such as the old settlers of that time had not seen before. The thermometer dropped twenty degrees in almost as many minutes. Hundreds of people were caught away from home and thousands of cattle and horses were out on the fields and ranges without shelter. The storm was so blinding that stock could not be driven against the wind. Accordingly they drifted with the storm and many perished. It was almost impossible for a man to find his way through the blinding snow from the house to the barn, or from the barn back to the house. Teachers and children were caught in the school-houses and in many places stayed all night, and next day, in the school-house. If they happened to have fuel they were fortunate and suffered slight inconvenience.

The storm was general throughout the middle west. It raged, however, with greatest fury in the Dakotas and northern Nebraska. Many lives were lost and everywhere there was a great loss of stock. Custer county was fortunate, however, and no loss of human life was credited to this blizzard in this county. Many blizzards have swept the open prairies of central Nebraska, but the Custerites who weathered the blizzard of 1888 are past masters in the lore of storm, winds, and snow. During this blizzard the temperature fell to thirty-two in this county, but throughout the storm region it ranged from twenty to fifty-two below, which made this blizzard match and overmatch the great storm of 1882.

A HARD TIMES CHRISTMAS

The following is from the Christmas announcements of the Custer County Chief, December 21, the issue before the celebration:

Christmas will be generally observed by the various churches of the city. The festivities will not, in all probability, be on as grand a scale as in years of greater prosperity, but will, nevertheless, be just as attractive and every bit as enjoyable. Instead of making a grand display there seems to be a tendency among all the churches to exert every effort in relieving the destitute and distressed, of which we have our full share. This, to say the least, is very commendable.

The next week the same paper gives the following account of the exercises as they were rendered in the various churches of Broken Bow:

The Christian church gave a very nice entertainment on Christmas Eve, consisting of a musical and literary program. Santa Claus appeared and distributed nuts and candies to the little ones. On Christmas day a handsome thing was done by the good people of this denomination. Instead of buying presents for the children, the money was used in preparing an excellent dinner, and over one hundred people were fed, including the children of the Sunday school and ten poor families who were invited in. The food which was left was then distributed among poor families.

The Presbyterian church entertainment on Christmas Eve was a novel affair. An old-fashioned fire-place was erected on the pulpit and above that was built a brick chimney. The bricks, however, were pasteboard boxes filled with nuts and candies which old Santa Claus distributed to the children. A good program was carried out. At the close of the entertainment the children were marched into the lecture room, where tables were spread and supper was served to them. This program was a complete surprise to the little folks and was much enjoyed by them.

The entertainment at the Episcopal church was held on Christmas night and was out of the usual order of Christmas doings. The program consisted of music and of short Christmas tales by Professor Currie, L. H. Jewett, Mrs. Chrisman, Rev. Robbins, and Mrs. A. Morgan. The latter was particularly interesting, as Mrs. Morgan related the story of her being stolen by cannibals on the Fiji Islands when a small child. Candy and nuts were distributed to the children of the Sabbath school.

The Christmas pyramid was the attraction at the Baptist church. It was laden with presents, which were distributed by old Santa Claus. A splendid program was rendered.

At the Methodist church a program of recitations, songs, etc., had been prepared and was successfully carried out. The little folks were nicely remembered with candies and nuts.

FILLED UP ON CHRISTMAS

Under the caption of "Christmas dinners" the Chief publishes the following list of dinner parties which were given on the hard-winter Christmas day of 1894:

Mrs. Belle Doxie entertained a lively crowd of young people at her home for dinner. Those present were Mr. and Mrs. F. W. Hayes, the Misses Flora Gould, Ora Spence, Grace Cox, Josie Sheppard, Lillie Snodgrass, and the Messrs. H. A. Thompson, Dr. Hallar, Harry Day, M. A. Sullivan, and E. R. Purcell.

The dinner party at the home of Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Rublee was made up of Mr. and Mrs. S. B. Thompson, Mr. and Mrs. Ed. McComas, Mr. and Mrs. F. B. Bartlett, Mrs. Patterson, Miss Mamie Thompson, and Mr. Nine McComas.

At the home of Mr. and Mrs. L. H. Jewett, there were gathered at a sumptuous feast, Mr. and Mrs. H. H. Wirt, Mr. and Mrs. O. P. Perley, Rev. Bailey, and Roy Wirt.

Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Shepherd entertained a party at dinner, consisting of Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Harris and family, Captain Burnham, and E. H. King.

Mr. and Mrs. E. P. Campbell departed from the time-honored custom of a Christmas dinner and gave a Christmas breakfast to a party of friends, with a Christmas tree well laden with presents for the little ones. It was a unique affair. Those present were Mr. and Mrs. Alpha Morgan, Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Haney, Mrs. Scruggs and daughter Belle, and Mr. and Mrs. Mosby and family. Alpha Morgan acted as Santa Claus.

Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Sullivan shared an elegant dinner at their home with Mr. and Mrs. C. L. Gutterson and family, Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Currie and family, and Mrs. Kimel Barns.

Mr. and Mrs. George Purcell entertained Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Purcell and family, and Mr. W. T. Scherr at the Christmas dinner.

At the home of Mr. and Mrs. Alpha Morgan a Christmas feast was served to Rev. and Mrs. E. Robbins, and Mr. Con Gibson, of Ansley.

Mr. and Mrs. E. C. House entertained J. H. Thompson and J. E. Mallett, of Ravenna, at their home on Christmas day.

At the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. G. Maulick there were assembled at a Christmas feast, Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Eastham, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Maulick, Miss Henderson, and Mrs. Bailar, of Strang, Nebraska.

THE GLOVERS WEATHER NINETY-FOUR

H. B. Glover writes his experience in getting through the hard winter:

"In the late '80s homesteaders were proving up on their claims and mortgaging them. A Custer county mortgage had a certain market value in the east. One could borrow from five hundred to eight hundred dollars on a quarter-section, at ten per cent interest,—making out the note and mortgage at seven per cent interest for five years, then figuring the other three per cent for five years, which on an $800 loan would amount to $120, making a separate note of this secured by a second mortgage due in two and one-half years. This went to the agent as commission, and it was so attractive that agents traveled the country soliciting the homesteaders to prove up and take a loan. The agent in some cases advanced the money for the expense of making proof and in case that the homesteader had not resided on his claim the requisite five years they would advance two hundred dollars for the purpose of "paying out" or commuting the homestead. The loan business became so lucrative that irresponsible parties went into the business; making out the papers on a piece of land, promising the money within sixty days, then placing the papers on the eastern market to sell before he could fulfill his part of the contract.

"Thus the country practically all became mortgaged and in the case of the rough land mortgaged for more than it was then worth.

DIDN'T CARRY OFF THE MORTGAGE

"Many a homesteader on a rough claim, considering his place well sold, as soon as the money was paid over loaded his family and goods into his wagon and went back to his wife's folks and when the "soddy" went down there was nothing left on the place but the mortgage. Others stayed and while the crops were good could make a living, but prices were so cheap that they couldn't raise the interest and taxes. Then came the crop failure of 1890, when we didn't raise enough to live on. More of them left their places to the mortgage. In 1890 and 1892 we raised good crops, but prices were low, yet we had just about recovered from the failure of 1890. The year 1893 came with a half of a crop and a general business stagnation,—labor out of employment and Coxey's army invading Washington. Everybody was hard up, made their old clothes do another year, hoping for better times next year. Next year was dry. The ground was dry clear down. We had a rain and snow storm the last days of March that wet down about six inches. The grain came up, no more rain came and it died before it got big enough for a cow to feed on. We then put in some more seed, hoping to get rain to make it grow. A light shower came and brought it up so that we could see the drill rows across the field, and that is as far as it got, as the moisture was all gone. We planted and cultivated our corn. There was enough moisture retained by the cultivation to bring the corn up high enough to brush the axle of the cultivator and some tassels began to show, but there it stopped. We went in with a sled corn-cutter to save the fodder, cut about seventy acres of the best of it and got about fifteen loads of the fodder. We had broken up eight acres of sod in 1893. This was included in a field of spring wheat, and from this eight acres of backsiting we harvested and threshed sixty bushels of wheat. This, with our fifteen loads of fodder, was the entire crop from 360 acres under cultivation.

"Stock lived in the pasture but didn't grow. How to get through the winter was the problem. We sowed sixty bushels of rye in the corn field to make fall and winter feed. We never saw it again. We sold ten head of cows for eighty-five dollars, sent a bunch of heifers and horses up to Cherry county to winter, and kept at home just what stock we thought we needed to keep. Thus everybody got their fodder or whatever feed they had stacked up and we turned everything out before the first of September. And they fattened on the buffalo grass. We dressed a beef about Thanksgiving time and another between Christmas and New Year's. They were both in good shape and made good beef.

"We went into the winter with feed enough on hand to feed about thirty days. We were favored with a mild, open winter and had to feed but two days, so had our fodder left to feed our teams while putting in our next crop.

"Such was our personal experience in our struggle with the drouth of the early '90s. Our farm, like the rest, was mortgaged, but being one of the better class of farms we thought it worth staying with. In fact, we didn't know where we could go to better ourselves. Our mortgage became due in 1893. We were able to pay the interest. The year 1894 came and went. In March of 1895 we received a letter from the agent of the loan company, not demanding a settlement but asking if we were in need of any assistance in the way of feed and seed to put in our crop.

FOURTH OF JULY HAIL STORM

"In the spring and summer of 1879 the crops gave promise of an abundant harvest and the settlers looked forward to a good return for their labor. They were celebrating the Fourth of July at New Helena, in the most approved style, eating, drinking, and making merry, when a cloud no bigger than a man's hand was observed in the northwest, which grew with alarming rapidity until it overspread the whole heavens, and out of it came one of the most destructive hail-storms this county ever experienced. The crops were literally beaten into the earth. Not a bushel of grain was harvested in Victoria valley that year. A few turnips sown after the hail storm were the only crop produced in that section. The log school-house where the settlers were gathered to celebrate the Fourth, had three windows on the north side. The glass was broken into fragments by the hail, after which George Carr attempted the impossible feat of keeping out the storm by covering the three windows at one time with a blackboard long enough only to cover two. Men, women, and children crowded into the building, terror-stricken, some crying, some praying, and, I am sorry to record it, a few swearing. The hail streak was about four miles wide and passed down Clear creek, completely cleaning out the crops in its course. The settlers had to haul their feed and seed for the next year from Grand Island and Central City, 120 and 130 miles distant. In 1880 we had good crops, but the hardships and privations of these pioneer days have been lived through, and while some have fallen by the wayside and still others gone to 'the land beyond the river,' many of us remain to enjoy the fruits of our early trials, proud of our noble county and its splendid citizenship, and confident of its continued growth and development.

DRY NINETY-FOUR

"To the residents of Custer county the drouth of 1894 was a new experience. They had seen slight drouths before, even in Custer county, but never before had they seen a spring and summer with entire absence of rain. Even in the spring the ground was so dry as to make plowing difficult, and as the season advanced it was impossible. But the crop was put in and made a good struggle for life. Up to the 4th of July there was still a chance for a crop. The corn was of fair size, and still green. On the 4th of July there was a slight shower, early in the day, but followed by blistering sunshine. By night the corn was flat on the ground, beyond help from any amount of rain. But the rain did not come, even after it was too late, and long before frost every green thing was dead, and the leaves had fallen from the trees.

"This meant more than financial loss; it meant a year of privation and suffering to most of the people of the county. It meant that if they were to stay in the country they must support themselves and their children without help from the soil, and with little or no resources of any kind. There was little stock in the country, and it was worth little. Good cows sold for ten dollars, and good thrifty calves for two dollars and fifty cents, or even less. Many people sold every thing they had and left the country. It was all they could do, for the time, but in a year or two most of them came back and turned their experience into profit. Some farmers were able to stick it out by hunting wild game all winter, and using brush and cow-chips for fuel.

HE WON OUT

"The determination of some of the people was almost beyond belief. I have in mind a little, bent, old man who had managed to gather up a little bunch of cattle. He had no land. Instead of selling his cattle he got some warm clothing and just lived in the hills with his cattle, moving them from place to place, wherever he could find old dry grass. It was his opportunity. In a few years he had a good half-section of land and many cattle, the increase of the little herd that he had nursed through that winter.

HAD TO BE HELPED

"It soon became clear that without help some of the people would perish, and before cold weather the county was organized to meet the situation. In each precinct, with the supervisor at the head, relief committees were organized to care for the needy. The east was almost careless in its liberality. Help came from abroad, and those who could, helped their neighbors. Farmers who had it, sold seed wheat to their neighbors, and waited a year for their pay. Not a single instance is reported of any one trying to turn the people's needs to profit. Persons asking or accepting aid who did not need it were very few, while the needy who refused all aid, and even helped others, were many. Real need never asked in vain. In the winter following this drouth, Dr. A. J. McArthur went to Missouri and collected enough money to buy a car load of seed corn, which he shipped to Custer county. Of the scores of business men asked to contribute to this car, only one refused, and strange as it may sound, he was the only one who asked to see the doctor's credentials. Not only did they give, but always with a word of encouragement and sympathy. The railroad shipped this car free of charge, which was their general custom.

POOR BUT HAPPY

"One very noticeable thing about the people during this drouth was their cheerfulness. Not only did they refuse to be starved; they refused to be discouraged. There was more social intercourse among the people during this year than ever before, and I am ready to believe that the habit has survived to the present time. Hunger only sharpened the sense of humor. When a straw hat or corset was found in a box of winter supplies the fun was for everybody. Sometimes the 'needy' played tricks on the relief committee. For a time, in Westerville, the relief committee had their 'office' in the front of the bank. One day a very ragged man came slowly across the street toward the bank door, and the committee began estimating what all he would want. When he came in, he went to the cashier's window and asked for some change, pushing a fifty dollar bill through the window. A few people the drouth entirely crushed. For a few hundred dollars, farmers sold good farms that are now worth as many thousands. A few lost all commercial pride, and took advantage of the times to repudiate their debts, but to the country the drouth was a great benefit. It stopped recklessness in spending and in the making of debts. Men had homesteaded, and then mortgaged their farms. The money had come without effort, and they were spending it without judgment. The drouth stopped their income and their credit. They could neither earn nor borrow, and never again can a year's misfortune force them to beg. More than any other one year, 1894 has contributed to the great prosperity of Custer county."

A HOME-GROWN CYCLONE

In the matter of weather and storms Custer county has always been rather independent and has insisted upon doing business for itself. It generally keeps abreast with current weather and puts on tap any article that seems to be fashionable and popular. Not to be outdone, the county put on a late fall cyclone of its own in October, 1913, which at the time was described by the Custer County Chief as follows:

"At six o'clock Thursday evening, October 3, 1913, Custer county was visited by a terrific cyclone, which went the full length of the county from southwest and northwest. It was terrible in its fury and practically every building in its path was wrecked or damaged. It passed Broken Bow on the southeast, just missing the city. The fair-ground buildings were a total wreck, and all the buildings on the Brenizer ranch and John Squires' place, a few miles south of town, were completely blown away; the M. K. Hagadorn and J. A. Hutchinson homes, just southeast of the city, were wrecked. The cyclone formed near Lodi and went southeast to Burwell, its path being from one-quarter to one-half mile wide. Much damage was done to farm properties, and though no fatalities were reported, the following people were hurt: Flossie, the ten-year-old daughter of Will McCaslin, who lives east of here, was badly crushed and was taken to the Ryerson hospital in a precarious condition. Mrs. McCaslin was injured about the breast, another small daughter and the baby had their heads badly cut, while Mr. McCaslin sustained several bruises. In the Sargent district the following people were injured: John Speer, collar bone broken; Mrs. Bevington, badly bruised but not serious; Mrs. Frank Kidder, rib broken and badly bruised; Melvill York, badly bruised about the body (all of these injured, it is understood, were taken to Sargent and placed in the hospital); George Hill, head bruised. The worst part of the storm in that vicinity passed about two miles east of Sargent.

"The above account was written after the forms had been made up and the paper ready for press. A full description will appear next week."

WORST BLIZZARD IN THIRTY YEARS

Beginning with a gently falling rain on Thursday, March 14, 1913, and during Thursday night turning into snow, with a high north wind prevailing, Friday saw the most destructive blizzard this section of the state has known in the past decade. A record in a local newspaper gives the following data:

"During the whole of Friday the storm raged to such an extent as to make it unsafe to leave shelter, and heavy losses were sustained by many of the stockmen and farmers of this and adjoining counties. At this point but little snow fell, but what did come was drifted so badly as to make the roads impassable for the next two or three days. Between this city and Alliance it was reported that from nine to eighteen inches of snow fell during Thursday and Friday, and at no time after the early afternoon of Thursday did the prevailing high wind show a cessation until late Friday night. The heaviest loss of live stock from reports coming to this city on Sunday and Monday was suffered by feeders and ranchers in the vicinity of Brewster, Dunning and Thedford, although local farmers and feeders suffered some heavy losses. Peter Erickson, who ranges cattle on the North Loup, was a heavy loser, over two hundred head of heavy stock succumbing to the storm. A. McClain, of Dunning (father of Ira McClain of this city), had 315 head of cattle he was carrying through the winter and out of that number lost 150 head of the heaviest stock. He had taken up and placed under shelter about one-half of his herd, consisting of young animals. The remainder were left on the open range and drifted into the Dismal river, where the heavy loss occurred. The loss of Mr. Erickson also occurred from the animals drifting into the river. L. H. Jewett of this city, who had ninety-five head of heavy stock on the Dismal, lost forty head in the same manner. Mr. Jewett reports that this snow had drifted over the river and the lighter and younger stuff were able to cross over the snow in drifting ahead of the storm, but that the heavier stock went through the snow and mired in the river.

"R. B. Beauchamp, of Dunning, was another heavy loser of the same vicinity, having 180 head of stock in the storm and losing ninety of them. His cattle, however, were in the open pasture, and drifted ahead of the storm into the fence corners, and it is supposed a good many of them dying in the storm, were tramped to death by the remainder of the herd. Most of the Beauchamp herd were young stock that was bought last fall at an average price of thirty dollars per head. Henry Andrews, of Anselmo, also was a heavy loser, the storm taking fifty-five head out of his herd. His cattle were partially sheltered. A. M. Cook of this city lost fifty head out of his herd of 235, near Linscott. Other losses in that neighborhood are: McConnell, twelve head of milk cows; George Zutavern, 200 out of a herd of 575; and a man by the name of Whitney lost sixteen — his entire herd.

"J. D. Gage, a lumber dealer at Dunning, had twelve head of horses perish from exposure to the storm. The loss in horses, however, was light as compared to cattle losses. Miller Heller, a Kinkaid homesteader of near Halsey, suffered the loss of sixteen head of milk cows. It is estimated that the loss to the Kinkaiders was very extensive and as they are in the majority of cases unable to lose any stock, they will feel the loss to a greater extent than the heavier losers who deal extensively in the live-stock business.

"I. N. Bovee, a former resident of this vicinity, but now of Halsey, in a letter to Mr. Jewett, states that while his live stock suffered from the storm he lost none and considered himself very fortunate, as the loss in his neighborhood was very heavy.

SHEEP PERISH IN TRANSIT

"A train of double-deck cars loaded with sheep was pulled into the Burlington yards at Whitman early Friday. On the train were about 11,000 head and during the day the larger part of the whole load perished. It was estimated on Monday that of the whole 11,000 only about 2,000 had survived the storm.

"Fred Wagner, of Wagner, was reported to have lost twelve head of cows and four horses in the feed lot. His loss on the range was supposed to have been heavy, but just how much has not been reported.

"Near Mullen the storm was very severe. Following is a letter received by the Republi- can Tuesday morning from W. B. Adams: 'Just a line to tell you of the terrible condition of the poor old sandhills after the blizzard. About forty per cent. of loss in cattle, and horses about ten. I lost nine head out of 200; J. H. Lowe lost 700 head of cattle, and E. Crain lost eighty out of 153; W. W. Mahaffy lost his whole herd and John Boyce lost about 100 head; John Morrison, of Mullen, lost about seventy-five head, Joseph Heelan sixty, and Richard S. Fox lost 100 out of 118. That is about the way it runs in the sandhills. No lives lost that I have heard of.'

"The loss in the immediate vicinity of Broken Bow was very light compared with the losses of the northwest part of the county, Blaine and Thomas counties. Tierney Brothers, who are operating a ranch at Wagner, report the loss of probably forty head of cattle. They also lost some hogs in the local feed yards, besides the loss of ninety head of porkers on the South Loup. Raid Skinner suffered a loss of seventeen head of cattle at his farm twelve miles north of the city. Judge Sullivan lost six head of cattle and Harve Andrews lost five head. Others losing cattle reported in this office were George Bush, five head, and R. F.

Burnett, two head. Tom Finlen lost five head of horses at his farm south of town, and John Price suffered the loss of a like number of horses at his farm. Other losses have been reported but no confirmation of the rumors had been reported at that time.

"Robert E. Shaw and Thomas G. Butler, of Milldale, were in the city Tuesday. They reported the loss of stock in their vicinity was very light, but the losses to the northwest of them was quite heavy. The heavier loser was Clarks Philpot, near Gandy, who lost several hundred head—thirty or forty per cent. of his herd. Dan Haskell's loss was small. Henry Andrews, of Anselmo, reported a loss of fifty-seven head of cattle out of 500. George Tempalar, north of Broken Bow, reported to have but fourteen head of cattle. Charles Sanders, of Ortello valley, reported to have lost sixty head of cattle. Jewett & Andrews, Broken Bow, four head of cattle. Harry Knapp, southwest of town, reported loss of twelve head of cattle. J. J. Boblits, South Loup, reported loss of five head of cattle. Vincent Steadry, west of town, reported loss of two head of cattle. Lon Davis, east of town, reported loss of one mule."

If there is a skeleton in every closet, there are tragedies in every life and dark pages in every history. The people of Custer county are neither better nor worse than other Ne-braskans or other people of the middle west. Their story is about the same, their experiences very similar. If crimes have been committed, if human life has been taken, and human blood shed, it is only incidental to the settlement of a country by hardy pioneers, no matter what sterling traits of character the majority of the people might possess. There are sheep of shaded wool in every flock and in every early contingent that settles upon a virgin soil there are desperate characters. This cannot be avoided. It is one of the handicaps of humanity. Adventuresome spirits always flock to the west and front. Men of temper and reckless disposition are apt to consort in the sparsely settled frontier, where dispositions have no governor and law is but slight control. A lawless character may make more local history in the unbridled orgy of one night-hour than a dozen men of sterling worth in a lifetime of probity. The peaceful pursuits of life are devoid of the spectacular and are generally too commonplace to be recorded in a country's annals.

If recorded here are episodes that reflect small credit on law-abiding people it must be remembered that these are the crimes and deeds of the ill-starred few who are neither typical nor representative of the great mass of Custer county citizens.

The early settlers of Custer county were on the whole as fine a group of men and women as American homes of the east and north could produce. Nowhere among the children of men could you find a better people, stronger in virtuous traits or more sensitive to honor and rectitude. They were intelligent, law-abiding, conscientious, and God-honoring. The marvelous development of Custer county, the establishment of its splendid homes, schools, and churches are due to this fact. No people could have wrought better, nor under the circumstances accomplished more.

When the size of the county is considered, the number of people who have moved in to tread awhile the maze of chance and rounds of fortune, Custer's record is exceptionally good. Blood and thunder do not run riot in the pages of its history, notwithstanding the fact that in an early day a witty brakeman on the Burlington Railroad used to shout to the passengers, "We have now crossed the line into Custer county. Prepare to meet your God." A faithful record of the past demands that crimes and felonies be chronicled, and the historian must obey.

Butcher's History of Custer County devotes twelve pages to the lynching of "Kid Wade." It seems that Kid Wade, without over much ceremony, appropriated a fine race horse belonging to a man named Pulliam, who resided in West Union township, and made his escape into the north counties. John Roth, a neighbor of Pulliam, organized a posse and started in pursuit. The chase was long and lasted for months. Concerning it many exciting and almost romantic incidents are recorded, but as all happened outside of Custer county they are not germane to this history, other than to record that the horse was found and returned to Pulliam, that Wade was captured and while lodged in the Bassett jail was taken out by a band of masked men and hanged to a telegraph pole. It was severe thousands of cattle that roamed over the valley of the South Loup river and adjoining country. In common with other men in the same line of business, he had suffered heavy losses from the depredations of cattle thieves. For this reason he became the prime mover in an attempt to drive the cattle thieves from the country. Olive resided in Lexington, Dawson county, but his ranch was on the South Loup river, about four miles east of the present town of Callaway. While in a general way he was a good sort of man, and very generous and courteous to those with whom he was on good terms, he was an implacable enemy and treatment, but as a cure it is said to have had the desired effect.

THE MITCHELL-KETCHUM TRAGEDY

During the year 1877 a number of settlers located on Clear creek, near the east line of the county, among the number being Luther Mitchell and Ami Ketchum. Mitchell came from Merrick county, was a farmer about sixty-five years of age, and married. Ketchum was a blacksmith by trade, but had decided to become a farmer, although he still worked at his trade for the neighbors. He was unmarried and was living with Mitchell at the time of which we are writing.

I. P. Olive was one of the wealthiest cattle men in Nebraska at that time, and owned many an adept in the use of firearms. His brother, Robert Olive, was a bad man when aroused. It was reported that Bob Olive had previously killed several men in Texas, and to conceal his identity had assumed the name of Stevens and skipped to Nebraska, where his brother I. P. had already established a ranch, and it was under the name of Stevens that he was known during his career in Custer county.

A short time previously to the events which led up to the killing of Bob Olive, or Stevens, one Manley Capel had been arrested on a charge of cattle-stealing in Custer county, and in his confession he seemed to implicate Ami Ketchum in the nefarious business. This, with the information obtained from a man by the name of McIndeffer, who was acting as a sort of spy for the cattlemen and who, by the way, was hanged as a cattle thief in No Man's Land, a few years afterward, so it is said, so impressed the Olives that they determined to arrest Ketchum. Notwithstanding the enmity that was known to exist between Bob Olive and Ketchum, Sheriff David Anderson, of Buffalo county, made Olive a deputy to arrest Ketchum.

In the company of two rough and reckless cowboys, named Barney Armstrong and Pete Beaton, Bob Olive started for the home of Mitchell and Ketchum on the 27th day of November, 1878, with McIndeffer as a guide. When they arrived at the homestead of Mr. Mitchell, the latter and Ketchum were preparing to go to a neighbor's, by the name of Dowse, to return a borrowed animal. Mrs. Mitchell was preparing to go with them. Before they started, a stranger rode up and asked if he could have his horse shod. Ketchum explained his plans for the day and asked the man to come the following day and he could shoe the horse. The stranger agreed to do so and rode away to rejoin Bob Olive and the other two men, who were hidden behind a small hill to the south of Mitchell's house. Having failed to get Mitchell and Ketchum separated by the ruse of getting the horse shod, the men now rode boldly up toward the settlers, who paid no particular attention to them, as men on horseback were the rule and not the exception in those days. Mrs. Mitchell had already taken her seat in the wagon, and the men were tying the animal to the hind axle of the vehicle.

THE SHOOTING

When within a short distance the cowboys made a dash on their horses, four abreast, and Bob Olive shouted to Ketchum to throw up his hands, as he was an officer of the law, at the same time presenting his revolver. Ketchum threw up his right hand with a forty-four Colt's revolver in it, and both men fired at the same instant. Several shots were exchanged, resulting in the breaking of Ketchum's left arm. As soon as the shooting commenced the older man, Mitchell, grabbed his Winchester and took deadly aim at Olive, who discovered him and shouted: "My God, old man, don't shoot!" but it was too late. Mitchell's finger had already pressed the trigger and the bullet sped forward to do its fatal work. Olive reeled in his saddle and the cowboys prevented him from falling. He gasped: "Boys, I am done for." Supporting him on his horse, they turned and rode rapidly away, followed by bullets from Ketchum's Winchester, which was loaded by a girl named Tamar Snow, a step-daughter of Mitchell, Ketchum being unable to load the gun himself on account of his broken arm. He fired the last shot at a range of 200 yards, just as the cowboys dropped out of sight behind the rise of ground previously referred to. One of Ketchum's bullets cut a scarf around Beaton's neck in two, drawing blood, and another shaved off one side of the rim of his hat, close to the head. Another went through Armstrong's foot. McIndeffer, who afterward described the encounter, declared that Ketchum came as near being the devil as any man he ever saw, and that he believed he would have killed every one of them, even with one broken arm, if they had not gotten out of the way. As soon as the cowboys got out of reach of the flying bullets, Olive was laid on the ground and a consultation held. The wounded man was then taken to the dug-out of one Harrington, who lived about a quarter of a mile further down the creek, where Olive made his will and sent for his wife. He died three days afterward.

As soon as the cowboys disappeared from sight Mitchell and Ketchum packed up their few movable belongings and started for their former home in Merrick county. As soon as the news of the shooting spread over the country there was great excitement among the cattlemen and cowboys, and the same night a large force returned to the Mitchell house, undoubtedly to wreak vengeance on the two men, but finding them gone they set fire to the house and burned up the roof, that being the only part of it that was combustible.

THE ARREST

When they arrived in Merrick county Mitchell and Ketchum went to the house of George Gagle, and a Dr. Barnes was sent for to attend to Ketchum's broken arm. The next morning, acting upon the advice of friends, and having found a place of safety for Mitchell's family, the two men started back to Custer county to give themselves up to the authorities for the killing of Stevens. On their way they passed through Loup City and consulted with Attorney Aaron Wall, who advised them to proceed no farther, as the cowboys would certainly lynch them. They remained several days in Loup City and then went to the house of J. R. Baker, on Oak creek, in Howard county, where they were arrested by William Letcher, sheriff of Merrick county, and E. W. Crew, sheriff of Howard county—giving themselves willingly into the custody of the officers.

I. P. Olive had offered a reward of $700 for their arrest and several officers, among whom were Crew, of Howard county, Anderson, of Buffalo county, Gillan, of Keith county, and Letcher, of Merrick county, were anxious to capture them in order to secure the reward. But after the capture, Crew and Letcher were unwilling to assume the responsibility of taking the prisoners to Custer county and of turning them over to the cowboys. They were finally taken to Buffalo county and lodged in the jail at Kearney, in charge of Sheriff Anderson, for safe keeping. The prisoners were at first held without legal authority, as Olive had given the warrant for their arrest, issued in Custer county, into the hands of Barney Gillan, sheriff of Keith county, to serve.

The prisoners had engaged Thomas Darnell, of St. Paul, and E. C. Calkins, of Kearney, as counsel. Their attorneys endeavored to have the prisoners retained in the jail at Kearney, having reasons for believing they would be lynched if taken to Custer county. The feeling at Kearney was against Mitchell and Ketchum, as the people had been led to believe that Olive had been shot while fulfilling his duty as an officer of the law. A dispute arose among the sheriffs as to a division of the reward offered by I. P. Olive for the arrest, but Olive declined to pay the money until the prisoners were delivered in Custer county. A proposition was finally made to Sheriff Anderson to take the men to Custer county, for which service the others agreed to pay him fifty dollars. This proposition was declined by Anderson, unless he were paid enough to enable him to employ a sufficient number of men to guard the prisoners. It was at last arranged that Gillan should take the prisoners to Custer county, as he held the warrant for their arrest, and he promised to notify their attorneys, Darnell and Calkins, so that they could accompany their clients. As Gillan was a sheriff, and his desperate character was unknown to Darnell and Calkins, they thought everything was all right. Nevertheless they kept their eyes on the jail to prevent any attempt to remove the prisoners by stealth.

ESCAPED THE KEARNEY MOB

On the forenoon of December 10th, Darnell, fearing that the prisoners were about to be taken away, kept close watch until the west-bound emigrant train came in. After its arrival at Kearney he waited at the depot until he thought it was about time for it to pull out, when he started to leave. In the meantime Gillan had taken the prisoners from the jail and hustled them into a car just as the train was pulling out. Darnell telegraphed to Gillan at Elm Creek, asking him if he would hold the prisoners at Lexington until the next train. Gillan replied that he would do so. Darnell also telegraphed to Captain McNamar, an attorney at Lexington, requesting him to see what was done with the prisoners when they got off the train at that city. Lexington was the home of I. P. Olive, and here he was surrounded by many friends and employes. The train pulled into Lexington about three o'clock in the afternoon, and Olive and his friends were waiting at the depot with wagons, into one of which the prisoners were immediately loaded, and a start made for Custer county. Captain McNamar was unable to prevail on Gillan and Olive to wait for the arrival of Darnell from Kearney, and believing it was the intention to mob Mitchell and Ketchum, he followed the wagon train for some distance. Seeing that they were being followed, the wagons separated, but McNamar kept after the one containing the prisoners until it became so dark that he lost the trail among the hills. The Olive party kept on all night, until they met Olive's men from the ranch on the South Loup, about five miles from the Olive ranch, where the transfer of the prisoners from Gillan to Olive took place. The names of the men who received the prisoners were Dennis Gartrell, Pedro Dominicus, and Bion Brown. After the delivery of the prisoners to Olive's men, Sheriff Gillan and Phil Dufrand walked away a short distance while the Olive men started with the prisoners to a place known as the "Devil's Gap," in a wild canyon about half way between the Loup and Wood River valleys, some five miles southeast of where Callaway now stands. Olive and Gartrell drove the wagon containing the prisoners, and they stopped under a small elm tree. A couple of ropes were passed over a limb and Gartrell tied one of them around Ketchum's neck, while Pedro Dominicus fastened the other around the neck of Mitchell. Ketchum was first drawn up. Olive then took a rifle and shot Mitchell, after which the latter also was drawn up until he dangled beside his companion.

The bodies of the two unfortunate men were found at about three o'clock in the afternoon of the following day, by a party of men, among whom were Captain McNamar, Anton Abel, Louis Wambsgan, George Sandford, Al Wise, County Judge Boblits, and perhaps others. When found the bodies were frightfully burned—that of Ketchum still hanging to the limb, while that of Mitchell was resting on the ground.

After hanging Mitchell and Ketchum, the Olive gang rode about one mile toward the Olive ranch, where two of the men were given fresh horses with which to return to Lexington. It will probably never be known who did the burning of the bodies, or how the same was done, but it is generally supposed that these two men, crazed with drink and fired with the thought of revenge for the killing of one of their number, resolved to put the finishing touch on the terrible night's work by pouring the contents of their liquor flasks over the hanging bodies of their victims and setting them on fire, as they had to pass along that road to get back to Lexington. The evidence at the trial was convincing that the bodies had been burned, although an attempt was made to prove that Mitchell's clothing had caught fire from the powder of Olive's gun, and that although the fire had been put out, it caught again after the men departed from the spot. A careful examination of the spot disclosed the fact that the fire had been carefully whipped out for quite a circle around the bodies, thus proving that some one must have been present during the burning; otherwise the whole country would have been burned over, as the grass was as dry as tinder. It does not appear, however, that Olive was a party to, or had any knowledge of, this part of the crime.

Steps were immediately taken to arrest the perpetrators of the crime and bring them to speedy justice. The whole state was aroused by the tragedy, but the well known desperate character of most of the men concerned in it made the question of apprehending them a very serious one.

JUDGE GASLIN'S STORY

Judge William Gaslin thus relates the methods employed to arrest the criminals:

"I first heard of the lynching of Mitchell and Ketchum while on a train on my way from Nebraska City to Sidney, where I was to open court the next morning. When I opened court there was such an excitement that there was no disposition or readiness to do business, and upon seeing an article in the newspaper published at Kearney by the Eatons, denouncing the governor for not taking active steps to bring about the arrest of the murderers, and complimenting me by saying that there was one man in Nebraska who would see that the perpetrators of the crime would be brought to justice, and the man was Gaslin, I called my reporter, F. M. Hallowell, who resided at

Kearney, and instructed him to proceed to that city on the first train and tell Eaton not to make further mention of my name in connection with the matter, as I had a plan to capture the desperadoes and did not want my name mentioned for fear of putting them on their guard. Late that afternoon I adjourned court and took the train east for Lexington, where quite a number of the Olive gang lived. I found assembled at the residence of Attorney General Dilworth a number of the law-abiding citizens of the city, armed to protect themselves against the outlaws who had threatened the lives of those who should attempt to bring them to justice. Among these I now recall Captain McNamar, an attorney, and Jack MacColl, clerk of the district court. I learned that the officials of Custer county, where the lynching was done, could not be expected to render much assistance. I left on the first train for Kearney, to look up the law and see if I, as an examining magistrate, could not issue warrants for their arrest, which plan I divulged to no one. I was in constant touch with General Dilworth, soon satisfied myself that I had the authority, and set to work preparing complaints and warrants to have the outlaws arrested. After I had matured my plan I met J. P. Johnson (then residing in Kearney, three score and ten, hale and hearty), and in conversation he remarked that if the officers were afraid to arrest the criminals he would furnish men to do it if I would deputize them. I informed him that I had confidentially arranged for a meeting of the sheriffs of Dawson and Buffalo counties, General Dilworth and a sacred few others, and invited him to attend. There were present at this meeting, in Judge Savidge's office, the Judge, J. P. Johnson, General Dilworth, the two sheriffs, and myself. I told these men the conclusion I had come to, and the complaints having been filed before me, I made out the warrants for the arrest of the criminals and offered them to Sheriff James of Dawson county, and Sheriff Anderson of Buffalo county, both of whom declined to take or serve them, on account of a fear of their lives, as they said.

DEPUTIZING A POSSE

"I then turned to Johnson and asked him to give me the names of the men he agreed to furnish, which he did, and I deputized them, there being, I think, five or six of them, and gave them to Johnson for delivery. One of the men deputized was Lawrence Ketchum, a brother of the man who was lynched, and another was a powerful young fellow by the name of Young, a deputy sheriff of Clay county. A third was named Pingree, and the fourth was a man from Illinois. A plan was arranged, in strictest secrecy, for a part of the deputized men to go across the country to Custer county to arrest part of the gang who were at the Olive ranch. Another party was to board a freight train at Kearney about midnight, which arrived at Lexington a little before daylight. The railroad people were in the secret and stopped the train a little before Lexington was reached, where the officers left the train and walked into town, where they effected the arrest of all the gang who were in the city. Lawrence Ketchum, Bob French, and others went from Kearney, and were assisted by some of the constables of Lexington. When the other party arrived at the Olive ranch they found that the men they were after had fled the country. Among them was the delectable Barney Gillan, sheriff of Keith county, who had delivered Mitchell and Ketchum over to the murderers, and who secured the $700 blood money paid by Olive. On the afternoon of Sunday the parties who arrested the desperadoes at Lexington landed them in Kearney on a freight train, where they were put in jail and a strong guard placed over them. Thousands of people were at the train when it arrived with the prisoners. Some of the prisoners, I think, were subsequently taken to the state prison for safe keeping until the April term of the district court in Adams county, where the trial had been set, the prisoners waiving preliminary examination before me.

URNS STATE'S EVIDENCE

"All kinds of lawyers — good, bad, and indifferent — were employed by the defense, some for ability and legal lore, and some to insult and bulldoze the court — for which they occasionally got fined for contempt. The trial had not progressed long before the prosecuting attorney secretly informed me that he had made a secret arrangement with one of the prisoners, Bion Brown, to turn state's evidence, and to testify on behalf of the prosecution. Brown was in jail with the other defendants, heard and knew all their plans, and daily communicated the same to General Dilworth, the prosecuting attorney. He said at one time that they talked of having their friends, who were in disguise in the town, shoot General Dilworth and me and have horses ready for the prisoners, who would be enabled to escape in the excitement. I then gave orders for no one to occupy the gallery opposite where I sat, and I had a large number of bailiffs secretly heavily armed scattered over the court room, with nothing to indicate they were officers. One day it was reported that a number of the Texas friends of the prisoners were secreted in the hills near the Platte river, armed to the teeth and provided with good horses with which to swoop down on the court and liberate the prisoners. Other things came to the knowledge of Sheriff Lewis Martin of Adams county, a most excellent officer, which induced him to procure a company of regulars from Omaha, which was sent by the commanding officer as soon as possible. The soldiers were tented on the public square of Hastings, opposite the hall where the court was being held. The legislature appropriated $20,000 to be expended in the prosecution of the case, to be paid out on vouchers approved by me, a part of the money being paid for the subsistence of the soldiers. Bion Brown and Pedro, the Mexican, were used as witnesses for the prosecution, the latter testifying through an interpreter. A better witness I never heard testify. On cross-examination he testified almost, if not exactly, to what he did in direct.

"The trial commenced in Hastings in April and continued almost through the month. Some of the ablest lawyers of the state were engaged on the case, among them being General Dilworth, the prosecuting attorney; District Attorney Scofield and John M. Thurston, for the state; and F. G. Hamer, General Connor, and Hon. James Laird for the defense. An indictment was found against Ira P. Olive and eleven others for the murder of Luther Mitchell, and I. P. Olive and Fred Fisher were placed on trial to answer for the crime. There were about 100 witnesses, among whom we find the names of Captain McNamar, Anton Abel, Louis Wambsgan, James Kelly, Phil Dufrand, George Sandford, A. C. Woodworth, David Blackman, George Arnold, Sheriff O'Brien, Dan Haskell, James Gray, H. C. Stuckey, S. C. Stuckey, John Myers, Andrew Pancake, E. S. Finch, W. H. Kilgore, and S. R. Ritchie. Phil Dufrand and Bion Brown, two of the defendants, turned state's evidence and testified against their associates in the crime. The witnesses for the prosecution testified to the facts substantially as heretofore related, while the witnesses for the defense confined themselves to testifying as to the good character and reputation of I. P. Olive."

The arguments of the attorneys were lengthy, able, and eloquent, and the case was given to the jury on the evening of April 16th. Before morning the jury arrived at a verdict, to the effect that I. P. Olive and Fred Fisher were guilty of murder in the second degree, Judge Gaslin immediately sentenced the two men to the penitentiary for the rest of their natural lives, and they were taken to the penitentiary forthwith.

JUDGE BOBLITS TAKES A HAND

Immediately after the sentence of Olive and Fisher their friends began proceedings for their release. The following year their efforts were successful, the supreme court handing down a decision to the effect that the prisoners had a right to trial in the county where the crime charged against them was committed. This not having been done, the prisoners were sent to Custer county for trial. Custer county had recently been organized from territory that had formerly been in two different judicial districts. The court held that the county was not now in any judicial district, and consequently the prisoners could not be tried before any district judge. This was the decision of two of the supreme judges, but Judge Samuel Maxwell, the third member of the court, dissented from this view, in what is said to be one of the ablest legal documents ever prepared in the supreme court of Nebraska.

Under this decision the only court having jurisdiction over the case was the county court. Accordingly Olive and Fisher were brought before Judge E. J. Boblits, but from some mysterious cause no complaining witnesses put in an appearance and the prisoners were discharged.

The county judge's docket at that time was kept in an account book, and the court proceedings are mixed up with notes of sales and purchases of calves, steers, and cows, together with memoranda of expenses for hay, barbed wire, and other ranch requisites. The following, which we find on the same page with some items of expense incurred in the plastering of the judge's house, shows the disposition that was made of the celebrated Olive case:

STATE OF NEBRASKA }
Custer County } ss

In County Court Before E. J. Boblits, County Judge.

I. P. Olive, W. F. Fisher, in custody of Sheriff O'Brien, the court finding no complaint on county docket and no complaining witnesses, the court orders that the prisoners be discharged till further proceedings can be had.

This 17th day of December, 1880.

E. J. BOBLITS, County Judge.

The decision of the supreme court of course put an end to the proceedings against the other defendants, but in the meantime most of them had been allowed to escape from the various jails in which they had been confined, and as far as we know Olive and Fisher were the only ones that ever had to do any time in the penitentiary for participating in the Mitchell and Ketchum tragedy.

THE HAUNSTINE TRAGEDY

The story of the Haunstine murder and execution, which occurred in the latter part of the '80s, is given by James Whitehead, who was a resident of Grant precinct, where the murder was committed, and who had access to all the facts.

"The murder of Hiram Roten and William Ashley by Albert E. Haunstine occurred November 9, 1888. It was regarded, and time has failed to change the sentiment, as one of the most unprovoked homicides known in the history of this county. The murderer and his victims lived in the same neighborhood — Roten valley. Toward the latter it was not shown that Haunstine had the slightest resentment or enmity. He had, in fact, for a time made his home with Hiram Roten, at whose hands and those of his young wife he had received the best of treatment. Mr. Ashley, who was a relative of Roten's, and lived close by, was not so well known to Haunstine, yet they were on friendly terms. The school-house of the district of which Roten and Ashley were officers, was located near their homes. A clock and some lumber had been taken from the school-house, and the fact of the missing goods was discovered while yet the tracks of the wagon and team of the supposed purloiner were fresh and easy to trace. As this was but one instance in many of recent occurrence in the neighborhood, Messrs. Roten and Ashley determined they would thoroughly investigate, and, if possible, detect the culprit.

"We are not certain as to the length of time they were absent before their friends became uneasy and instituted a search. Some days, however, had elapsed, when a searching party visited Haunstine's home, which was back from the road and isolated, and found it unoccupied. In looking around they discovered the bodies of the missing men, near the house, partly covered by hay. Subsequent events disclosed the fact that on reaching Haunstine's house and making their business known, he delivered to them the clock, which he confessed to having taken from the school-house; that while they remained within no words or trouble occurred, but when they left the house and started for their wagon he took down his rifle and shot them while their backs were turned, killing them instantly. He then searched them and secured about forty dollars in money, their watches and a rifle and revolver. Their team he tied in an old deserted sod house on an adjoining claim, and, gathering together a few household effects, he and his wife started to get out of the country. They went to Arnold, changed teams, and drove down the South Loup river to near Madison, where Haunstine hired out to husk corn. He worked three days, sold his team and then started for Columbus, where his wife had already gone. Just as the train was nearing town it was flagged by officers who were on his track, and he was taken by surprise and captured while sitting in the smoker with his rifle across his lap.

"He was tried at the March term of the district court. H. M. Sullivan, who was county attorney, had been consulted by the prisoner prior to his election, and had, therefore, some scruples against acting as prosecutor. As a substitute, however, he employed Judge Wall, of Loup City, who, with the firm of Blair & Campbell, represented the state. The defense was conducted by C. L. Gutterson, A. R. Humphrey, both of Broken Bow, and N. V. Harlen, of York. Haunstine was found guilty and was sentenced to be hanged on September 6th following. The case was appealed to the supreme court, and he was again sentenced to be hanged, April 17, 1891. His defense was insanity, and before the date fixed for his execution he acted so strangely that a jury was called to determine his mental condition. The trial lasted three days. Public sentiment against the prisoner was so strong that a good deal of trouble was experienced in selecting a jury. The following named persons were finally agreed upon: J. I. Dillenbeck, T. A. Thum, James Dinwiddie, Frank Newbeck, J. C. Hunter, C. U. Richardson, John Curry, Nolan Webb, A. R. Huckleberry, A. Cross, T. H. McCarger, and J. L. Compton. The witnesses for the defense were Mrs. Dr. Talbot, Miss Anna Crawford, Mrs. William Blair, O. M. Kem, William Blair, William Hartsell, John Miller, Charles Parkhurst, and Robert Norcutt. For the state were: Dr. Carter, physician at the state penitentiary; Dr. Knapp, superintendent of the insane asylum at Lincoln; Dr. C. Pickett; Dr. J. J. Pickett, county physician; Dr. C. H. Morris; Sheriff Jones; and Rev. O. R. Beebe, — all of whom with the exception of Dr. Knapp (who said that without a more extended observation he was not prepared to state whether Haunstine was sane or insane), pronounced him sane, and believed that his condition was a feigned one. The prosecution was conducted by the attorneys who had managed the case from the beginning, while to the defense was added H. M. Sullivan, whose term of office as county attorney had expired. It was one of the hardest fought and most ably conducted legal battles ever witnessed in Custer county. Mr. Campbell (then county attorney) was a lawyer of long practice; he was familiar with every turn and detail of the case, and his associates were men of exceptional ability. Judge Wall, especially, ranked high as a trial lawyer, was keen and resourceful, a good reasoner and an eloquent pleader. Gutterson, Humphrey, and Harlan were experienced and well informed practitioners, and the addition of Sullivan made a quartette that combined the qualities well nigh invulnerable. They were, however, placed in a most trying position. The prejudice against the prisoner was marked and universal. No circumstance connected with the killing of his victims could be urged in palliation. It was a cold-blooded, unprovoked butchery of two respected and highly esteemed citizens, and public sentiment demanded his execution. The date of hanging was fixed for the following day, and a vast multitude had assembled from all parts of the country and from different portions of the state as well. The determined expression and sullen silence of the crowd was ominous. Representatives of the press from Lincoln, Omaha, and elsewhere were present, awaiting the hour when the prisoner should atone for his crime. Adjoining the court house and facing its south door, the gallows was being erected and the din of the workmen's hammers was distinctly heard in the court room. None was more keenly alive to the situation and the odds against him than the prisoner's counsel. By mutual agreement the principal plea in his behalf was made by Mr. Sullivan. He remained calmly in his seat until the proper moment arrived. When he arose to address the jury no sound save the breathing of the audience could be heard. With a few preliminary remarks, in which he avowed his belief, and that of his associates, in the irresponsibility of the prisoner, he pushed eagerly forward into the very heart of the matter. The scene that followed was bewilderingly rapid in transformations; his appeal seemed absolutely to swell with indignation. Every look, word, and gesture showed the intensity of his feelings. Those who were opposed to him in their belief as to the mental condition of the prisoner were forced to admire the determined and intrepid courage manifested in the face of all opposition. As by the legerdemain of some skilled magician, that vast audience was swayed and moved by the passionate appeals of the orator and the dramatic episodes that marked its delivery. The prisoner alone sat unmoved. The veteran judge, who for years had sat upon the bench and listened to the most powerful pleadings of attorneys of note and orators of national renown, was visibly affected by the eloquence and earnestness of the young lawyer, and afterward, in conversation with the writer, paid high tribute to his splendid effort. But no power on earth could save his client. The sword of justice, so long suspended, was about to descend. The judge delivered his charge and the jury retired to their rooms for deliberation. They returned to the court room several times for further instructions, and for the reading of different parts of the testimony. They also examined the cell, and appeared to be according the doomed man every chance. At two o'clock in the morning they came into court with a verdict of sanity. The prisoner received the verdict with the same stolid indifference that had characterized his appearance during the whole inquiry. When, however, the time arrived that had been designated by the court as the fatal morning, the doomed man seemed to have thrown off the mask and was, apparently, trying to fit himself for his impending fate. He requested Sheriff Jones to call in Father Haley to administer the necessary consolation in the last moments of his earthly career. At half past ten o'clock the priest visited the jail and learned his wishes. He requested the priest to come early next morning and prepare him to die a sincere Catholic. At the appointed hour Father Haley visited the jail, explained the doctrine of his church, and stated the necessary conditions for one who embraces the Catholic faith. Being satisfied as to the prisoner's sincerity and disposition to become a Catholic, he heard his confession, had him make the profession of faith, and administered the sacrament of baptism, according to the rites of the church.

"In the meantime a rumor had been floating about that a telegram had been received by Sheriff Jones from Governor Boyd, granting to the condemned a reprieve for thirty days, which, upon investigation, proved true. After the fact became generally known, great indignation was freely expressed. About three o'clock in the afternoon the immense throng became restless, and muttered threatnings began to be heard on all sides.

HAMER AND OTHERS QUIET CROWD

"Just at this critical moment, before the thunder cloud of discontent and distrust of the law could burst forth, the calm, dignified person of Judge Hamer appeared upon the stone steps at the front door of the court house, and he briefly, in a clear, ringing voice, addressed the people as follows:

"Fellow Citizens of Custer County: I have been trying to administer the law in this county, as I interpreted it, fairly, carefully, and candidly — so carefully that no decision handed down by me upon this bench has been reversed. Have patience; the majesty of the law will be maintained. I have always found the people of this county law-abiding citizens; I have always found them ready to defend the innocent and punish the guilty. If, as I have been informed, there seems to be a disposition to murmur at the law's delay, arising among you, I pray you be patient. Pause; make no mistake. This man whom you would have expiate his offense upon the gallows to-day was tried by a fair and impartial jury of his countrymen and found guilty. As he had a perfect right to do, he appealed his case to the supreme court, and there the verdict of your jury was sustained and he was again sentenced to be hanged. Where there is a question of the sanity of a prisoner under sentence of death, the law provides that upon notice from the sheriff of the county it becomes the duty of the district judge to cause a jury to be empanelled to make inquiry as to the sanity or insanity of such prisoner. I received such a notice. Such a jury was called, and, after careful inquiry, pronounced him sane. I desire again to call the attention of the people to the fact that, as to the prisoner, he stands in this position: He was tried and convicted. He was again convicted and is now ready for execution. I therefore ask you to do your duty as law-abiding citizens. I want to say to you that the arm of the law is all powerful if it can have the support of honest men. I know Governor Boyd, and I believe that he is an honest man. He must have had good reason for granting this reprieve. We do not know what showing may have been made to him. There are always two sides to a question, and I believe that we should have patience and trust the man that your ballots have placed in such a high position. You have yet no reason to complain. Wait. You will be protected. Telegrams have been sent, but as yet we have received no answer. You have no reason to doubt yet. I am aware of the fact that the burden of taxation upon you is already heavy — no one knows this better than I — but the expense has already been made. No further expense is to be incurred. I therefore ask you, as honest men, as law-abiding citizens, that you do nothing rash. Let it be said that the law has triumphed in Custer county, and that justice reigns.

"James Whitehead, James Stockham, and Judge Wahl each addressed the crowd and succeeded in quieting them. Judge Hamer, James Whitehead, and James Stockham later called upon the Governor, to obtain assurance that no further obstacle would be offered to the execution of the sentence, and they were informed that as far as any action of his might be concerned, their trip was utterly useless. He intimated that he proposed to offer no further delay than that provided for in his order of respite, and should not have offered that had he been informed in time of the result of the investigation of Haunstine's alleged insanity.

THE EXECUTION TAKES PLACE

in the morning, the streets of Broken Bow began to fill with people from the surrounding country, to witness the closing ceremonies of the doomed man's career on earth. The center of attraction for the crowd appeared to be the enclosure of rough boards adjoining the south end of the court house, which hid from public gaze the scaffold from which the murderer was to be dropped into eternity. The doors of the court house were closed against the admission of all except those who had a permit from the sheriff, and a wire fence was placed about the shed containing the scaffold, at a distance of about twenty feet. It had been decided to have the execution at one o'clock, but this was not known to the public generally. Accordingly as early as nine o'clock in the morning the crowd began to gather, in order to be on hand when the time came. The scaffold was fenced in by a high board wall. Time wore on slowly until noon; the crowd gathered until fully 2,000 men, women, and children blocked the street on the south side of the court house. Noticeable among the number were many women with babes in their arms. Prominent among those present were many relatives of the men murdered, all eager to witness the doomed man pay the death penalty. We would add here that the relatives of the doomed man were esteemed and highly respected citizens, well known to our people, who sympathized deeply with them in their great trouble, which, through no fault of theirs, had come upon them.

"About 12:30 o'clock a thrill of excitement went through the crowd when Eli Roten appeared on the top beam of the scaffold which projected above the fence, and threw a block of wood over into the yard. This was a signal which had, seemingly, been agreed upon, whereupon about fifty men sprang over the wire fence, shoved the guards aside, and in less time than it takes to tell it, the high fence was lying flat on the ground and the gruesome gibbet stood in plain view of everybody. It was a moment of intense excitement, but Sheriff Jones stepped upon the scaffold and exacted of the crowd a solemn promise to remain outside the fence and interfere no further with the proceedings. Haunstine, accompanied by Father Haley and Sheriff Jones, mounted the scaffold. He looked for a moment over the sea of upturned faces and in a full, steady voice, without a tremor, he said:

"Ladies and Gentlemen—I desire to ask forgiveness from any one here whom I have offended. I also want you to forgive me for all the trouble and expense I have been to the county. I also ask all to take warning from me, and learn to do right before it is too late. Remember that little things grow into large things and the committing of little sins led me on to the commission of the crime which has brought me where I now stand. Again I ask all to forgive me, and hope you will not neglect to seek salvation.

"Father Haley then whispered a few parting words of consolation, pressed the crucifix to the doomed man's lips, placed a cross and a string of beads around his neck, and exactly two minutes before one o'clock the trap was sprung. The strain of the shock was too much for the rope, which parted like a thread, letting the unfortunate man fall in a heap to the ground. The second fall broke his neck and in thirteen minutes he was pronounced dead, by the physicians in attendance. His body was taken into the sheriff's office, where it was prepared for burial by W. J. Woods, after which it was turned over to his brother, who, in the silence of the night, took the remains to his home in the southwest part of the county, where they were quietly interred. Thus ended the tragedy which opened that bright November morning in 1888. It was an impressive, a horrible scene, and one which few who witnessed it will ever care to see repeated.

THE ONLY EXECUTION

"In preparing the above account of the first and only legal execution that has ever taken place in Custer county, years after the commission of the crime, we have had access to the records, and from the attorneys engaged have sought additional information; but it is to the local papers that so faithfully chronicled the events and daily happenings in the community that we are principally indebted for the details given, prominent among which we mention the Custer Leader, the Republican, the Merna Rec- ord, the Callaway Courier, and the State Journal."

A FATAL LAND QUARREL

Some time in the early spring of 1885 Joseph Y. Province and his family, in which there were several boys, settled on the South Loup near the mouth of Spring creek. He had homesteaded a quarter-section in the Brighton ranch and one upon which pre-emption papers had been previously taken out. He had hardly established his residence before a man named Stephen Long claimed the place by right of relinquishment papers from the man who had made the former pre-emption entry and began building a house on the place, not far from the Province home.

Concerning the feud that followed, and that later ended in a gun fight and the death of Province, an early writer tells the story as follows:

"This man Long was a single man and an employe of the Brighton Ranch Company. The feud thus started between the rival claimants to this land ended later in the killing of old man Province.

"It will be remembered that the land within this immense pasture, comprising some fifteen square miles of territory, was government land subject to entry by homesteaders, and was simply appropriated by the cattle men without warrant of law. As soon as settlers began to file on claims within its fence the ranch company had as many of its employes as possible file on claims, in order to retain for its use the claims thus taken. Long is said to have been one of these employes, and from this time on constant quarrels occurred between him and Province, pending the decision of the land office as to the rightful owner of the claim. There were charges and counter charges. At one time, we believe, the ranch company had the Province boys, George Sickler, and John McDermott, arrested on a charge of cattle stealing. John McDermott demanded a separate trial, and the company proved that he helped to kill a 1,600-pound beef and carried one hind-quarter two miles in a two-bushel sack. John S. Kirkpatrick (now a member of the Nebraska supreme court commission), then a young man, just starting in business in Custer county, had John's case in hand. He took advantage of this evidence, made an eloquent plea, showing that his client was a man who weighed but 110 pounds, yet had been charged with carrying one-quarter of a 1,600-pound beef two miles in a two-bushel sack. The jury was out about fifteen minutes, and it is said they agreed among themselves that they believed the prisoner was not guilty, but if he had done as the testimony said he did, Mac had earned the beef. The cases against the Province boys and Sickler never came to trial."

WAR BREAKS OUT

On Thursday morning, April 9, 1885, Mr. Province started to Broken Bow, leaving two sons, aged about twelve and fourteen respectively, to plow. Shortly after the departure of Province, Long appeared where the boys were at work, armed with a Winchester, and ordered them to quit or he would shoot. The boys immediately quit work and started after their father, overtaking him before he arrived at Broken Bow. Mr. Province came on to town and contemplated getting out a warrant, but being advised not to do so, returned home during the evening. The next morning he went out and commenced plowing where the boys had left off. A few hours later John McDermott came galloping into Broken Bow with the news that Mr. Province had been shot down by Stephen Long or Charles Powell. Dr. Daum immediately started for the scene of the tragedy and found that Province was dead.

On Saturday morning, Dr. Hull, county coroner, summoned a jury and, in company with a large number of citizens of Broken Bow and the surrounding country, visited the place where the murder had been committed. There all the available testimony was taken. The first witness examined was Maria Powell, wife of Charles Powell, who lived in the house with Long. In her testimony Mrs. Powell said that she was in the house when the shooting occurred; Mr. Powell and Mr. Long had gone out of the house; Mr. Long had a Winchester and Mr. Powell a needle gun; did not see the men when the shooting commenced, and did not see outside until after Mr. Province was shot; heard Province call for Mr. Long to come on, he was ready for him. She thought Province had fired five shots, Long two, and her man the last shot. When the shooting was over she saw Long and Powell in the dooryard, and Mrs. Province coming down to where her husband was lying. I asked Mr. Long: "Did you hit him?" He said: "I guess I did, for he fell." The men stayed about the house until after dinner and then went down to Allyn's lower ranch.

Philip S. Province, a son of the deceased, said he was plowing with his father; that Steve Long and Charley Powell came out of the house and shot two or three times, and that his father then shot at them several times with a revolver. The men were about seventy-five yards distant when the firing commenced, and he was sure his father did not commence shooting first. After they had fired several shots he saw Long behind a wagon and Powell on the west side of the house. They kept on firing and Province fired several shots at them with his revolver, and also with a shotgun which he had with him. He then started for the house and had gone about twenty feet when he fell. The shooting took place about eight o'clock in the morning.

Joseph Y. Province, supposed to be on his death bed, but in sound mind and memory, doth depose and say:

Stephen D. Long, and, I think, the man living in the house with said Long, on the 10th day of April, 1885, about eight o'clock in the morning, came out and commenced shooting at me, with repeating rifles, as near as I could make out. I shot back at them. I was in my field plowing, about fifty yards from said Long's house, when the firing commenced. After they had shot once or twice I shot back. I shot five times, one with a single-barrel shot gun and balance with a revolver. Buck shot No. 3 was in the shot gun. They shot a dozen or more shots. After I had shot all in my weapons, as I thought, I called to them to stop shooting; I would give up; but they kept on shooting until one of them hit me. I do not know which one hit me. When said Long came out I said: "Now draw your revolver on me if you want to." I was on my way to my house when I was shot. I was about 100 yards from said Long's house when I was shot.

Sworn and subscribed to before me, in the town of Custer, county of Custer, and state of Nebraska, this 10th day of April, A. D. 1885.

BENJAMIN L. BRISBANE,

Town Clerk for the Town of Custer.

The following verdict was returned by the coroner's jury:

STATE OF NEBRASKA,

Custer County.

At an inquisition held at the late residence of Joseph Y. Province, in Custer county, Nebraska, on the 11th day of April, 1885, before Wyman Hull, coroner of said county, upon the body of Joseph Y. Province, lying dead, by its jurors, whose names are hereunto subscribed, the said jurors, upon their oaths, do say that the deceased came to his death by means of a gun-shot wound, inflicted by a bullet discharged from a gun in the hands of one Stephen Long or one Charles Powell, whom the jury find made a felonious assault upon the said deceased, on the morning of April 10, 1885, with repeating rifles, each of said parties firing several shots at deceased, one of which shots struck and produced the death of said Joseph Y. Province.

Shortly after the shooting Long and Powell hid themselves in the hills. When the sheriff, C. P. Foote, arrived on the spot on Saturday he found about seventy-five armed men there in a state of great excitement, vowing vengeance against the murderers. The sheriff tried to reason with them, but they were not disposed to listen to him. He said they had a perfect right to be there if they were there to see the law carried out, but if they were there to commit another deed of violence he advised them to disband and go home. This enraged the mob the more, and a petition was gotten up on the spot, calling upon the sheriff to resign, which was signed by about fifty persons on the butt of a musket. A messenger came from the murderers that they would give themselves up if they were guaranteed protection against violence at the hands of the citizens. This assurance was given and Long and Powell were arrested and taken before T. B. Buckner, a justice of the peace, where they waived examination. A mittimus was issued and the prisoners taken to the jail at Lexington, for safe keeping until their trial in the district court, a number of citizens having declared that the men would never be tried in Custer county, but that they would be hanged without a trial.

As soon as the sheriff had left with the prisoners, the mob which was left behind, instead of returning to their homes, proceeded down the river to the White House, the headquarters of the Brighton Ranch Company, where lived Virgil Allyn, the foreman. Mr. Allyn was absent at Lexington at the time, and the citizens set about sacking and looting the place, from cellar to garret, helping themselves to everything in the shape of eatables and drinkables they could lay their hands on. As Mr. Allyn was one of the highest livers in the country, it is needless to say that the hungry mob had a feast the like of which few of them had enjoyed since they came to the county. Among his other supplies the foreman had a cask of rare old wine, which he kept for the especial entertainment of the guests at the numerous banquets that were held at the White House. The discovery of this treasure was hailed with a shout by many of the mob, and a goodly number of them began to load up on liquor.

SPILLED THE BOOZE

At this stage of the proceedings an old, gray-headed man, who was among them, realizing the danger of adding intoxication to the already inflamed passions of the men, seized a hatchet and knocked in the head of the cask, letting the contents run out on the ground. This brave act probably saved Custer county from an added blot upon her already blackened record, and for his timely interference at this critical time the name of Isaac Merchant should be revered for all time to come. After having satisfied their appetites, the raiders loaded up all the canned goods and other provisions they could find about the place and carried them to the widow Province, the cooler heads only preventing the others from burning the house before they left. On their way back a log house belonging to the Brighton Ranch Company was burned. The house was of cedar logs and was valued at $1,000. By this time Allyn had heard, in Lexington, of what was going on, and started at once for home to protect his property. Fortunately, before his arrival, the mob dispersed, else there would, in all probability, have been more trouble of a serious nature, as he brought a posse of armed cowboys with him.

The session of the district court in which Long and Powell were tried convened on Monday, July 6, 1885, with Judge Francis G. Hamer on the bench. A special venire of 120 were summoned to try the case. The empaneling of the jury commenced before noon on Monday and was not completed until ten o'clock on Tuesday. The following jurors were chosen: L. Sutton, West Union; John K. Cooper, Ortello; S. H. Read, Merna; William Hyatt, Myrtle; C. A. Wetherby and J. Snell, Keota; H. Gage, A. C. Blakeslee, W. H. Henderson, Wood River; H. C. Stuckey, Georgetown; J. L. Oxford, Lillian.

The attorneys for the state were H. M. Sinclair (district attorney), Aaron Wall, and Thomas Darnell, while the defendants were represented by Attorneys McNamar, Greene, and Chapman. After a hard-fought battle the jury returned the following verdict:

The State of Nebraska	}
vs.	{ss.
Stephen Long and Charles Powell]

We, the jury in this case, being duly empanelled and sworn, do find and say that we find the defendant, Stephen Long, is guilty of manslaughter, as charged in the indictment, and recommend him to the mercy of the court; and we find the defendant, Charles Powell, not guilty.

LOUIS SUTTON, Foreman.

In due time the following sentence was pronounced against Stephen Long by Judge Hamer:

It is therefore considered and adjudged by the court that the said defendant, Stephen Long, be imprisoned and confined in the penitentiary of the state of Nebraska, at hard labor, for the period of four years and six months, and that he pay the costs of this prosecution, and that he stay committed in the hands of the sheriff of Custer county, Nebraska, until the sentence of this court be complied with or he be otherwise legally discharged.

After serving about two years of his time, Long was pardoned out, on account of ill health, and he died in about a month thereafter.

MAKING AN HONEST MEXICAN

[The following account of the shooting of a half-breed Mexican was published in the Callaway Courier, in July, 1887]:

For some time past numerous complaints have been made of robberies committed by unknown parties in unoccupied houses. Everything seemed to be acceptable to the thieves. Monday afternoon Mr. Simon Landis came into town and swore out a warrant before Justice Deems for the arrest of two men, names unknown, who had robbed him of harness and other articles to the value of thirty-six dollars, and had also stolen some carpenter tools from the house of Henry Schuette.

The warrant was placed in the hands of Mr. Fred Jephcott, constable of Noel, and L. M. Holman, constable of Callaway, for service. These gentlemen immediately started up the valley in pursuit, struck the trail at Finch-Hatton's ranch and followed it to Arnold, where they got a fresh team and were joined by the Arnold constable, Mr. Brown. The party followed the trail north to Hackberry canyon, and all along the road heard of the depredations committed by the robbers. They had at one place left their old wagon and taken a better one, but the trade was to their injury, for the wagon they stole had wire wrapped around a loose tire and left on the road a distinct mark that was easily seen. They also stole a gun, four silk handkerchiefs, and a revolver. The Callaway constable held the trail while the Arnold contingent scouted around. After finding the search in the canyon useless, the party went on up the road to Anselmo, where they again changed horses. From there the pursuers followed traces of the robbers to a point three miles north of Dale, when they found the robbers had doubled in their road and gone to Luce's canyon. When the constables got there they found that the robbers had gone to Merna the night before (Monday) and stopped there over night.

By this time the constables were tired out, having traveled a day and a night without rest or food, so they went on to Broken Bow, having sent out scouts to scour the country around.

Sheriff Penn being absent from town, the constables, with some deputies, started out with two teams. The Callaway constable, L. M. Holman, the Noel constable, Fred Jephcott, and Joseph Trout, with a driver, were in one wagon, and the rest of the party were in the other. At about dusk they met a man on the main road at the mouth of the canyon, who told them that the robbers were coming. The officers then separated into two parties, the Callaway party taking to the right and the others to the left.

This canyon is six miles north of Broken Bow, one-half mile north of Peter Mohat's stock farm, on land belonging to the Hunter ranch, since known as Dead Man's canyon. At the edge of the canyon they met the robbers in a wagon with bows but no cover. Mr. Jephcott, who took command, immediately on seeing them shouted "Halt!" telling the robbers to surrender, as his party were officers come to arrest them. No attention was paid by the robbers, when Mr. Jephcott ordered them to halt three times more.

At the fourth warning the officers saw a flash through the dusk, and could plainly see the men reaching for their Winchester rifles, which were hanging on the bows on each side of the wagon. The word to fire was then given and the Callaway party opened upon the robbers, being immediately followed by the Arnold party. At the first fire, one of the men who was sitting on the side of the wagon furthest away from the Callaway party, sprang from the wagon to the ground, dead. A rifle bullet had passed through his body, entering at his left side and passing out at the right. The other man fell to the bottom of the wagon box and the horses went tearing down the canyon.

The officers at once followed and overtook the team a mile and a half away, but the other man had escaped, on a saddle horse that had been tied to the wagon. Half an hour after the slaying Sheriff Penn arrived on the scene. He at once took possession of the wagon, the team and the corpse of the dead man, and brought them to Broken Bow.

The half-breed Mexican was about twenty-five years of age, six feet tall and well built. Inside his shirt, covered with clotted blood, was found a badge of the Cincinnati detective force.

The wagon-box was half full of miscellaneous articles, which they had probably stolen. Among them were several guns, revolvers, saddles, clocks, carpenter tools, silk handkerchiefs, and other articles. A coroner's jury was empaneled and immediately brought in a verdict that the killing was justified and that the officers were blameless.

FATAL HILARITY AT ANSELMO

It was April 1, 1887, "all fool's day," an appropriate date for the fool escapade pulled off by Billy Degan and Hugh Fitzpatrick at Anselmo. They boarded an early freight train out of Linscott, and, not being able to restrain themselves until they reached Anselmo, commenced their gun play in the caboose. They pulled off a series of cowboy stunts calculated to terrorize the passengers. The late L. H. Jewett was on board that morning and afterward stated that the crowd was a little too rough for him. When Anselmo was reached the two cowboys left the train and lost no time in preparing to give the town an exhibition of high life in the far west.

The Anselmo people had been warned that a visit from the cowboys was on the program, and thus they were in a manner prepared to receive their expected guests. Billy Frischauf, a saloon-keeper, came to C. D. Pelham and asked him what he should do. Mr. Pelham advised him to close his saloon, and be it said to the credit of Frischauf, he followed the good counsel of his adviser, and not a drop of whisky was sold in his place during the whole of that fatal day. John Anderson, another saloon-keeper, also promised to shut up his place during the stay of the cowboys. Anderson did close his saloon in the morning, but having some business out of town, he turned his keys over to his brother, Frank, who unlocked the door and ran the place wide open all day. Things soon began to assume a lively aspect in the little village, and A. F. McKnight, the man who pumped water for the railroad company, using horse power, brought his team over to the livery stable, saying that he had told the company that their locomotives could get no water at Anselmo, as cowboys were painting the town and he did not propose to run the risk of getting shot. The boys were using the pump-house as a target.

A noticeable feature of the occasion was that one of the cowboys appeared to be a gentlemanly sort of fellow and took no active part in the shooting, but apparently tried to keep his companion within bounds. The other, however, crazy with bad whisky, determined to have all the fun he could get out of the spree. One of his antics was to place old tin cans on the tops of hitching posts in the street and then shoot them full of holes, regardless of the danger to passers-by, who had to seek safety by getting behind buildings. When he got tired of this diversion he shot a hole through the stovepipe inside a furniture store, the bullet almost grazing the head of Mr. McDowell, who was managing the business for J. H. Brandebury, the proprietor.

In the meantime some of the citizens had had a conference to discuss the advisability of sending for the sheriff, but they decided to wait a little while, hoping that the rowdies would cool off and behave themselves. The boys went to Anderson's saloon, where Degan, the tougher of the pair, was having a fine time marching around in drunken gyrations and shooting holes in the floor and ceiling, when a bullet from his revolver accidentally penetrated the toe of a young man by the name of Murray. The report immediately flew about town that the cowboys had shot a man, and the following telegram was immediately dispatched to Broken Bow:

Anselmo, Nebraska, April 1, 1887.
Sheriff Custer County, Broken Bow, Nebr.:

Cowboys are terrorizing the citizens of Anselmo, and one man has been shot through the foot. We ask your protection.

(Signed)

WALTER SCOTT
C. D. PELHAM

Charlie Huntington let the cowboys have an old dray horse, and another was procured at a livery stable kept by one Bassey. Mounted on these steeds the two rode into Pelham's store, helped themselves to cigars, rode out and across the street to the store of Weander Brothers, where they got something else. By this time it was getting along in the afternoon, and the citizens were anxiously awaiting the arrival of the sheriff, who was expected every moment. After visiting all the stores in town, Fritzpatrick and Degan returned to the saloon, where they attempted the novel feat of playing a game of pool on horseback, Degan firing off his gun occasionally to emphasize his points. It was in the midst of this diversion that Sheriff Penn and his deputy arrived, pulling up at Pelham's barn. Tom Kimes and Charlie Murray rode out of the barn and Penn, mistaking them for the cowboys, brought his Winchester to his shoulder and commanded them to throw up their hands. Pelham apprised Penn of his mistake, much to the relief of the frightened young men. At this juncture another report from Degan's revolver rang out and Penn inquired: "What shooting is that?" "Cowboys in the saloon," was the reply.

The cowboys were soon given a tip that the sheriff was in town, when they immediately rode out of the saloon into the street, where they got a glimpse of the officer, surrounded by a crowd of citizens, in front of the livery barn. They fired a parting salute from their six-shooters and rode out of town to the northwest. Penn and his men followed them to a house situated on a triangular piece of ground on the outskirts of the village. From this house a road went directly north and another ran parallel with the railroad track in a northwesterly direction. The latter road was taken by the cowboys, who proceeded as far as the hand-car house and then came to a standstill. Penn and his men halted at the dwelling house above referred to, where they waited to see what the boys were going to do. After about fifteen minutes Fitzpatrick and Degan turned the heads of their horses around and slowly approached the sheriff's party. Penn placed his deputy, Jones, and Humphrey Smith, who had volunteered to assist him, at the northeast corner of the house guarding the road from the north, which passed on the east side of the building. He gave them strict orders that in case the cowboys came their way to first demand them to halt; then, if they did not stop, to shoot their horses; and finally, if they still refused to surrender, to shoot them. Penn took his station near the southeast corner, that being the point to which the boys were apparently approaching. When within a short distance from the house they turned and rode directly east, striking the road running north and south, and were rapidly nearing the deputies. One of the men shouted out: "Here they come!" and Penn rushed over from his corner and commanded: "Throw up your hands; I am the sheriff of Custer county!" The boys paid no attention to the command. Eye witnesses say that the horses were shot first, Fitzpatrick's animal becoming frantic. He held the bridle rein with his left hand and was reaching behind to grasp the saddle to keep from falling off, when Smith, thinking he was reaching for his revolver, fired and shot him through the heart. It was afterward learned that Fitzpatrick was unarmed, having thrown his revolver away before he rode back to town, possibly thinking that in case he was arrested it would go easier with him if it was found that he did not carry a weapon. Degan's horse was also shot, and refusing to surrender, the rider then and there met the same fate at the hands of Penn. An inquest was held and a verdict returned to the effect that the two cowboys had been killed while resisting arrest at the hands of officers of the law.

Credit to Custer county eleven good towns, with a combined population of nine thousand one hundred souls. Eleven towns in which the people are progressive, wide-awake, and prosperous. No other county in the state has as many good towns. No other county has as many miles of railroad, nor does any other county parade as many miles of river valleys. This extent of fertile valleys and railroads is what makes so many towns in the county possible.

Notwithstanding there are eleven towns of the description given, there is a village graveyard in which lie buried nine towns which once lived and thrived and were on the map, for a few short years, before they ended their troubled careers.

Call the roll: Westerville, West Union, Old

Merina, Wescott, Algernon, Lee's Park, first and second Callaway, Dale. There is no response. Only one of these places maintains a store and not one has a postoffice. The town is dead and the streets have been plowed and are occupied by corn and wheat, alternately.

Some of these towns were so large and had such a good start that they deserve extended mention. One of these is Westerville, which, by the failure of the railroad to build through its valley, lost its opportunity.

WESTERVILLE

In 1886, thirty-two years ago, Westerville was the principal town in Custer county, as it was situated in the eastern part, where most of the settlements were made, and it had a considerable trade. Clear creek flows along the north and east sides, but why it was named "Clear" creek they never knew, for it has been muddy ever since they saw it, some forty years ago. On the north bank of Clear creek is the flouring mill, operated by water power. Several years ago, in the '80s, they had very heavy rain storms during the spring, dangerously raising Clear creek. The water worked its way under the banks and caused great pieces of earth to cave into the water. The people feared that some of the buildings nearest the bank would be undermined. The flouring mill stood so close to the water, that men had to work night and day to save it. One man, standing on the bank, happened to look behind him and saw the ground cracking all around. He had scarcely time to escape when that portion upon which he had stood dropped into the water below.

MIGHT HAVE BEEN COUNTY SEAT

The reason Westerville is not the county seat of Custer county, we are told, is because the first settlers were not willing to make a sacrifice of about one hundred dollars deemed necessary to secure this distinction, and while Westerville slumbered and felt secure, Broken Bow worked and soon won the prize. This was mistake number one for Westerville.

Two county fairs were held here, one in 1883 and the other in 1884. In the fair held in 1884 two things were of very much interest to the people, a turtle that had been taken from Clear creek and a fawn that was captured a few miles north of there. The turtle was nearly as large as a washtub, in which it was exhibited. A number of the people of Broken Bow attended the fair in 1884. The question, "Where shall the county fair be held next year?" was submitted to the people, and when the votes were counted it was found that Westerville had lost the privilege of having it, a privilege which she never regained. Mistake number two for Westerville.

In Westerville's most prosperous days they had several dry-goods and grocery stores, a large hardware store, over which was a public hall, three hotels, a flouring mill, two blacksmith shops, a cutlery store, a good public library, a bank that carried on quite an extensive business, printing offices, a drug store, and a good school and church. They could boast of two doctors, Waterbury and Morris. J. A. Armour, afterward county judge, was the town lawyer.

A NEW TOWN LAID OUT

In the spring of 1883 Merna took a boom. D. S. Lohr put up a frame building, south of Brotherton's store, and hopes ran high as imagination pictured a growing city, but it proved a delusion, for Lohr soon moved his store, building and all, some five miles up the valley, where he founded the town of Dale.

This led to the formation of a townsite company at Merna, and a town was located and laid out in section 36, two miles northwest of Brotherton's store, and within three miles of Dale. Authority was granted by the post-office department at Washington to move the postoffice to the new site. Mr. Brotherton formed a partnership with Milton Casteel and J. D. Strong, and a great department store was opened. W. E. Warren built a shack and hung out a mortar and pestle, which indicated to all concerned that he had a fresh assortment of drugs and a limited supply of stomach bitters for sale. If the business side of these ventures is not a pleasant memory to the gentlemen concerned, the old croquet ground and the old sod town-hall, which came into existence through their untiring energy, will always be an oasis in that desert of uncertain business prosperity.

Later a blacksmith shop, a frame hotel, and another store made their appearance, but today the old townsite is plowed as a field and yields its store of grain to feed Custer county's helpless poor, as it is a part of the county poor farm.

During the summer and fall of 1886 the B. & M. Railroad was extended from Grand Island to Alliance, and the Lincoln Townsite Company purchased Brotherton's old claim and relocated Merna on the site of its birth. This settled the townsite controversy and the future of Merna was assured.

The town grew rapidly into a respectable village, with many lines of trade and various industries represented. Brotherton and Warren moved from the new Merna back to the old site, and rush of population from the east caused houses to spring up like mushrooms after a rain. Mr. Wilson was a pioneer grain dealer, building the first elevator. The business has been widened under the management of his son, L. W. Wilson, until now they buy grain at three points in the county.

LEE'S PARK

In April, 1884, the town of Lee's Park was laid out in Custer county, on the town line, and the same year, the Lilly & Houder addition to Lee's Park was laid out, adjoining the original town, and in Valley county, with the postoffice in Valley county. Then came quite a little boom for a new town. A general merchandise store was built by Lilly & Houder, to which the postoffice was removed; then followed a blacksmith shop, a hotel, a wagon shop, and a feed stable. This little town was progressing finely when the B. & M. Railroad concluded to outdo the Union Pacific Railroad, and so built past Loup City, the terminus of the Union Pacific Railroad, and stopped at Arcadia, five miles from Lee's Park. The little town held out for a while, but the railroad town of Arcadia took away its vitality, and after some struggles the town of Lee's Park was no more. All the buildings were torn down or removed, and an attempt was made to take away even the postoffice. The attempt was nearly, or quite, successful, as the postoffice was actually removed to Arcadia, but prompt action was taken by patrons of the office, and an order came for its return, only a day after its removal. The postoffice was afterward removed from Valley county across the line into Custer county, where it remained until mail delivery made it unnecessary. The fact that originally the postoffice was in Valley county, and is now in Custer county, has caused some confusion as to the real location of Lee's Park, some thinking it in Valley, and some in Custer county. The name of the town and postoffice has also been confused with the name of the valley. Originally the postoffice had the same name as the valley, but Jay Hamlin, while postmaster, had the name of the office changed to Lee Park, consequently the name of the postoffice is Lee Park, and the name of the valley is Lee's Park.

At the time of the laying out of the town, a cemetery association was formed, and five acres of land were purchased from W. S. Delano, and laid out as the Lee's Park cemetery. Trees were soon set out and cared for, and in consequence the cemetery is a fine one. The following year the Catholic cemetery was laid out, one-half mile north of Lee's Park cemetery.

OTHER DEAD ONES

When the railroad was built up the Middle Loup valley, Wescott was not in line. The road went on the other side of the river and the town of Comstock was located just north of the river. Wescott could not survive the shock.

Algernon, on the Muddy, was put off the map in much the same way. The railroad company located its depot where Mason now stands, and Algernon surrendered. Merna, old Merna, was three miles off the road when the Burlington located its line and depot at the present site of Merna, and the town had to move. There was a first Callaway and a second Callaway (see story of Callaway) before the arrival of the Union Pacific Railroad. Both of these towns are no more, both capitulated and helped to form the present town. The stroke that killed old Merna, killed Dale. Without a railroad it was left stranded. West Union was in the way of the river line of railroad and if Sargent had not been made a terminus of the line West Union would have gotten a railroad and have been on the map as a good Custer county town.

Towns, then, died and were buried, and new townsite, which was named in honor of him. Frank Lemon opened up a grocery store in this building. On September 25th James Hines began the blacksmithing business. On October 1st Frank and John Currie began buying grain, commencing at the same time the erection of an elevator. On October 3d the railroad company opened its station for business, P. C. Croaker agent. On October 4th Dierks Lumber & Coal Company, John Dierks, manager, unloaded its first shipment of coal at this point. On October 10th Robert their streets, that were once marked for the avenues of commerce, hear no sound save the rattle of the harvester and the chug of the passing autos. The story changes to live towns.

COMSTOCK

The village of Comstock, the youngest town in Custer county, is located on the east bank of the Middle Loup river, on the Aurora and Sargent extension of the B. & M. Railroad. The town was located and surveyed in 1899. A store building was moved over from Westcott, by W. H. Comstock, and located on the Stone began buying stock, with H. H. Wheeler as agent, followed in December by Mr. Parks, both building stock yards. In October a general hardware and implement store was opened. The postoffice opened for business November 19th, with S. T. Stevens as postmaster. The hotel was completed and opened to the public in November, but was soon found too small for the proper accommodation of the traveling public. A feed and sale stable was in operation in December. Walter Hammond opened a barber shop in December, and Albert Apperson commenced the draying business at the same time. In January, 1900, M.

stock opened a harness store and repair shop. In December Wescott & Gibbons moved their general merchandise store from the west side of the river and began business in Comstock. In January, 1901, Frank Hammond began business in a new blacksmith and wagon repair shop. R. R. Bangs moved into the hotel in January. C. N. McWorthy built his house for a residence, millinery and dressmaking store in February. In March the Modern Woodmen commenced the erection of a two-story building, the ground floor to be used as a drug store, bank, and meat market, and the upper floor for a public hall. A commodious schoolhouse was built in the fall of 1900. The first child born in the village of Comstock was Helen Apperson, February 23, 1900. Concerning the town to-day, E. F. Skolil makes the following resumé:

Comstock is a thriving, growing and up-to-date town on the Aurora and Sargent branch of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, located in the Middle Loup valley on the east side of Custer county and about at the center of the state of Nebraska. It is an all-around good and prosperous little town of over five hundred inhabitants. It contains three churches, Congregational, Methodist, and Latter-Day Saints, three good and prospering general merchandise stores—Wescott Gibbons & Bragg, the leading store, established in 1886; F. C. Dworak, established in 1900; J. C. Kiker, established 1917. Two good banks—the Citizens State Bank, the leading bank, established in 1906; and the Farmers' & Merchants' State Bank, established in 1909. The banking resources of this little town are over $600,000, which tends to show that it is a prosperous and growing town, as it is only about eighteen years old. Comstock can well boast of the two most modern, up-to-date bank buildings in the county. Two good lumber yards—Dierks Lumber & Coal Company, starting in business about the time the town was platted, and S. A. Foster and Company, in 1911. Two good hardware stores, and furniture store in conjunction with one of them—J. T. Arthur, established in 1907, succeeding S. T. Stevens—and C. E. Brandt, established in 1914, succeeding R. R. Bangs, who conducted a hardware and furniture store for over ten years previously. One blacksmith shop, one of the most up-to-date and neatest drug stores in the county, owned by E. C. Gibbons and operated by J. D. Rockhold since 1912. One harness shop, established with the town by J. W. Comstock and still owned by him and operated by his son, A. L. Comstock. Two good implement stores, two automobile garages, one livery barn, one butcher shop, one barber shop, one pump and general-repair shop, one of the largest and best flouring mills in that part of the state, (owned and operated by C. F. Eller), one farmers' live-stock shipping association, two live-stock dealers, one hotel, one of the best and most up-to-date restaurants in this section, under the name of Woodman Café, owned by W. E. Gibbons, E. F. Skolil and Aley Shafer, established in 1918 in the Woodman Fraternal building. One modern moving-picture theater, established in 1912 by Charles D. Bragg and E. C. Gibbons, along with an electric plant from which the people of Comstock are deriving much good and comfort, as the service is as good as in large cities. One grain elevator, owned by W. T. Barstow almost since the town originated. One printing office where the Comstock News is edited and published and which deserves a great deal of credit for the prosperity and advancement of this town. One large and modern opera house, in the Woodmen Fraternal building, which was built in 1917, and contains also a large banquet hall and two large stores on the main floor.

In Comstock there are the following lodges: Knights of Pythias, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and Modern Woodmen of America. One doctor, four cream stations, one city hall, one telephone exchange (which has been under the good management of E. B. Wait since 1917 and is all rebuilt and giving good service), four coal yards, one good public school, with eleven grades. Comstock has some fine residences, a growing park, and the best sidewalks in the state.

Following are the members of the town board in 1918: E. F. Skolil (chairman), John F. Westcott, Ed. B. Wait, J. C. Kiker, and S. T. Stevens. Comstock has had four successful Chautauquas and many elaborate Fourth of July celebrations. Chautauquas and lecture courses have been maintained for many years.

THE BEGINNING OF CALLAWAY

One of the most enterprising towns of Custer county is Callaway, located on the South Loup river, in the midst of a valley that is beautiful and fertile enough for an Eden. The town is on the Kearney branch of the Union Pacific Railroad.

CITIZENS STATE BANK, AT COMSTOCK

The following record of the early settlement and growth of the town was written by George B. Mair several years ago and is reliably authentic.

"The most of those who were here in the beginning and who took an active part in the organization of the town have removed to other parts. The birth of Callaway, in the minds of the citizens of to-day, is apparently in the dim, distant past — a dust-covered tradition, and as an introduction to the history of Callaway a brief account of the settlement of the territory contiguous may not be out of place.

"Probably the first settler to locate in the South Loup valley between the present towns of Callaway and Arnold was Frederick Schreyer, who came in June, 1875, with a large family, and located a claim about four miles above Callaway. Mr. Schreyer soon found himself in trouble with the cowboys, who attempted to drive him away. He was a shining mark for practical jokes at the hands of the cowboys, and accepted in dead earnest everything they did to torment him. When they attempted to stampede a herd of cattle over the roof of his dug-out, or destroyed his watermelon patch, and such other innocent diversions, Mr. Schreyer positively refused to see the point of the joke.

"The next settler to arrive in the valley was David E. Sprouse, who located two miles northwest of the present town of Callaway. In October of the same year came Ira Graves and George T. Ricker, in search of land, the former filing on a homestead and timber claim, adjoining the future town, and the latter locating a mile north of the Sprouse claim. Charles C. Kingsbury and Mark Schneringer came about the same time. In 1880 came N. M. Morgan, M. N. Deems, H. B. Schneringer, Noah Welch, Norman Brendle, Gabriel Payton, Ira McConnell, the Whipples, and perhaps others.

"A postoffice was established in August,

1880, which was given the euphonious name of 'Letup,' with Ira Graves as postmaster. On petition of Ira Graves and Clara P. Graves the name of the office was changed to Delight in September of the same year. Mark Deems was installed as mail carrier, his route being from Custer to Arnold, and from Olax (now Oconto) and Lexington to Delight, all of these offices being supplied from Plum Creek.

"The county was organized into townships in 1883, and the territory embracing the entire southwestern part of the county was named Delight township, by N. M. Morgan, the first supervisor. Out of the original township the towns of Grant, Elim, and Wayne have since been formed, leaving the township of Delight with seventy-eight square miles. At the time of the settlement here, there was no other settlement between the Platte valley and Victoria creek. During the few years that followed, newcomers arrived almost weekly, until there was quite a community. In 1885 Mr. Graves induced John Moran, a merchant of Olax, to build a store on his farm, which stood on the northeast corner of the property now owned by John Frederick. The question as to who is entitled to the credit of founding the town of Callaway has been often disputed, and will be perhaps never fully determined to the satisfaction of all, but from what we can learn, J. Woods Smith is fully entitled to whatever honor the distinction confers, as it was in his brain that the scheme originated which materialized in the laying out of the town a few months later.

J. WOODS SMITH HAS A DREAM

"As Mr. Smith tells it, Callaway was first conceived in the lobby of the Paxton hotel at

PLANT OF CALLAWAY MILL COMPANY

Omaha, in the fall of 1885. While reading the morning paper, he chanced to come across an item stating that the Omaha & Republican Valley Railroad was going to survey a line up the South Loup river the next spring, to intersect with another road, which was to be surveyed up Wood River valley from Kearney. Mr. Smith went to a map which was hanging on the wall, and at once made up his mind that the point where these two roads came together would be an ideal place for a town. With his usual decision, Mr. Smith had a town laid out and thickly populated—in his mind—within five minutes. He immediately communicated the scheme to Hon. A. B. Chard, a personal friend, and the two started for Custer county to look over the situation. They found the location even more promising than they had anticipated, and made partial arrangements for the purchase of the Graves farm for a townsite, intending to return early in the spring to complete the deal. When spring came, Mr. Chard had other business and Mr. Smith proceeded alone. Upon his return to Delight he was unable to close the deal with Mr. Graves, and he succeeded in making an arrangement whereby the claims of Albert and M. H. Deems, comprising the east half of section 11, township 15, range 23, were secured for a townsite, the Deems taking shares in the syndicate in payment for their land. Mr. Smith also purchased of C. W. Gray the northwest quarter of section 11, on his own account, which is the land upon which the railroad addition to Callaway was afterward platted. E. B. Needham, capitalist from St. Paul, Nebraska, also took an interest in the townsite company, and the work of platting was commenced at once.

TOWN CHRISTENED

"The town was named in honor of S. R. Callaway, then general manager of the Union Pacific Railroad, and the streets were named after the general officers of that road and the members of the townsite company. The first to erect a building in the new town was Dr. L. Michael. The second building was erected by Harry E. O'Neill, for his brokerage business, which theretofore had been conducted on his claim half a mile west of town. The next building was a store by Albert Deems. Then John Moran moved his general store down from the corner of Mr. Graves' farm, Baker & Yates put up a store and put in a stock of groceries, Smith Brothers put up the opera-house building and put in a stock of hardware. These were followed in quick succession by W. B. Maze, hardware; Smith & Needham, lumber and coal; Maze & Burbank, flour and feed; Rogers & Johnson, the Bank of Callaway; Theron E. Webb, drug store; C. W. Root, drug store, moved from Arnold; Holway & Schneringer, livery; L. Palmer, feed stable; Lewis & Holman, meat market; M. L. Savage, furniture store; Clark & Owens, real estate, loans, and insurance; B. L. Brisbane, real estate; C. C. Hayes, James Suhr, blacksmiths; Alex. Mallert, G. A. James, restaurants; P. Wymore, John Calligan, McConnell & King, Tidey & Smea, carpenters; F. A. Clarke & Company, general store, moved from Arnold; M. H. Deems, Hotel Excelsior, operated by A. L. Mathews; J. C. Naylor, lawyer; George H. Lafleur, barber shop. On August 19th appeared the first issue of the Callaway Standard, which was published and edited by Charles A. Sherwood, a first-class printer imported by the townsite syndicate. On Sunday, August 8th, a small hurricane swept down the valley and partially wrecked most of the buildings that were in the course of construction, among them being the opera house, Dean's hotel, and the Baker & Yates building, but the damages were soon repaired and work progressed rapidly.

SMITH WAS AN ADVERTISER

"The new town boomed all summer. J. Woods Smith, its founder and promoter, was well known all over the state. He also had the knack of getting himself interviewed in the Omaha papers every time he visited that city, and the result was that Callaway was soon the best advertised town in Nebraska. While to the ordinary individual Callaway appeared destined to become a prosperous village, in the Utopian vision of J. Woods Smith nothing less than the state capital awaited it.

"During the summer of 1886 the Omaha Bee said: 'Callaway is six weeks old, with fifty houses; a hotel, seventy by fifty-six feet; an opera house, forty-eight by sixty feet; and a population of 200 inhabitants. Its representation in business houses is excellent, though at present it is in need of a watchmaker and jeweler and a harness man. A first-class outfit for a newspaper, to be called the Callaway Standard, together with an editor, have already been shipped, and the first sheet of the new journal will appear next week. It will be followed by the issue of a rival paper one week later. The crops in the vicinity are said to be the finest in the state, and Mr. Smith says that he has never seen finer corn than they are now cutting down on the site upon which the town is built.

A NEW TOWNSITE

"The survey of the railroad was completed that summer and the grading done. The grade is still there, from Pleasanton to Callaway, but no iron has ever been laid on it. The Wood river line was graded soon afterward, but it was not until four years later that the road was finished from Kearney to Callaway. This scheme materialized in the formation of the New Callaway Townsite & Improvement Company, with C. W. H. Luebbert, president; N. M. Morgan, vice-president; Harry E. O'Neill, secretary; Ira Graves, treasurer; John Reese, solicitor. The land was purchased of Ira Graves, the site of New Callaway platted, and inducements offered to old-town business men to move up, as it was expected that the New Callaway promoters had influence enough to secure the depot. The inducements, however, did not draw any of the old-town people away, except Harry O'Neill. Upon the organization of Callaway the postoffice had been moved from Mr. Graves' farm to town, and the name changed from Delight to Callaway. Harry O'Neill was postmaster when he moved up to the new town, but he had to leave the postoffice behind.

A TOWN FIGHT IS ON

"The old-town citizens patrolled the streets

at night with shotguns, to prevent the post-office from being stolen. A newspaper plant was purchased by the New Callaway Syndicate, and on June 29, 1887, the New Callaway Courier was born in a frame building which was then located near the present residence of John Frederick, with M. C. Miller as editor. Then commenced one of the biggest townsite fights in the history of central Nebraska. The new town was derisively christened 'Podunk' by the old-town people, and the new Callawayites were termed 'Mudhens.' The failure of the Wood river line to be built that fall, put somewhat of a damper on the New Callaway project. The few residents of the town, who had been induced to locate with the understanding that it was to have the railroad depot at once, became discouraged and moved away. In October, 1887, when the writer first arrived on the scene from Chicago, to assume charge of the New Callaway Courier, he found the two rival towns lying on their arms awaiting developments. Every business enterprise in New Callaway had gone away except the Courier, but it was doing a flourishing business. It was published in the frame building later occupied as a photograph gallery by Isaac Bryner. It was then located on the corner of Pearl street and Third avenue, New Callaway. On the corner diagonally across the street, was a gopher hole, and the two other corners were occupied by a bullfrog and another gopher. The Courier had a big circulation, and was well filled with advertisements from merchants of Broken Bow, Cozad, Lexington, and Arnold; but it had none from Callaway, as that would have been considered high treason by the old-town people, and would have been sufficient reason for a boycott against the offender. The Courier, however, did a flourishing business, and became famous all over this part of the state, as the paper that was published in the town that had no other business.

PODUNK NEWS ITEMS

"Sometimes, when local news were scarce, the Courier was filled out with local items from Podunk. Here are a few samples:

"One of our prominent quails made a flying trip to Triumph yesterday.

"One of J. Woods Smith's cows was over visiting friends in Podunk yesterday.

"One of Morgan's brindle steers was taking in the sights of Podunk Tuesday. He is a rustler.

"Several influential prairie dogs have intimated their intention to locate in Podunk early in the spring. Still the boom continues.

"We acknowledge a pleasant visit one day this week from a black dog with one ear partly chewed off. Call again. You will always find our latch string out.

"One of our jack rabbits fell on a slippery sidewalk Monday and as a result he now walks with a limp.

"The stake which marks the site of the First National Bank, at the corner of Hayfield square, was knocked over by a bay cow on Wednesday. It ought to be repaired at once.

"One of our most respectable and highly esteemed coyotes was villainously assaulted by Graves' dog while out taking a walk Monday. Such rowdism is a disgrace to Podunk.

"Three coyotes from Sand Valley gave a concert in Jake Horn's corner Saturday night.

"Three strange jack rabbits were in town all day Thursday, looking around our streets. Their business was not ascertained, but it is supposed they were locating a railroad depot.

"Intense excitement was caused in our city Tuesday by the appearance of a man coming toward town from the east. Business was entirely suspended and the whole town turned out to see him, but he turned south at the corner of Smith's cornfield and escaped.

"Our friend McConnell says he is not much of a believer in signs, but he believes animals often know what is going to happen in the future. The other evening as he was going home wondering whether the railroad depot would be located at Callaway or Podunk, a big bullfrog jumped out of Wiggle creek and said 'Podunk! Podunk! Podunk!' On the strength of the tip Mr. McConnell has invested in several corner lots.

ACKNOWLEDGES THE "CORN"

"During the winter of 1887 the weather was very cold, and as coal had to be hauled from Cozad, there was sometimes a dearth of fuel. The office building was made of boards that were mostly knot holes, and unplastered, consequently not over warm, and the paper was not infrequently 'run off' when the temperature on the outside was below zero, and not much higher inside. It was frequently the duty of the editor to sally forth after dark, into a handy cornfield, with a two-bushel sack, to rustle enough fuel for the next day. One day a man whose field had been visited pretty often, came into the office and wanted to know how much it would cost to have a notice put in the paper. He said somebody was stealing his corn and he thought a piece in the paper would scare them off. We made a deal to publish a warning against the offender for a dollar and a half, and no more corn was stolen from that field during the remainder of the winter. This shows the power of advertising.

MORE IMPROVEMENT

"During 1888 M. L. Savage built the present postoffice building. The Seven Valleys Bank building was also built the same year, as was a new store, by F. A. Clark & Company. The Seven Valleys Bank had been established the year previously, by J. Woods Smith and others. The Union Bank was established in 1888 by J. Woods Smith, J. E. Decker, and J. H. Decker. The spring of 1889 came, and still no railroad. The town was at a standstill. The New Callaway project was practically dead and the New Callaway Courier moved to the old town and became the Callaway Courier. George B. Mair, the editor and publisher, was appointed postmaster, purchased the postoffice building and added another room, which has since been used as a printing office. R. E. Brega came to town during this year and established himself in the law business. Railroad rumors were rife and the Kearney & Black Hills Railroad Company was organized.

BUILD A MILL

"The magnificent water power afforded by the South Loup river had commended itself to the business men of Callaway, and many meetings were held to talk up the project of erecting a flouring mill, to be operated by water power. These meetings resulted in the formation of the Callaway Milling & Manufacturing Company, which was composed of most of the business men. In the fall of 1889 work was commenced on the dam across the Loup river, and the wheels of an up-to-date, modern roller mill began to move in the spring of 1890. A proposition to vote $8,600 bonds for the purpose of assisting the Kearney & Black Hills Railroad to build from Kearney to Callaway, was submitted to the township and carried almost unanimously.

sand dollars. A number of business enterprises located in the new town, and liberal inducements were held out to the old town to move up in a body. It was supposed that the location of the depot would cause everything to rush to the Railroad addition at once, but such was not the case. Many of the old-town people were interested in old-town real estate, and if the town moved to the new addition it would become practically worthless. It was evident to a disinterested onlooker that the railroad addition was bound to win in the end, at once, and on the 7th day of October, 1890, the first regular passenger train pulled into Callaway. The depot was located neither in the old town nor the new, but half way between, on the farm of J. Woods Smith, which was purchased by the Callaway Improvement Company, on which to lay out a new town of Callaway, now known as the Railroad addition. Engineers of the railroad company laid out the town on a grand scale, large enough for a city of the first class, and some very good buildings were put up, among them being the Grand Pacific hotel, at a cost of over ten thou-but the old-town people made a bitter fight. J. Woods Smith, being interested in the new town, moved his opera-house building over and also established a store there, in what was known as the Improvement building. Van-green Brothers moved up to the new town. A new drug store was established, with Dr. F. J. Greer as manager; Dierks Brothers and the Gilcrost Lumber Company put in yards; a brick yard was established; and a large two-story building, known as the Grand Army building, was erected for store and lodge purposes. The newcomers who were attracted to the locality by the advent of the railroad were not, of course, interested in the townsite fight, and mostly located in the new town.

MOVING DAY AT NIGHT

"Being satisfied that there was but one way for the contest to end, and wishing to bring it to a close as soon as possible, the postoffice was moved to the new town at midnight, by George B. Mair, without previous notice. The following morning, when the people of the old town found out what had happened, their wrath knew no bounds and all sorts of threats were indulged. The Courier was moved to the new town at the same time. So incensed were master general. In a few months the department reinstated the postmaster, but the location of the office was fixed in the old town, whither it had been taken by the inspector at the time of his visit. Soon after this the entire old town capitulated and moved up to the new town, followed by the postoffice some months later.

"The year 1891 was a season of big crops, and the new town enjoyed quite a boom. Money was plentiful and the business men had a fine trade. Many new buildings were erected, among them being two large grain elevators. The town was full of traveling men and strangers, and the townsite syndicate had suc-

they, that the people of the old town refused to mail their letters at the postoffice, but sent them to the neighboring offices to be mailed. At the arrival of every mail they sent a messenger up to the postoffice with a sack, who collected all the mail for the old town business men and carried it down to the Bank of Callaway, where it was redistributed. In the meantime they were procuring signatures to a petition and protest, which was forwarded to the postoffice department and which brought a postoffice inspector to investigate. The inspector concluded that the postmaster had acted without due authority in moving the office, and his resignation was asked for. The postmaster declined to resign, and he was removed and a temporary postmaster appointed by the inspector, pending the final decision of the postceeded in interesting a number of eastern capitalists in the town. Arrangements had been made for a big excursion at some future date, but in the meantime poor crops and partial failures followed, culminating in the drought period of 1894 and 1895, which drove away half the population of the county, and in which Callaway dwindled down from a hustling town of 600 people to a dead village of a little over 200. The people became almost panic-stricken, and a cry went out for help that was responded to from ocean to ocean, with a generosity that has never been equaled. Grain, food, and goods of all kinds came into the country by the carloads, from almost every state in the Union, and serious suffering was prevented. The railroads, which have been said to have no souls, disproved the assertion at this time, and they gladly offered free transportation for solicitors and supplies during all that trying period. Since then this locality has enjoyed fair crops. On the night of March 15, 1901, the principal business block was completely destroyed, entailing a loss of about fifty thousand dollars. This has resulted in the passage of a fire-limits ordinance by the village board, and preparations are already being made to rebuild the burned district with fine modern brick buildings."

CALLAWAY UP TO DATE

The following firms, and business and professional men lived in Callaway prior to 1900 but were not mentioned in the foregoing article by George B. Mair:

Drugs: W. J. Bean, E. R. Vining, Charles Root; F. J. Drum, well machinery; A. Pearson, photographer; attorneys: John Reese, J. C. Naylor, and James Yates; hardware: Bennet Maze and Charles Whaley; David Hopkins, grocery and confectionery; Walter Wood, furniture, Charles Gaines, manager; Holway & Schneringer, first livery man; W. G. Garlock established a brick yard and made brick.

The following are Callaway business enterprises since 1900 not mentioned before: W. I. Harrow, bakery; J. E. Felker, jewelry; M. F. Verry and Emma Van Eman, milliners; K. C. Kim, photographer; Farmers State Bank (John Frederick, Sr., president, and John Frederick, Jr., vice-president); live-stock dealers, John Frederick; Farmers Shipping Association; Farmers Elevator Company, William Reader, manager; Callaway Elevator Company, D. F. Burkner, manager; Kearney & Black Hills Railroad, E. M. Wellman, agent; Higbee & Keyes, hardware; Charles Curtis & Company, hardware; Frank Hagin, restaurant; Claude Pierce, restaurant; M. C. Schneringer, undertaker; general merchants: Campbell & Tidd, Helton Roberts Company, Vangreen Brothers, W. L. Grimes; drugs: Robert Weiland, Walter Wright; variety store, Clara Vangreen; postmaster, John Moran; barbers: Lewis Brothers, Dan Pearson, Tobe Vangreen; physicians: J.

F. Davies, Albert Johnson; chiropractors, Libbie Leonard and Charles F. Nye.

Callaway has a first-class water and electric-light system; telephone exchange; four good church buildings (Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal, United Evangelical, and Catholic); an up-to-date high-school building, of which W. A. Rosin is superintendent; four large, brick garages, as good as there is in the county. The Ford garage has a floor space of 12,500 square feet. They are represented by Walter Brittan, Charles Carothers, Henry Ridder, and Sherrel & Lowe Brothers. Real estate: McGrew & Brabham, J. D. Troyer, George H. LaFleur, H. H. Andrews, I. C. Shupp. R. E. Brega, lawyer, real estate, and insurance. The Callaway Queen, Thomas Roberts, A. W. Rosin, James C. Naylor, owners, and James C. Naylor editor.

The population of Callaway is about 900. The Callaway Milling Company has one of the best flouring mills in the state, operated with electricity.

THE COUNTY SEAT

The city of Broken Bow is located in township 17, range 20, in the center of the county, near the head of the Muddy, a creek that runs through the town. The city enjoys the advantage of fine schools and has seven churches, in which religious services are maintained. It has had no saloons for years. Business is good and the population is gradually increasing. Broken Bow is the county seat of Custer county. It is known far and near on account of the oddity of its name. The name was suggested by a chain of circumstances, rather than romance.

THE BROKEN BOW

In 1880 Wilson Hewitt, who was a homesteader near where the city is now located, on request of the few settlers in the vicinity, petitioned the government for a postoffice at his place and sent in a name he thought was appropriate. The postoffice department approved the application for an office, but rejected the name, as a similar name had been granted on another petition. Two or three other names were sent in, but were rejected for the same reason. Mr. Hewitt was a blacksmith and a hunter, and while out hunting one day he found, on an old Indian camping ground, a broken bow and arrow, which he carried home with him. He put them in a box in his shop, with some old irons, and thought nothing more about them. Some time afterward he received notice that the third name he had sent to Washington had been rejected, and, going to the box after a piece of iron, he picked up the mer owner of the bow, or any of the facts connected with it, is known.

Mr. Hewitt prized the broken bow as a relic and intended to keep it as a souvenir of the town's christening, but one day the hired girl was cleaning up around the yard and put the bow into the fire, with other rubbish. It was discovered, however, in time to save a fragment of it. The part saved is now in possession of E. R. Purcell, editor of the Custer County Chief, and is highly valued.

The townsite was located and plat filed in broken bow, and the name, "Broken Bow," came to his mind quickly. He determined to send it in as the name for his postoffice, satisfied that there was no other place of the same name in the state. He consulted his wife, and she being willing, the name was sent in and was accepted by the department. Just how the Indian bow came to be broken and left on the old camp ground, is only a matter of conjecture. Many stories have been invented to account for it, and one old settler, Mrs. M. A. B. Martin, has written an Indian legend concerning it, which is reproduced on another page. Nothing whatever concerning the former owner of the bow, or any of the facts connected with it, is known. Mr. Hewitt prized the broken bow as a relic and intended to keep it as a souvenir of the town's christening, but one day the hired girl was cleaning up around the yard and put the bow into the fire, with other rubbish. It was discovered, however, in time to save a fragment of it. The part saved is now in possession of E. R. Purcell, editor of the Custer County Chief, and is highly valued. The townsite was located and plat filed in June, 1882, by Jess Gandy. The postoffice, which was then kept by C. D. Pelham, who had a small stock of goods half a mile from the townsite, was moved to the new city, and hence Mr. Pelham enjoys the distinction of being the first merchant of Broken Bow, as well as its first postmaster. Wilson Hewitt had been elected county clerk the previous fall, and near the proposed townsite had built a sod house, which he occupied as his office. The county treasurer, C. T. Crawford, and the county superintendent, D. M. Amsberry, occasionally held forth in the same building, in the discharge of their respective official duties.

Soon after the townsite was laid out, the townsite promoters provided temporary frame buildings for the county officers. County Clerk Hewitt and County Judge J. S. Benjamin occupied a room on the west side of the public square, and the county treasurer and the county superintendent a building on the east side. This arrangement was continued until the fall of 1884, when the county built a frame building large enough to accommodate all four of the offices. The question of relocating the county seat was an issue during the summer and fall, and in this Broken Bow defeated Westerville, its rival. The county seat had been located previously near the South Loup, but the site had never been occupied, as the county records were always kept at the homes of the several county officers. The victory inspired courage, and many important battles have since been fought and won by a combined effort of the citizens. One of the first houses built was a sod building, by R. H. Miller, on the corner where the Broken Bow State Bank now stands. This was used for the family residence and also for a printing office. Mr. Miller established the first newspaper of the town, the Custer County Republican. The first issue of the Republican was June 29, 1882. The paper is still published in the city, and not only claims the distinction of being the first newspaper published at Broken Bow, but of being the oldest paper in the county. The present editor and publisher follows at the end of a long procession of former owners.

THE TOWN GROWS

During the summer of 1882 the following families located in the new town and engaged in business: Jess, James P., and A. W. Gandy, J. S. Kirkpatrick, C. W. West, J. H. Fleming, T. E. Wheeler & Company, G. W. Trefren, C. T. Crawford, C. D. Pelham, J. L. Oxford, and R. H. Miller. J. P. Gandy built a log house in which he kept a few goods and accommodated the traveling public with meals and lodging until a hotel was erected. J. H. Fleming built the first hotel, on the corner now occupied by the Grand Central. As the lumber and all building material had to be freighted from Kearney by teams, it was a tedious task to build. By August Mr. Fleming had the Broken Bow hotel, a two-story structure, nearly completed to accommodate the public, and guests frequently had to put up with scanty fare, owing to lack of teams with which to freight the necessary provisions, but as Mrs. Fleming was a most excellent cook she made the best of what she had, and all were satisfied.

TWENTY-FIVE MILES FOR BUTTER

Frequently a team would be sent twenty-five miles to purchase butter, and would return with only a few pounds. J. H. West was the proprietor of the first drug store, and G. W. Trefren established a law office, being followed soon by J. S. Kirkpatrick, who was afterward a member of the Nebraska supreme-court commission. Mrs. T. E. Wheeler & Company put in the first stock of general merchandise, in October, 1882. Mrs. Wheeler had come from Aurora in August and contracted with the townsite company to build a store room in consideration of bringing in a stock of goods. She freighted the goods from Grand Island, by way of Loup City and Westerville. That winter Mr. and Mrs. Wheeler lived in the back part of the store room, with only a carpet for a partition. C. T. Crawford built and occupied his house as a residence, restaurant, and treasurer's office, the same fall. J. L. Oxford, one of the county commissioners, built the first feed barn, just east of the present site of the Grand Central hotel, near where Mr. Lee's barn now stands. Jess Gandy put in the first butcher shop that summer, and bought his first beef from Judge Benjamin, who lived on a homestead adjoining the town on the north. The first school was taught by Mrs. M. E. Lewis, in a sod house.

THE TOWN STILL GROWS

With the spring of 1883 the population had more than trebled. Frank Crable added a lumber yard, a much-needed branch of business. H. G. Rogers, a silent partner of T. E. Wheeler & Company, located here, bringing with him an additional stock of dry goods, valued at $10,000. He built a new store building in publish it until June, 1888, when the plant was sold to the Central Nebraska Bank. R. H. Miller succeeded Mr. Beebe as editor.

The first church was built by the Methodists, in 1883. It was the first brick building in town. During this year the townsite was enlarged by additions made by J. P. and A. W. Gandy, and the sale of town lots to prospective residents became brisk. The students of Blackstone were increased by two that winter, James Ledwich, who engaged in the law and real-estate business, and who later became one of the prominent men of the county, and C. J. Elliott, who came from Illinois, returning to which to accommodate his goods, and Mrs. T. E. Wheeler & Company added a line of hardware. Miss Litta Mengle put in a stock of millinery and associated with her Miss Laura Morrison as dressmaker. Marcus Reyner added the second drug store, and in October of the same year L. H. Jewett established the Custer County Bank, which was the first bank in town, with S. H. Burnham, of Lincoln, as president, and Mr. Jewett as cashier. Silas A. Holcomb, subsequently governor of the state and at present a member of the state board of control, located in the town that season and engaged in the practice of law. S. C. Beebe, publisher of the Custer County Leader, moved his paper from Westerville to Broken Bow in the spring of 1883, and continued to that state after a few years. Up to this time the town had been without a practising physician. The only one in the vicinity was Dr. R. C. Talbot, who lived on a homestead some eight miles away, and who protested against practicing medicine. Dr. Wyman Hull appeared on the scene and Dr. Talbot proposed to him that if he would locate in town he would turn over all his practice to him. The inducement was sufficient, and Dr. Hull at once secured a sod house that J. P. Gandy had built, and moved his family to Broken Bow. The Doctor did not prove a drawing card as a physician, and soon fitted up rooms in his house and engaged in the hotel business. As rains were quite frequent in the early days, his guests were frequently disturbed in their slumbers by the roof leaking. To remedy this annoyance the Doctor covered the house with a heavy coating of cement, which gave his hostelry the name of "The Marble Top." Mrs. Hull and daughter were fine cooks and good entertainers, while the Doctor was a happy hustler for business. They soon built up one of the best paying businesses in the town and the Marble Top became a celebrated name.

In 1884 the population of Broken Bow largely increased, and the demand for both residence and business houses caused a number of buildings to be built. L. Lavender and W. D. Garlock, brickmakers, put in two yards and manufactured enough brick to supply the demand. The Commercial hotel was built that season, by J. P. Gandy and A. W. Gandy. D. M. Amsberry and G. W. Runyon built the three brick store rooms on the north side of the public square. A brick schoolhouse, in the southeastern part of town, and two dwelling houses, by Isaac Merchant and Steve Chaple, were built in the fall, and the frame buildings put up were numerous. With the influx of 1884 came Judge H. M. Sullivan, who has ever since been a leading citizen and closely identified with the development of the town, the county, and the state. A. R. Humphrey, who was subsequently commissioner of public lands and buildings, located here in 1884.

This season County Treasurer Talbot and County Superintendent Amsberry moved their families to town and each put up a residence. Among the new enterprises started in 1884 the principal were: Holland & McDonald, hardware and implements; the Broken Bow Times, by Trefren and Meseraull; Kloman & Arnold, bank; Moore & Wright, real estate.

FIRST TOWN OFFICIALS

The village was incorporated that spring and the first officers appointed were: Isaac Merchant, president; J. S. Kirkpatrick, Jess Gandy, and D. M. Amsberry, trustees; and E. P. Campbell, city attorney. The first officers elected were: Isaac Merchant, H. A. Graham, D. M. Amsberry, and J. S. Kirkpatrick, trustees; H. M. Sullivan, attorney; E. P. Campbell, clerk.

In 1886 the town received another substantial boost, by the arrival of R. O. Phillips, president of the Lincoln Townsite Company. He bought a half-section of land adjoining the town on the north, at big figures, and it resulted in corner lots going sky high. This was soon followed by the B. & M. Railroad surveyors up the Muddy valley, who included Broken Bow in their line of survey. Not only townsite speculators and business men rushed in to secure desirable town property, but within a few months homesteaders had filed on all the desirable farming land in the vicinity. Among those who preceded the locomotive, or came soon after its arrival in that year, were: Freisheimer & Haeberle, druggists; S. B. Thompson and House, and B. S. Lilly, real estate agents; C. B. Hayes, boots and shoes; J. C. Bowen, grocer; Hans Dierks, lumber; Bogue & Sherwood, lumber; the Chicago Lumber Company; W. H. Cline, general merchandise; W. J. Woods, furniture; Wilde & Squires, hardware; S. B. Frost, restaurant; S. A. Barstow, contractor and builder; Edwards & Emil, blacksmiths and wagonmakers; C. A. Thum, clothing; J. H. Inman, agent for the Lincoln Townsite Company. The railroad addition was surveyed and put on the market and a number of new buildings erected or commenced on the new addition, including a number of residences as well as business buildings. On the old townsite was built the Pacific hotel and Graham Brothers' store, which have since become the Grand Central hotel, one of the best equipped and best conducted hostelries in central Nebraska.

THE RAILROAD COMES

The B. & M. Railroad let no time go to waste after the survey was made. On August 26, 1886, the road was completed to Broken Bow and the first locomotive made its appearance in Custer county's rapidly growing capital. C. E. Wilkinson, of Lincoln, was the first station agent and telegraph operator, and afterward served as mayor of the city. In the latter part of this year O. P. Perley, a capitalist of Maine, located here and invested a large sum of money in the Custer County Bank. On the 15th of February, 1886, it was organized as the First National Bank, with S. H. Burnham, president; L. H. Jewett, cashier, and O. P. Perley, assistant cashier. The following year the Central Nebraska Bank was established, with O. J. Collman, president, and J. H. Inman, cashier. The North Side Opera House block, the Inman hotel, the bank building, and a number of smaller buildings for both business and residence purposes, were erected on the Lincoln Townsite Company's addition. Also in 1887, G. W. Frey built the large flour-among which we may mention the Union block (by Taylor Flick, H. Walton, and M. Reyner), the Realty block, the Inman and Globe hotels, Walton's and Blackman's barns, Morrison & Gandy's and W. C. Luce's feed mills, the Baptist, United Brethren, Presbyterian, Catholic, Christian, and Episcopal churches, the court house, two brick school-houses, the postoffice, and the I. O. O. F. building. The waterworks plant was put in under the supervision of C. A. Weeks, by a local company. The Bank of Commerce was ing mill later owned and operated by S. J. Lonergan. A large planing mill was built the same year, by S. A. Barstow.

BIG BUILDINGS GO UP

In this year were established the additional business enterprises of T. M. & J. W. Salisbury, dry goods; Thompson, Wilson & Drake, dry goods; Ryerson & Leslie, books and stationery; H. Walton, drugs; and the Custer County block was built by R. C. Talbot, G. W. Trefren, and D. M. Amsberry; also an opera house by Trefren and Hewitt. The growth of the city continued gradually until 1894, many substantial buildings being erected, established in 1889, with C. J. Stevens, president, and F. M. Rublee, cashier.

GETS TO BE A CITY

In 1888 the town had outgrown the rank of a village, and it was organized as a city of the second class. The first officers were: O. P. Perley, mayor; B. S. Lilly, J. L. Cobb, S. A. Barstow, Hans Dierks, councilmen; E. P. Campbell, city clerk; H. M. Sullivan, city attorney. In 1894, owing to a severe drouth and a financial panic, the population of the city decreased fully one-third, and several of the business houses suspended in the year following. The number included Kloman &

Arnold's bank, the Central Nebraska National Bank, Barstow's planing mill, William H. Cline, D. S. Lohr, Graham Brothers, and many others. Since 1895 the population has been gradually increasing, and several business firms have been added. The population in 1890 had reached over 1,600, and in 1894 it was estimated at 1,800. In 1895 the number did not exceed 1,100. The census of 1900 gives the population as 1,375. The census of 1910 boosts the population to 2,200, while the population to-day will probably reach 3,000.

In 1910 the population reached 2,260 according to the government census. The business interests have kept pace with the population and to-day it is the largest trade center between Alliance and Grand Island.

MODERN BUILDINGS GO UP

In 1910 the new high-school building was erected, at a cost of $40,000. Building materials were cheap and an exceedingly fine building was erected at a remarkably low cost. In the same year a two-story, brick city hall was erected, on South Tenth avenue. It is the most commodious town hall west of Grand Island. It has basement, jail, with ground-floor apartments for the fire-fighting apparatus. In the upper story is the council chamber and an auditorium with chairs for seating about 500 people.

On the corner of Broadway and Tenth avenue the Baptist congregation erected a $15,000 brick church, with basement and all modern fixtures. (See description in Chapter XI.)

Three more good buildings went up in 1915. The Security State Bank built a white-tile building on the northwest corner of the square and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows built the Lyric theatre, with a fine lodge room, and offices over head. The front of the building is of white, tile-faced brick.

The third building to go up in 1915 was the Carnegie public library, a neat, tile-roofed building, costing over $10,000. The odd design of this building makes it very noticeable. Both the I. O. G. T. building and the library are on the west side of Tenth avenue.

PLENTY OF GOOD, PURE, WATER

In the spring of 1888 a group of the citizens, seeing the need of an adequate water supply, and almost forced to take such action on account of the prohibitive rate for fire insurance, undertook the task of organizing a stock company and building a waterworks system. The articles of incorporation are dated March 28, 1888, the capital stock was $50,000, and the names of the incorporators are: S. J. Lonergan, O. J. Collman, D. M. Amsberry, A. W. Gandy, Marcus Reyner, John Reese, S. A. Holcomb, L. H. Jewett, James Holland, Wilson Hewitt, G. N. Rawson, and George W. Sturdevant.

After prospecting along the railroad, a location in block 3, F. Reyner's addition, in the southeastern part of the city, was selected for the pumping station, being the only place where a sufficient flow of water was found.

In the latter part of the year 1903 the city purchased the waterworks system from Frank H. Young, who had become the owner of the controlling interest in the stock and who had been managing the plant most of the time since it was constructed.

In 1916 the old pumping station, which had supplied water for the city continuously for twenty-eight years, was abandoned and a new plant constructed, to do both the street lighting and pumping. The plant is located on Eighth avenue, on the south side of the railroad right of way. Here an abundant flow of water was secured at a depth of about 160 feet. Two wells were sunk, eight inches in diameter,

At the present time the city has a fine park, three large, brick school buildings, seven church buildings, city hall, court house, library, four banks, six grocery stores, four dry-goods stores, four hardware stores, three meat markets, five garages, three lumber companies, two novelty stores, three millinery stores, one men's-furnishing store, three jewelry stores, three drug stores, one book store, two grain elevators, two furniture stores, three hotels, three restaurants, and numerous other business places of miscellaneous nature.

and from the top of each, when disconnected, there flows a good stream of pure water. The equipment for pumping consists of two electrically driven centrifugal pumps, each a complete unit, and either one of sufficient capacity to meet the present demand for water.

The storage is provided by a concrete reservoir, on the hill south of town, holding about 160,000 gallons and affording a pressure of sixty pounds in the business part of town. The mains have been extended until the city now owns about six miles of cast-iron mains, all in good condition, and supplying about 550 consumers. The city has been most fortunate in the abundance and purity of its water supply, not a single case of disease ever having been traced to this source.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE CLUB

The commercial organization of Broken Bow is called the Public Service Club, as the above caption would indicate. It was organized in May, 1913. Its first president was E. R. Purcell, E. P. Steen being the first vice-president, with the following constituting the board of directors: A. E. Anderson, J. G. VanCott, A. H. Souders, E. P. Walter, J. S. Molyneux, Emery F. Bush, James Lomax, Charles J. J. Masin, C. A. Currie.

The following were the charter members: J. S. Molyneux, George Ayers, E. P. Walter, Carl P. Jeffords, J. G. VanCott, C. L. Mullins, Alpha Morgan, J. C. Lomax, L. D. George, A. E. Anderson, E. R. Purcell, C. A. Currie, George A. Kiffin, Emery F. Bush, J. G. Leonard, D. M. Amsberry, Lewis E. Tanner, A. H. Souders, E. P. Steen, Charles J. J. Masin, A. J. Elliott, C. W. Bowman, R. S. Kuns, Horace F. Kennedy, W. F. Forest.

The object of the organization is to bring together men of unquestioned character and intelligence who are desirous of promoting the welfare and prosperity of the city of Broken Bow and the vicinity. Its aim is to secure the co-operation of the people in the community representing the agricultural, real estate, banking, commercial, manufacturing, professional, and educational interests. It is not to supersede or antagonize any existing business or social organization, but, by consultation and united effort, to work together for the common good, to aid and encourage experiments for more productive farming; to secure location of factories and other enterprises; to promote commercial progress and disseminate valuable commercial and economic information; to buy, sell, lease, and sub-lease real estate; to increase social activity, confidence, and harmony among all our people mutually engaged in useful occupation; and finally to use all legitimate means to protect and foster the business and social welfare of the members of this corporation.

In the Masonic Temple building the club has fitted up elegantly furnished rooms, which make luxuriant apartments and accommodate every social feature for which the club exists.

At the present time the following constitute the corps of officers and the personnel of the different committees. The names of the different committees indicate the extent and character of work carried on by the club.

Present officers — N. T. Gadd, president; M. S. Eddy, vice-president; E. P. Walter, secretary; L. D. George, assistant secretary; and J. C. Lomax, treasurer.

THE TOWN OF ARNOLD

Arnold was named in honor of George Arnold, who located in this vicinity in 1875, and who was a member of the ranch firm of Arnold & Ritchie. The original village site was located in section 28, township 17, range 25, in the famous South Loup valley, near the west line of Custer county, Nebraska, the land having been homesteaded by R. E. Allen, who mile from the present site of the village, but in 1881 it was moved to the residence of R. E. Allen. Dr. J. H. Murray located here in 1884 and here he practiced his profession until 1890. In the year 1886 John Finch and Virgil Cannon opened a drug store, Alex Robertson a bank, and Miss Mary Robertson a millinery store. A large hotel and various other business enterprises soon followed. In 1891 Arnold boasted of a population of about 150, and the following lines of business were represented: A. G. & M. E. Hoffman, general merchandise; Allen & Son, hardware, implements, and livery; Frank Anson, hotel; C.

C. Parsons, barber shop; Albert Hansberry, jeweler; F. E. Needham, grocery and meat market; Joseph Pease, blacksmith shop; Ben Hardin, general store, hardware, and undertaking; T. H. B. Beach, general merchandise and dealer in live stock; David R. Parks, ice dealer; John Finch, druggist; R. E. Allen, dealer in live stock; B. E. Robinson, physician; W. M. Beach, postmaster; Alvin Harris, miller. At that time the village supported an excellent school, with Miss Amy Robinson in of the center of section 27, township 17, range 25; thence west along said half-section line to a point sixty rods east of the center of section 28, township 17, range 25; thence north to the place of beginning."

The following named gentlemen were appointed as first trustees of the village: John Finch, B. E. Robinson, F. E. Needham, J. M. Samuelson, and F. M. Spegal.

At the present time Arnold has a population of about 350; a ten-grade school, with Pro-

On the 9th day of February, 1909, the county board of Custer county passed favorably upon a petition praying that the following described tract of land be incorporated as a village, to be known as the village of Arnold: "Beginning at a point on the half-section line sixty rods east of the center of section 21, township 17 north, range 25 west; thence running east along said half-section line to a point sixty rods west of the center of section 22, township 17, range 25; thence south to a point on the half-section line sixty rods west fessor E. C. Pickett at the head as principal, J. V. Reader as intermediate teacher, and Miss Leora Hardin as primary teacher. The two-room school building, which afforded ample accommodation for several years, was much too small for the rapidly increasing school population during the present school year, necessitating the use of another room for the lower grades. A large and modern school building will be erected this year and, possibly, another grade added. Three churches, Christian, Methodist, and Baptist, all supporting resident pastors, are ministering to the spiritual needs of the community. At this writing, (some

H. Jennings, Jr., cashier; Knox & Logan, real estate and insurance; Mrs. H. R. Black, shoes and notions; S. McCants, dry goods and groceries; McCants & Sauter, meat market; John P. Long, farm implements; Confal Brothers, garage; S. Leland, roller mills; Grooms & Stewart, blacksmith shop; Phifer & Son, livery, feed, and dray; Nansel & Lohr, livery, feed, and dray; N. E. Paine, blacksmith shop; H. E. Bishop, cement-block factory and builder; Arthur Down, lather; Mrs. Gertrude Parsons, hotel; Charles McGuire, postmaster; John Samuelson, well-maker and plumber; Gus Morrow, painter; G. G. Gunter, plasterer and bricklayer; William Collins, restaurant; Wood & Smith, hotel; Finch, Robinson & Meads, real estate; P. G. Houghton, real estate; Dr. M. A. Rown, chiropractic; T. S. Wood, contractor and builder; R. S. Wood, painter; F. J. Smith, cement-block maker and plasterer; Stevens & George, barbers; Mark S. Tapley, plumber; C. V. Rutner, auto livery. The Beatrice Creamery Company, David Cole Creamery Company, and the Farmers Co-operative Creamery Company have stations here.

A BIG CELEBRATION

When the railroad was completed and the first train reached Arnold, a gala day was planned and six thousand people entered into one of the greatest celebrations ever held in Custer county. The following is a newspaper account of the event:

"It seems hardly possible that a town of less than 1,000 inhabitants could entertain within its gates 6,000 guests at one time and do it in such a perfect and satisfactory manner that out of the vast throng not a single complaint was heard. And yet this is the record Arnold placed to its everlasting credit on Friday of last week, when it celebrated 'Railroad Day.' It was a great occasion and a great gathering, the crowd being one of the largest that has ever assembled in any town in the county.

"For many weeks this hustling and enterprising business town was preparing for the celebration, and all credit is due to the loyalty of its citizens and residents of the neighboring country, who so promptly responded to the demands made upon them and worked together as a unit in successfully putting through an affair that will for all future be marked as a red-letter day in the history of Arnold.

"From early morning, people commenced pouring into town from every point, and large numbers had arrived the night before. Broken Bow contributed about 150 of its population to the occasion, and it took twenty-eight autos to convey them there. Callaway sent 400 delegates, Oconto 200, Merna and Anselmo about 100, and Grand Island 150. Gandy, Stapleton, Gothenburg, and all towns located west of there sent large delegations.

"But it was when the Kearney special arrived that the biggest bunch of humanity dropped into town. The train was composed of ten coaches and was crowded to the roof, there being between 1,500 and 2,000 people aboard. It was a great sight to see them scramble from the windows of the coaches in their haste to reach the scene of festivities.

"No stranger's money was any good there, — everything was free, and then some! Even the stores were closed, so as to preclude the possibility of any thoughts of a 'rake-off.' Every detail had been looked after so minutely, by competent management, that the visitors had no trouble in getting just what they wanted at the right time and in the right place — and in a hurry, at that. That was the beauty of it. There were no delays, and the whole affair glided along like a well constructed piece of mechanism using the finest quality of lubricant.

"There were four blocks of gaily decorated streets, the red, the white, and blue bunting being so arranged as to present a very attractive appearance. Another artistic feature was the placing of poles at about thirty foot intervals, the top of each being festooned with a flag of welcome. Every business place and residence sported some kind of decoration, and if ever a town presented a gala appearance, Arnold was certainly it. Five good bands were in attendance and there was music galore. Grand Island and Kearney both sent excellent bands, as also did Brady and Callaway. Arnold has a good organization of its own, which furnished pleasing music that was highly appreciated by the visitors.

"The feeding of such a multitude of hungry people was by no means an easy task, and called forth no little ingenuity on the part of the management to properly manipulate it. But it was done as it should have been, and if any person left town carrying with him that 'gone feeling' about his stomach, it was strictly his own fault and could not be laid at the door of the hospitable hosts and hostesses.

"And the food — there were mountains of it. Wagon-loads of buns, gallons and gallons of pickles, great mounds of juicy roast beef, oceans of coffee, so aromatic as to cause one to linger around in blissful ecstasy and just sniff and sniff; also pyramids of home-made pies and cakes, not bought ones, understand, but every one made by the good housewives and daughters of that vicinity, who are well up in that sort of thing and thoroughly understood the art of preparing wholesome dainties for hungry people. No pure-food problem in the cooking they put up — it's the genuine article and plenty of it.

"The dinner was served cafeteria style. There were two large tents and as one entered the first he was given a wood plate, then came a sandwich, next a pickle, further on great slices of roast beef and pork, then followed a big wedge of pie and a huge slice of cake, a tin cup containing coffee and then the knife and fork. About this time, your plate was so loaded down with good things that it was difficult for you to carry in that manner, so you passed into a second tent, seated yourself and proceeded to transfer the food to a place where it would do the most good. Then you passed out, deposited the cup among a heap of others, dropped the knife and fork into a receptacle placed there for that purpose, and threw the plate away. If your hunger was not satisfied, you were at perfect liberty to return to the first tent and repeat the performance. Talk about picnics. This had all the others of a like nature faded to an insignificant blur. And the best part of it was, the people were pleased. How could they help from feeling so, after the royal entertainment they had received?

"Mr. and Mrs. S. H. Reed, living in the oldest sod house in Arnold, issued invitation dinner-tickets to the railroad officials and heads of commercial clubs and their families. There are three large rooms in the house, and in each was a long table loaded with food and delicacies of all descriptions. Here the diners feasted to their hearts' content, and all voted Mr. and Mrs. Reed to be the very paragons, of what a model host and hostess should be.

"The afternoon was devoted to speech-making, music, and sports. Judge C. L. Gutterson and County Attorney Beal, of Broken Bow, both made short talks, as also did Rev. Mr. Fagin, of the Arnold Methodist church. They all spoke along congratulatory lines and highly complimented the citizens of Arnold upon the splendid effort they had made.

"Although the citizens all worked so well together, it necessarily remained for some one to supervise, and no small amount of credit is due Messrs. John P. Long, J. M. Samuelson, John Finch, and Rev. Mr. Fagin for the wholehearted way in which they circulated among the people and made them feel at home. Broken Bowites who were so fortunate as to be present, declare it to be the best arranged celebration they ever attended in this part of the country.

"The Arnold Sentinel, edited by J. H. Bedford, got out a souvenir edition for the occasion, numbering twenty-four pages. These editions, which were given to the visitors free of charge, contain all kinds of useful information about Arnold, its pioneer days and rapid growth of late years. The pages are finely illustrated with local scenes and pictures of prominent residents. It is a handsome edition and well worthy of the energetic town it represents."

VILLAGE OF BERWYN

At the time of this writing the village of Berwyn is thirty-two years old, and if it is small for its age, let it be understood that the size in no way reflects on the enterprising spirit of the citizens. It is a convenient trading point and community center for the people on the adjacent farms and makes no pretensions to being anything else.

It was laid out in 1886, by the Lincoln Townsite Company, on the north side of the railroad grade that was then being extended up the Muddy valley. The location centers on the section line which runs east and west between sections 16 and 21, township 16 north, range 19 west. The half-section line running north and south through these sections divides the town east and west and forms the principal business street. In the same summer, J. O. Taylor, a substantial pioneer farmer, erected on the new townsite the first store and put in a stock of dry goods and groceries. About the same time R. P. McKnight put up another store building and used it jointly for a store and restaurant. Later, McKnight made application for a postoffice and was himself commissioned the first postmaster of Berwyn. The following winter the Dierks Lumber Company established a branch office and put in a fine stock of lumber and such other accessories as generally pertain to the lumber business. A little later the West elevator was erected and a blacksmith here located early the next spring. About this time W. H. Mauk and H. S. Wayse put in a general hardware store, and the town was well started if not full fledged. It is today a prosperous vilage of modest proportions, with a population of about 300.

THE HUSTLING TOWN OF MERNA

One of the best little towns in the central part of the county is Merna, located twelve miles northeast of the county seat, on the main line of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad. For many years it enjoyed the dis-tion of being the grain market of the county. Before the Union Pacific was extended to Arnold and much of the grain from the West table found an outlet through that town, Merna handled and shipped more grain than any other town or railroad point west of Lincoln. In the days when the West table grain came down the west hill, Merna kept three elevators working almost night and day. She developed then the energy and push which present today a neat, brick-built village with modern homes and all municipal improvements.

The citizens of Merna are patriotic to a degree and in every war-drive have far exceeded their allotments or quotas. One of the most remarkable public sales ever held in the county was the Red Cross sale held on the streets of Merna in May, 1918, in which donated articles to the amount of $4,400 were sold and the proceeds contributed to the American Red Cross war work. This sale far exceeded the one held in Broken Bow one week previously, and stimulated the people of Anselmo to make a $6,000 sale one week later.

ATKISSON SPEAKS FOR MERNA

H. K. Atkisson, one of the leading spirits of Merna, who has been long in the town, gives us the following concerning town history:

"In 1881 W. G. Brotherton took a claim where the town of Merna now stands, building a small sod house, which he occupied with his wife, as a home, postoffice and store, he being the second postmaster. Mr. Sam Dunning had been the first postmaster and the town was named after his daughter. Other early settlers in the community were C. P. Foote, Scott Hanna, S. H. Read, Reuben Gordon, Warren Gordon, William Reede, Andy Somner, Joe Siltter, Samuel Dunning, Al Thomas, Charles Thomas. Most of these men were unmarried, there being but three women in the settlement—Mrs. Brotherton, Mrs. Foote and Mrs. Dunning. These people were all farmers and homesteaders. In 1883 the postoffice and store, which comprised the town, were moved two miles west and north, in section 36, and a townsite company formed. J. D. Strong, Milt Casteel and W. E. Warren were added to the community at this time. Warren built a little shack and sold drugs, and Strong and Casteel formed a partnership with Brotherton in the general store. In 1886 the Lincoln Townsite Company purchased Brotherton's claim and relocated the town on its former site, and the 'town' moved back again. In the fall of 1886 the railroad was built through the place and on to Anselmo. The town has grown not rapidly, but steadily, and is now a prosperous village, with good farms surrounding it, and real estate sells at a figure that the pioneers would have considered an impossible dream in the early days.

"The postmasters have been as follows:

Samuel Dunning, W. G. Brotherton, C. P. Foote, R. J. Kelly, J. S. Francis, and Joe Fenimore.

"The first newspaper was published by E. R. Purcell. After his removal to Broken Bow the town was without a paper for some time. Then a young man named Miller started a paper. This was not very long-lived and again the town was without its local news. Then Albert Lazenby tried the field of journalism and found it barren. In 1906 F. E. Pinch came into the town and, being an old newspaper man, established a paying business, naming his new paper the Merna Postal Card. After two years he disposed of his business to Claude Hall, who was the owner and publisher for some four or five years, when he sold it to Mr. Dutton, who is the present owner and editor. The name has been changed to Merna Messenger and it is a live local paper, receiving a good support.

"Merna at the present time is prospering very satisfactorily. During the last year the large, brick store building belonging to H. K. Atkisson and occupied by the firm of C. R. Atkisson & W. Davis has been built, also the fine garages of B. S. Wells, and W. Ferritor. Several fine dwelling houses have been erected, among them are the homes of Mrs. W. H. Reeder, John Hipsley, Mrs. J. S. Francis, Miss Anna Kloven, and H. K. Atkisson. The business of the town consists of two general stores, one grocery store, two banks, one drug store, four garages, two blacksmith shops, one collecting agency, one hotel, one restaurant, one exclusive auto agency, one real-estate agency, two hardware stores, two machinery agencies, one jewelry store, one furniture and undertaking establishment, one moving-picture theatre.

J. C. Moore has arrangements made for a new brick garage to be erected as soon as the material can be secured.

"The professional men are represented by two physicians, one dentist, three clergymen and a splendid corps of teachers in the public school. Merna has had fine Chautauquas for the past five years, and a lecture course every valley, is located on the Grand Island and Wyoming branch of the B. & M. Railroad, fifty-seven miles northwest of Grand Island, twenty-three miles southeast of Broken Bow, and forty-five miles north of Kearney. The location of Mason City, situated, as it is, in almost the central part of the southeastern quarter of Custer county, is worthy of the attention of all who desire to locate in a town for which not only nature but also circumstances have provided for so abundantly, and one which will undoubtedly make a busy, hustling town of year, much longer than that. The Chautauquas are well attended and self-supporting, the lecture course not quite so fortunate, as there are so many other attractions during the lecture course season.

"Merna furnished one soldier to the Spanish-American war, Roy Luce, who after the close of that unpleasantness returned safely and is at present living in Colorado. In all the contributions for the present war Merna and vicinity have done their part."

importance. The townsite was located by the Lincoln Land Company in April, 1886. The land on which the town now stands was purchased of Nels Anderson and Mrs. George W. Runyan, 160 acres being secured from each of these parties. About one-half of this 320 acres has been platted into lots, the other half being held by the company for the same purpose in case the growth of the town demands it. The slope from the hills to the valley is gradual, just sufficient for good drainage. Nearly all the different branches of business, trades, and professions are represented here by a live and energetic set of people. The following is a full list of the different branches of business, and those who represent them as recorded by M. C. Warrington in 1901:

The Mason City Banking Company, with P. H. Marley, president, J. J. Marley, vice-president, and R. B. Walker, cashier. In addition to the banking business, Mr. Marley is extensively engaged in the real-estate business. The Mason City Transcript is the only newspaper published in Mason City. The paper was established by Martin & Dellinger in June, 1886. M. C. Warrington, the present proprietor and editor, has had active control of the paper since August, 1886, making him the oldest editor in point of service and continuous connection with one paper in Custer county. For some years past the editor has been ably assisted in the publication of the paper by William A. Anderson. The mercantile business of Mason City is represented by E. G. Burrows, general merchandise; W. C. Elliott, general merchandise; T. J. Wood, general merchandise; O. H. Moomey, general merchandise; S. M. Chase, general merchandise; A. O'Brien, hardware and groceries; G. P. Meek, fruit and groceries; Hurley & Warrington, hardware, harness, and farm machinery; P. A. Carlson, veterinarian; John M. Browning, hotel; J. H. McAdams, furniture; H. C. Chase, Jr., successor to Chase Brothers, druggist; J. P. Nelson, harness and machinery; Moomey Brothers, butchers; Deardorf & Duke, farm machinery, Miss Nannie Serveh, millinery; Mrs. O. H. Moomey, millinery; M. L. Lamb, collections and insurance; L. S. Ellsworth, attorney and solicitor; John Meek, livery; Dr. A. E. Robertson, physician and surgeon; John Taylor & Son, blacksmiths; J. T. Castellaw, blacksmith. Grain dealers: Central Granaries Company, W. C. Rusmisse, agent; Tierney & Wirt, James Fairfield, agent. Dierks Lumber & Coal Company, E. Myers, agent; M. B. proprietor (former owner, J. W. Willis). The postoffice was established in 1886, George W. Runyan, postmaster, who was succeeded, in the spring of 1887, by W. C. Rusmisse. In April, 1889, L. B. Hill was appointed postmaster. M. C. Warrington succeeded Mr. Hill in September, 1893, and served until January 1, 1898, when he was succeeded by R. K. Miller, who is still postmaster.

The first merchant to do business in the village was A. Gates, who opened a store in July, 1886, in a small shed building. R. B. Walker was Mr. Gates' clerk. Mr. Gates retired from business in 1900. The first railroad train to enter the townsite was on July 27, 1886, and the then few residents of the town had a joyful celebration. Mason City was incorporated in 1887, and the school district, No. 169, was also organized in 1887. The schools of the village have always been kept up to the highest standard of excellence.

There have been some exciting occurrences in the history of Mason City. In November, 1886, a store building owned and occupied by Mack & McEndeffer, was destroyed by fire, and three persons, J. J. Hoagland, Malcolm Miller, and Malcolm McEndeffer, lost their lives. On July 2, 1892, a cyclone visited Mason City and vicinity, and damage to the amount of $20,000 was done in the village. The schoolhouse, two churches, and many other buildings were destroyed. A great deal of damage was done also in the country surrounding the town.

The religious interests of the people of Mason City were well looked after. There were three church buildings—the Baptist, J. R. Woods, resident pastor (this was the first church organized, and had a large membership); the Methodist Episcopal people erected a handsome edifice in 1899; the Catholic church organization has a neat and commodious place of worship, and services were supplied by Rev. Father Flannigan, of Dale.

The valley of the Muddy, in which Mason City is so favorably located, is from two to three miles wide and has been so often described by the enthusiastic tourist that to speak now of its superior advantages and adaptability in the requirements of the farmer and stockman would be superfluous. It is traversed throughout its length by the Muddy, a clear stream of pure, spring water, which at many places, and particularly at Mason City, has been utilized as water power of an almost unlimited capacity, by simply throwing a short dam across it. The valley at this point is about three miles broad. Going north across the valley we come to the hills, which at a glance seem rough, but a closer inspection discloses beautiful sequestered parks, broad terraces and level prairie land, very inviting to the eye of the agriculturist. Actual experience has demonstrated the soil of these lands to be as rich and productive as the valley land. Even the rougher hills and steeper declivities show the prolific nature of the soil by covering themselves to the very top with a luxuriant growth of grass that affords for stock a pasturage second to none in the Union. Further north a few miles is Clear creek valley, from two to three miles in width, thickly dotted over with unmistakable signs of thrift and prosperity. Here is one of the oldest settlements in the county, and the farmers are comfortably wealthy and happy. This valley extends from the northwest to the southeast, and is almost parallel with the Muddy valley, with which it unites some distance below. Mason City is reached from this valley through canyons which nature has provided as natural road-beds, with easy road grades over the summit. An arm of this valley is called Elk valley and winds up to the high lands and spreads out, forming Lee's Park, a broad expanse of level land of several thousand acres in extent, and containing a thriving settlement of well-to-do farmers. This country is all tributary to Mason City. For a distance of three or four miles south of the town the country is gently rolling, well adapted to cultivation and grazing, and answering well the description of the country on the north side, except instead of terminating in several valleys, it rises to a level valley called "The Basin," which contains some ten square miles of extraordinarily rich farming land and is occupied by a class of farmers that would do credit to any country. What we say of the people of the basin, however, may equally apply to those of the whole country we are describing. They are Americans, as a rule, of education, and intelligence, with here and there one of the better class of Germans, Swedes, Danes, and Norwegians.

From Mason City, in every direction in the highlands, we find, in addition to the valleys and tables mentioned, a system of narrow valleys, small tables, high parks and terraces, separated by hills too steep and irregular for cultivation, but richly covered with a generous coat of native grass, which affords pasture much superior to the longer grasses upon the meadow of the valleys and tables. This pasture has a peculiarity which distinguishes it from all others. The grass is equally nutritious in winter and summer, and stock will fatten here in January, when there is nothing in a state of nature in the meadow to sustain life. The valley of Elk creek, one of the beautiful little valleys of Custer county, is almost wholly tributary to Mason City. This valley is settled by a good, thrifty class of farmers, who have fine homes and farms and are a prosperous and happy people. The shiftless, restless, migrating homesteader, who remained long enough to prove up and get a mortgage on his land, has given way to the more thrifty, more prudent, and more industrious farmer and stock-raiser. The business men and farmers of the southeastern quarter of Custer county welcome the oncoming years with a feeling that there is still greater prosperity for all who apply business methods, honesty and industry to their transactions.

PRESENT-DAY BUSINESS INTERESTS

In the last decade and a half, Mason City has not made pretentious growth, but her business interests have been solidified and established on a permanent and paying basis. It makes no pretensions to be a city and has small ambitions in that direction. It does claim, however, to be a thriving village, with every facility for home-making that could be expected.

Concerning its business status at the present time M. C. Warrington, to whom the public is indebted for this story of Mason City, has this to say:

"Nearly every line of business and industry is well represented in Mason City. The different lines are represented as follows: The Mason City Banking Company is the oldest bank in Custer county, having been established in May, 1886, by Austin V. Hathaway. It is capitalized at $25,000, and is recognized as one of the solid financial institutions of Custer county. Its officers are: R. B. Walker, president; P. H. Marley, vice-president; and Cornell Newman, cashier. Mr. Walker, under whose management it has been for the past fifteen years, has been connected with the bank for more than a quarter of a century. Mr. P. H. Marley, who is now a resident of Los Angeles, California, and who still retains large interests in Custer county lands, has been connected with the bank for thirty years, and it was his guiding hand which safely piloted the bank through the dangerous shoals and rough seas of panics and financial distresses, and drouth which overwhelmed the country in the '90s. The Mason City Banking Company has a large clientele of patrons and carries heavy deposits.

"The Farmers State Bank is another institution in which the people of Mason City take pride. This is comparatively a new concern, when its competitor is taken into consideration. The Farmers' State Bank was founded nine years ago and its officers are: C. B. Lauridsen, president; E. W. Hiser, vice-president, and John T. Wood, cashier. The bank, which is capitalized at $25,000, has a list of customers and patrons and carries a line of deposits which make it the envy of many older institutions. Since its establishment the Farmers' State Bank has been under the exclusive personal management of John T. Wood. Mr. Wood is a pioneer of Custer county, coming here at an early age, in 1884. He has had experience as a farmer, merchant, and public official, serving four years as register of deeds, of Custer county. This bank erected for its own use, in 1916, a fine $12,000 building.

"The Mason City Transcript, Mason City's only newspaper, so long owned and published by M. C. Warrington, is now owned and edited by J. F. Peebles, who is ably assisted by his wife. The Transcript has a big circulation in the country surrounding the town and is a factor for much good in the community. The paper is Democratic in politics.

"W. C. Elliott, E. G. Burrows, S. M. Chase, and H. L. Crosley have large stocks of general merchandise. Mr. Elliott is the pioneer merchant of Mason City, commencing business in 1891. A. O'Brien, a resident of Custer county since 1882, now carries on an exclusive hardware store, but until recently also carried groceries. C. E. Bass & Company, with J. G. Bass as manager, carry hardware, farm implements, automobiles, windmills, pumps, etc. George J. Anderson is proprietor of the only meat market. R. H. Duke has the exclusive drug store. J. C. Nelson & Company have a harness and shoe-repairing store. Mrs. G. W. Whitehead has millinery and ladies' furnishings. Chase Brothers and Charles O. Lamb are proprietors of automobile garages. Mr. Lamb is completing a new cement-stone garage building, fifty by a hundred feet, for his business. Meek & Hawkins are proprietors of the livery barn. W. N. Hurley and J. W. Taylor are the village blacksmiths. Schultz Brothers, L. L. Narrazon, and T. J. Wood are the carpenters. Hans G. Arp and the Farmers' Shipping Company handle live stock. G. F. Frasier and Cleir Chrisman are barbers. W. C. Taylor is proprietor of a flour and feed store. A. A. Coxon and son maintain a restaurant. M. S. Fairfield has temperance drinking parlors. M. C. Carroll is resident agent and distributor for the Standard Oil Company, which has a large plant here. William F. Davis has the hydraulic-well and windmill business. E. W. Edwards and son have an automobile-repair shop. W. C. Elliott and F. S. Moomey are proprietors of the fine opera house, which contains three large store rooms on the first floor and a splendid hall and office rooms on the second floor. This beautiful building was erected in 1912. Dr. Ralph M. McClaughan is our resident dentist. Dr. A. C. Rumery and Dr. P. H. J. Carothers are the physicians who administer to the ills of the people. Dr. Carothers also maintains a fine, large hospital in connection with his practice. The Mason City Flour Mills is another local institution of which the town is justly proud. It is a large four-story structure, equipped with model machinery and uses water power furnished by Muddy creek. A. A. Karinow is proprietor and enjoys a prosperous business. H. A. Doane owns and operates a cement plant in which a number of men find employment in the summer months. The Hotel Melvin is owned by Frank N. Mossman, and is operated by Charles Kennedy, a popular landlord. The Farmers' Shipping Company, a co-operative association, owns the creamery and handles cream, poultry, and live stock. Frank G. Hall is manager. The Central Granaries Company runs the elevator, with J. W. Fairfield as manager. Levi King and F. N. Mossman are land agents. The two banks also deal in lands. The pleasure and recreation of the people of the town are supplied by two motion-picture theatres, one owned by Lamb & Miller, the other by F. S. Moomey. There are two lumber and coal yards, Dierks Lumber & Coal Company, and the J. H. Melville Lumber Company, W. S. Moore, local manager."

The postoffice at Mason City was established in the month of October, 1886, with George W. Runyan as postmaster. For the first six months of the town's history the mail facilities were very poor and caused endless annoyance. The mail was brought across the country on a Star route to Algernon and then brought to Mason City by some one who volunteered to go after it on mail days. The letter mail was taken care of by H. B. Austin, cashier of the bank, while the paper mail was thrown into a box, for each individual to help himself. After holding the postoffice a few months Mr. Runyan resigned and was succeeded by W. C. Rusmisseil. On the change of administrations in 1889, Captain L. B. Hill, an honored veteran of the Civil war, was appointed postmaster. M. C. Warrington was postmaster from 1893 to 1898, when he was succeeded by R. K. Miller, who is also a Civil war veteran. J. W. Fairfield succeeded Mr. Miller, and was succeeded in turn by W. C. Rusmisseil, who is now postmaster. The postoffice has kept pace with the growth of the town and the surrounding country, and has two rural free-delivery routes and one Star route, supplying mail to a large territory. J. C. Spencer and Leo Spencer, father and son, are carriers on the free-delivery routes, and

E. W. Edwards on the Star route. It is rather an unusual incident that all the men who have been postmasters of Mason City live here yet except Mr. Runyan, who resides at Broken Bow.

OLDEST INHABITANTS

Among the present citizens of Mason City who were residents during the first year of the town's history are W. N. Hurley, H. L. Crosley, M. C. Warrington, and W. C. Rusmissell. Those who have lived in the town twenty-five years or more are: Messrs. T. J. Wood, G. F. Frasier, J. P. Nelson, E. G. Burrows, and Mesdames W. N. Hurley, H. L. Crosley, M. C. Warrington, Belle V. Robertson, Martha Chase, J. P. Nelson. Niels Anderson, from whom the west half of the townsite was purchased, with his family, has been an honored citizen of the village since he sold his homestead, in the spring of 1886, to the Lincoln Land Company.

FEDERAL OFFICERS

M. C. Warrington bears the distinction of being the only Mason City man who has been honored by appointment to a federal office outside of home. He is now register of the United States Land office at Broken Bow, having been appointed in May, 1916. Mr. Warrington was postmaster of Mason City under the second administration of Grover Cleveland. He has also been member and chairman of the village board, and has served as village clerk and treasurer, justice of the peace, chairman of the township board, besides serving ten years on the school board.

SARGENT

Sargent, a hustling village of over 800 inhabitants, is situated in the northeastern part of Custer county, in the midst of a fine agricultural and stock-raising district. It is located on the north side of the Middle Loup river, about one mile from that stream. Sargent is one of the oldest towns in the county, having been laid out in 1883. The first bank in the county is located here. The first building erected was the general store of J. K. Spacht, in the summer of 1883, and the location was the middle of a field of wheat. The town grew rapidly and was particularly lively in the summer of 1888, when the B. & M. Railroad grade was built, and it was expected that the cars would be running into the town that fall. Owing to a big strike on the system, the road was not completed at that time. The drouth years of the early '90s caused the town to dwindle down to a mere shadow of its former proportions. In the fall of 1899, however, the railroad was built from Arcadia to Sargent, making the latter the terminus, and since that time the town has had a very substantial growth. The Independent Telephone Company, of Broken Bow, extended its line to Sargent in the fall of 1900. The same fall was erected a fine, two-story frame school building, which now houses one of the best schools in the county, under the charge of three teachers. Sargent has two churches, the Congregational and the Methodist. It has several fine business blocks, two newspapers, two banks, two grain elevators, and a creamery, with other lines of business well represented. Following is a complete business directory of the town, March 8, 1901:

Ansley is an enterprising town of 1,000 population, located in the southeastern part of Custer county, on the main line of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad to the northwest.

The county around it is adapted to farming and stock-raising and these are the chief occupations of the people. The first settlement was made in the year 1886, in which year the Lincoln Land Company purchased from Anthony Wilkinson, a ranchman, the land upon which the town now stands, and platted the town, naming it in honor of a lady by the name of Ansley who had invested considerable money in real estate here. The first frame building erected was occupied by a lawyer by the name of George Snell. The second building was the store building of Edgar Varney, which he moved over from Westerville. These structures were soon followed by others, among them the Van Sant House, later known as the Commercial hotel, the drug store of Sam Royds, two bank buildings, the stores of E. H. Burrows and A. H. Shepard and the Eureka hotel. The private residences of E. H. Gaines and Dan Hagin were erected in 1887 and that of C. J. Stevens in 1888. Among the first citizens of Ansley may be mentioned A. H. Turpen, O. P. Allphin, Mrs. H. Stevenson, C. J. Stevens, Edgar Varney, Dan Hagin, E. H. Gaines, E. H. Burrows, D. A. Van Sant, Sam Royds, Thomas Blowers, A. H. Shepard, C. M. Dorr, James Davis, F. E. Gosselin, and A. L. and E. A. Butler, to whose enterprise and business judgment in those early times are largely due the later progress and prosperity of this community. Mr. E. H. Burrows, one of the old citizens, describes his first visit to Ansley in these words:

"I first struck the town in the middle of May, 1886. At that time, there was a tent and a wagon-load of lumber to mark the spot where the future metropolis of the southeastern part of Custer county was to be. I selected my lot for a building site at that time and went back east for a while, to await developments, returning about the 7th of July. On my return, I found more tents and more lumber on the ground, and a few shanties in the course of erection. We were compelled to haul our lumber for building purposes by wagon from Kearney, over sixty miles, which brought the price of six-dollar-a-thousand knot-holes up to the price of 'B' select. While staying at Ansley this time, I boarded at the West End hotel, a fine structure built of 'B' select, with kitchen, dining room, office, parlor, bathroom, and bedroom combined. Everybody was good-natured and the landlord expected his guests to 'double up' every night with whoever he saw fit to assign us, and at the first peep o' day the clerk would come and shake us, saying, 'Time to roll off them tables; the girls want to set the tables for breakfast,' with which request we cheerfully complied, pulling on our shoes as quickly as possible, going out of doors and leaning up against the knot-holes until the bell rang for breakfast, when we sat up to the table. The waiter then called out from the kitchen, 'Tea or coffee, which? you fellows on the north end.' Of course we said 'coffee' because it had more body than tea, which prevented us from seeing what was floating about between the bottom and top of the cup. The waiter brought in a plate of hot biscuits and another with eggs and bacon, set them on the table and said, 'Now, boys, help yourselves.' We waited for some time, wondering if we were expected to use our hands for plates and our fingers for knives and forks. We finally asked the waiter if that was the intention. He replied, 'Come off the dump! Shoo! Shoo! Shoo! There is your tableware.' And sure enough there it was. We had failed to remove the cover of fat, saucy flies that had taken possession of our plates as if they had expected to be waited upon first. Such was my first experience with Ansley. When I arrived a third time, after an absence of four or five weeks, I found that a great change had been made — from a brown prairie to a busy village. I found about twenty buildings, in different stages of erection, my own among them, which was partly inclosed. I scraped a lot of shavings together, spread down my blankets and slept under my own vine and fig tree. But, alas! not alone. After I fell asleep, I dreamed I was a boy again and went down to the creek to take a swim, and just as I was ready to take a plunge into the water, I fell backwards into a bunch of nettles. I awoke, and as soon as I got myself located, I realized that it was not nettles, but fleas."

The railroad was put through Ansley in the fall of 1886. Mr. Fred Gosselin was the first operator. The putting of the railroad through not only brought Americans, but also folks from across the seas to share in the bounties of this western country. One of these, Mrs. Anna Thessen, in a letter from Mason City addressed to Mr. E. P. Gaines and dated June 16, 1918, tells of her first visit to Ansley:

"As I read the question in your advertisement, I thought that I would send in a few items. It is thirty years ago, the 21st of this month, that I, a young girl of seventeen, fresh from Germany, came to Ansley. As I couldn't talk American, I did the next best thing and got an English-German dictionary, in which I looked up such words as 'hotel,' breakfast,' 'how much,' 'coffee,' 'tea,' 'team,' 'livery barn,' and so on, and that way found the hotel, asked for breakfast, paid for it, hired a team and was taken to the farm of John Graf. The hotel was called the 'Cottage Hotel' and was kept by either Mrs. Van Sant or Mrs. Alex Moore; anyhow it was one of the two. The livery barn was kept by Ed. Sloan and was standing west of Harry McNulty's restaurant. I also bought candy at Edgar Varney's store. The bank, I think, was run at that time by C. J. Stevens."

The motto of Ansley is: "Push, that's Ansley," and the enterprise and thrift of its business men have proved its proper applicability. They are, and have generally been, men of unselfish service, broad vision, and community pride — men whose aim is, and has been, to serve the community as well as themselves. And whatever this town may become, it will owe much to those sturdy pioneers who, in defiance of hail, hot winds, and drouth, blazed the trail that others have followed to success and opulence.

ANSLEY'S BANKS

The first bank in Ansley was established in the year 1888, by C. J. Stevens, F. M. Rublee, and B. F. Haeke, and was known as the Ansley Banking Company. In 1902 C. Mackey, Frank Young, and T. T. Varney bought out the banking company and reorganized it as the First National Bank. It continued as such until 1916, when it was changed to the State Bank of Ansley. Its present officers are : President, C. Mackey; vice-president, B. J. Tierney; cashier, R. A. Studley; assistant cashier, E. O. Morris; other stockholders and directors, Andrew Sherbeck and Anthony Wilkinson. Its present capital and surplus aggregate $40,000 and its deposits $500,000.

In the year 1887 Peter Fowlie and William West organized the Bank of Ansley, but this failed in the year 1890.

The Farmers' State Bank was organized in 1905. Its first president was Walter E. Newcomb and its first cashier was George E. Richtmyer. Mr. Newcomb was succeeded by Frank Baker and he by George E. Richtmyer, who continued as president up to the time of his death, October 1, 1917. The present officers are: President, Frank Baker; vice-president, Lewis S. Newcomb; cashier, Grover A. Holeman; assistant cashier, A. C. Van Horne. In the 1907 panic this bank never refused to cash a check. Its present authorized capital is $25,000 and its deposits amount to over $200,000.

The Security State Bank was organized February 5, 1915. Its first president was A. P. Dobesh and its first cashier was F. N. Austin. Its present capital and surplus amount to $21,000 with deposits of $220,000. Its resources have increased from $57,840.97 in August, 1915, to $244,983.89 in August, 1918. Its present officers are: President, William Ihlow; vice-president, Henry Schmid; cashier, E. P. Gaines; assistant cashier, D. C. Thompson.

ANSLEY'S MERCANTILE ESTABLISHMENTS

The first merchant in Ansley was Edgar Varney, who moved his store over from Westerville and put it in charge of his son, T. T. Varney, in the early part of the year 1886. The same year, Thomas H. Blowers also moved from Westerville. About the same time, W. D. Fritz opened up the first hardware store, in the building with Edgar Varney. The following year saw the advent of E. H. Burrows, A. H. Shepard, Gaines & Hagin, and the Butler Brothers. Burrows continued in business up to the year 1912, when he disposed of his interests to E. L. Kelley and removed to Los Angeles, California. A. H. Shepard was in business up to 1916, when he disposed of his stock of goods to his son, Archie H., and his daughter, Myrtle C., and entered the post office. Gaines & Hagin ran their business until 1909, when they dissolved partnership, Hagin disposing of his interests to Gaines and, later, starting a new store, which he continued to run until 1913. Gaines continued at the old stand up to the time of his death, January 2, 1915, when his sons disposed of his stock of goods. Thomas H. Blowers, in the early part of the '90s, traded his mercantile business for the milling interests of A. W. Hawk, who operated it with C. J. Stevens and I. Clark about ten years. Of the present merchants, C. J. Stevens started his present store in 1895, J. H. Kerr in 1899, F. P. Hawk in 1903, L. F. Landmesser in 1907, J. H. Varney in 1914, and Shepard & Shepard in 1916.

The first furniture and undertaking establishment in Ansley was run by Fred Gosselin, who opened it in 1889 or 1890. The R. G. Applegarth Furniture and Undertaking Company have been in business since 1906. Mr. Applegarth died in the year 1916, since which time the manager, H. D. Reed, who has been with the company from the first, has had sole charge. Mattley & Hoover and C. J. Stevens both carry a line of furniture, while the former also do an undertaking business.

The first hardware dealer was W. D. Fritz, but the Butler Brothers and Gaines & Hagin also carried a full line of hardware and farm machinery. In 1902 W. S. Mattley began selling hardware and farm machinery, disposing of his business to his brother, Charles E., in May, 1914. In April, 1916, the firm became Mattley & Hoover, through the admission of C. B. Hoover. D. W. Thompson sold farm machinery from 1903 to 1913. The present dealers in farm machinery are J. D. Knapp and Hiser & Detwiler. Mr. Knapp has been in his present business since 1906 and Messrs. Hiser and Detwiler since 1914.

From the start, all of the general mercantile stores carried lines of clothing. Our present clothier is Roscoe G. Secord, who keeps a full line of men's furnishing goods—hats, boots, shoes, rubbers, neckties, and collars. Our tailor, Otto Winter, who came in September, 1916, also takes orders for suits, besides doing a cleaning and pressing business.

The first milliner in Ansley was Miss Wilhelmína Mengel (now Mrs. M. C. Warrington, of Mason City), who opened a shop the year that the village was started. Then came Miss Nettie Worden (now Mrs. R. M. Hayslip). She was followed by Mrs. Mary Wakelin, and she by Miss Augusta Worden. Later the Worden sisters, then Mrs. Hoover and Mrs. Holman, entered the millinery business and conducted it for several years. The present milliner is Miss Mary Geeseman, who has been in the business since 1914. Others who have carried a line of millinery since the beginning of the town have been E. H. Burrows, A. H. Shepard, and C. J. Stevens.

ANSLEY'S MILLS, SHOPS, LIVERY STABLES, ETC.

The first blacksmith was C. M. Dorr, who came at the founding of the town, or soon after. A few months later, William Davis entered into business with him. This partnership continued for several years, when Davis sold out his interest to Dorr, who continued to run it for a few months longer, when he finally disposed of it to Joel F. Lannum. Later William Burdett went into the carriage and wagon business in the same building, hiring a blacksmith to do his iron work. Shortly after the location of Dorr, Charles Gessright opened up a wagon shop on the lot where the home of T. N. Southard now stands.

Dana M. Saville was also a blacksmith here, removing from Westerville in May, 1904, and continuing in business until October, 1914, when he was forced to quit, by reason of ill health. The present blacksmith is George Gravley, who came to this place in 1914.

The first barber shop was run by A. H. Turpen. The present barbers are S. P. Varney and R. D. Breeden.

In the fall of 1886, A. W. Hawk and his son, C. W., bought from the Martin Brothers the Algernon flouring mill, which, in 1890, they moved to Ansley. This mill they later traded to Blowers & Clark. It finally came into the hands of C. J. Stevens, and it was burned in the year 1906.

Ansley's first carpenters were O. M. Geeseman, Sid. Harris, Ed. Harris, Racine Wiget, Henry Klick, Jack Storey, Henry Hogg, and Al. Hoover. The first baker was J. A. Mauler. He came in 1903 or 1904. He was followed in 1909 by J. F. Russell, who has been in the business ever since.

Joe Moore opened the first garage, in 1908. In 1915 Templin & Wozney built their large garage, at a cost of $6,500. This garage is now run by the Marsh Auto Company, composed of H. Guy Marsh, G. H. Holeman, and A. C. Van Horne. The garage of E. A. Butler & Son was erected in the fall of 1916, and, including stock and fixtures, represents the value of $20,000. E. A. Butler and his son, Harry, are salesmen for the Ford automobile company, of Detroit. The Hollenbeck garage, which makes a specialty of repairing cars, is run by the manager, C. R. Woolley. E. H. Norden runs a machine shop and makes a specialty of automobile repairing.

The first shoe repairer was Henry Abbey. Next came E. Clark, who sold his shop to Frank Mills, who in turn, in 1905, disposed of it to its present owner, Perry Foster. Mr. Foster also carries a full line of footwear.

A. J. Hookum has just installed a new Sano mill, with the capacity of fifty barrels of flour per day. The first meat market was run by Anthony Wilkinson. Others who have engaged in the meat business are John Davis, William Zimmerman, Clerk Hanna, O. H.

Moomey, Wes. Moomey, Jake Paine, Norton Amsberry, Fred Simpson, E. B. Hyatt, George Hatfield, Will Garten, and Al. Govier. The present markets are the Ansley market, conducted by Perry Lanum, and the Sanitary market, conducted by Fred Maulick.

The first to engage in the well business was George Haines, about 1889. Henry Wakelin and Al. Harvell also were engaged in this business in the early years of Ansley. E. A. Butler sold windmills and well material from the commencement of the town. Hiram Curtis has been in the business since 1897, moving into his new building in 1917.

In 1887, Joe Rambo opened the first livery barn, where Butler's garage now stands. This building was later removed to the Lanum lots and is now one of the buildings belonging to Grand and John Lanum, who use it for a feed and sale stable. Others who have been engaged in the livery business are Alex. Moore, At. Sloan, James McMannus, Wallace Busic, F. P. and C. W. Hawk, Russell & Lanum, W. O. Phillips, and E. F. Hollenbeck.

D. A. Van Sant opened the first hotel in Ansley, the Commercial House, in August, 1886. It was afterward sold to Mrs. Eggleston, who ran it for a number of years. It is the building now occupied by Pat's Cafe. The Central hotel was opened by Fritz & Michael, on the lot that lies just east of the postoffice. The Cottage hotel stood where Harry McNulty's restaurant now stands and was conducted for a number of years by Mrs. Alex. Moore. Harry McNulty and Mrs. Edna Gaylord now conduct the two restaurants of the place, while our large rooming house is owned by Mrs. R. M. Hayslip.

J. W. Comstock has been in the harness business continuously since the beginning of the town, in 1886—first with a partner, Henry Abbey, and latterly, in 1907, with Fred Mills, since which the firm has been known as Comstock & Mills.

The jewelry business in Ansley was first represented by Henry Kirk, who came either in 1886 or 1887 and occupied a building near where the postoffice now stands. After three or four years, he disposed of his stock and left the town. He was followed by Elsa Harsin, who had his shop with Walter Theobald, druggist. When Charles Hare bought the Theobald drug store he also purchased Harsin's jewelry equipment, and he continued to mend watches up to the time of his death. In the meantime a jeweler by the name of Snook opened a shop in the little building formerly occupied by S. P. Varney as a barber shop. He must have been a very good man, for, although we have consulted a score of the old citizens, we have been able to obtain but three facts in regard to his life: he was a jeweler, a Seventh-day Adventist, and his name was Snook. When Charles Hare died, in 1905, A. L. Butler purchased the jewelry business, which he has conducted ever since.

D. A. Van Sant was the first drayman and the first to make a business of moving buildings. He moved the flouring mill of Hawk & Son from Algernon to Ansley, in 1890. The present draymen are Clyde Pinckley and Andy Case.

The Star Theatre is owned by Mrs. Joyce Wellman and is operated by her manager, William Burdett.

There are at present seven creamery agencies in Ansley. The David Cole Company, of Omaha, is represented by A. W. Kimball; the Lincoln Pure Butter Company by Norton Amsberry; the Beatrice Creamery Company by J. D. Knapp; the Kirschbaum & Sons Creamery Company, of Omaha, by Fred Maulick; and the Farmers' Shipping Association, and the Fairmont Creamery Company by A. J. Hookom and William Mannen.

ANSLEY'S LUMBER AND COAL YARDS

The first lumber company to do business in Ansley was the Chicago Lumber Company, which entered the field in June, 1886. Its representative was a young man by the name of Cox, and he, with a small pile of lumber, landed here before any buildings were erected. In the fall of 1886 the Stevenson Lumber Company was established. Its manager was Brome Stevenson. The father of the manager was the first man to die in Ansley—from the effects of injuries received in being thrown from a buggy. In this same year E. A. and A. L. Butler went into the coal business, remaining in the same until 1894, when E. A. went to work for the International Harvester Company and A. L. engaged in the restaurant business, removing the fixtures from Seward. The Dierks Lumber Company, which has been on the ground for a number of years, is represented in this place by its genial manager, O. D. Dean. Its investment here is $60,000. The J. H. Melville Lumber Company, successor of the Turner Lumber Company, represents an investment of $27,000. Its manager is Percy Reed. Both yards deal in coal and lumber. The Farmers' Shipping Association also deals in coal.

ANSLEY'S SHIPPING ASSOCIATION

B. J. Tierney began in the grain and livestock business in Ansley in the year 1887 and has been engaged in this line continuously ever since. In 1917, alone, he transacted business to the value of $100,000. The Farmers' Grain & Livestock Shipping Association was organized in 1909. Its organic capital is $10,000. Its stockholders number 125 and it has paid-up capital of $21,000. Its president is A. P. Dobesh; secretary, James Allen; and manager, Sam. P. Negley.

ANSLEY'S DRUG STORES

The first druggist was Sam Royds, who was also postmaster. He came in 1886 and, upon his death, in 1888, his wife (now Mrs. B. J. Tierney), succeeded him. She conducted the business until it was sold to Charles H. F. Steinmeir, in 1906. Mr. Steinmeir now conducts a Rexall store and the value of his enterprise is estimated at $40,000. The second drug store in Ansley was that of Rev. Walter Theobald, a Baptist minister, and it was opened shortly after that of Royds. This store was later disposed of to Charles B. Hare and was run by him for a number of years—until his death, in September, 1905, when the stock was sold to C. H. F. Steinmeir. Shortly after the death of Royds, his clerk, O. P. Allphin, opened a drug store, and he continued in business until 1912, when the stock was disposed of to Dr. E. A. Hanna. Hanna, in turn, disposed of it, October, 1917, to Charles Chandler, who now conducts one of the best pharmacies in the state. The value of his investment is $15,000.

ANSLEY'S PROFESSIONAL MEN

The first lawyer on the ground was George Snell. Shortly afterward J. A. Armour moved over from Westerville; he later served two terms as county judge. In the spring of 1888 came Hugh McConelly. Judson C. Porter became an inhabitant of the village in 1898 but died in 1903. J. R. Rhodes hung out his shingle October 1, 1893, and has practiced his profession here ever since, with the exception of four years (1894-8) which he spent in Broken Bow, as county judge. F. M. Bentley began the practice of law in March, 1904, but died two years later, in December, 1906. N. Dwight Ford, the present county judge, was also a resident of Ansley for some time.

Ansley's first physician was Dr. C. H. Morris, who practiced here from 1886 to 1893. Part of the time contemporaneously with Dr. Morris was Dr. Hawes, who left the town in 1894. Other physicians who have practiced in Ansley are Drs. Thomas, Anderson, Mullins, Imah, and Jennings. Dr. Grace M. Lewis, a sister of Mrs. J. H. Kerr, also practiced medicine here, from 1898 to 1902. Of the present physicians, Dr. E. A. Hanna came here from Elmo, Missouri, in 1895; Dr. W. R. Young came in 1897; Dr. C. L. Housel, in 1907; Dr. R. P. Higgins, in 1913; and Dr. H. C. Stadden in 1916. Dr. Hanna is a graduate of the Ensworth Medical College, at St. Joseph, Missouri; Dr. Young, of the State University of Iowa; Dr. Housel, of the Lincoln Medical College; Dr. Higgins of the University of Nebraska, and Dr. Stadden of the Creighton College of Medicine. Dr. Housel and Dr. Higgins have been serving their country in the medical corps, in connection with the world war.

Ansley's first located dentist was Dr. Kramer, now of Hyannis, Nebraska. Dr. W. A. Housel opened his office in Ansley upon his graduation from the Lincoln Dental College, in 1905. His assistant is Dr. Curtis McCalister, also a graduate of the Lincoln Dental College.

ANSLEY'S ELECTRIC-LIGHT, WATER, AND TELEPHONE SYSTEMS

Ansley was the first village of the state, west of Grand Island, to have both city water and electric lights. The Ansley Electric Light & Power Company's plant was built and owned by C. J. Stevens and was enfranchised by the village, September 20, 1892. The waterworks company was organized and the plant completed in 1893. For this purpose, four thousand dollars' worth of bonds were voted and issued in 1892. The light plant, however, was destroyed by fire in the fall of 1904. Peter W. McTaggart & Company succeeded the Electric Light & Power Company, October 1, 1906. This plant, in turn, was also destroyed by fire, April 13, 1910. It was succeeded by the Municipal Light & Power System, June 6, 1910. This latter plant was completed the following year, at the approximate cost of $21,000.

The first telephone company in Ansley was known as the Central Telephone Company and the plant was installed in the year 1903. The first manager was A. L. Butler and the first operator was Miss Grace Butler, now Mrs. Fred Maulick. The first 'phones in town were those of A. L. Butler, E. A. Butler, and J. H. Hiser. The present telephone company, known as the Ansley Telephone Company, had its origin in the year 1909, through the purchase of the plant of the Central Telephone Company. Its present officers are: C. J. Stevens, president; John McCullough, vice-president; Roy Patterson, secretary; R. A. Studley, treasurer. It has local and long-distance connections and 682 subscribers.

ANSLEY'S NEWSPAPERS

The following facts relative to the newspapers of Ansley have been furnished by Mr. C. N. Harris, himself at one time a publisher in the village. A short time after Ansley was founded, James Westervelt purchased the Western Echo of Westerville and, removing it to Ansley, published it here. This name was later changed to the Ansley Chronicle, with two brothers, Will and Harve Chapman, as joint editors. In 1895 the plant was sold to Thomas Wright, who was its sole editor until about 1902. About the year 1900 A. H. Barks started the Citizen which, about 1902, was combined with the Chronicle and called the Chronicle-Citizen, Wright and Barks being joint editors and publishers. About two years later Barks sold his interest in the paper to Wright, who continued to publish it until 1907, Barks starting a new paper, the Nebraskan, which was discontinued after a few issues. Then, in 1905, Barks purchased the Argosy of Dr. McArthur, of Westerville, moved it to Ansley and published it here. In 1907 he purchased the Chronicle-Citizen of Wright and combined the two papers under the name of the Argosy and Chronicle-Citizen. June 1, 1908, this plant was sold to C. N. Harris, who continued to publish the paper as the Argosy until July 11, 1914, when the establishment was destroyed by fire. Thereafter the town was without a paper until the beginning of 1915, when Wright purchased the Beacon plant at Broken Bow, moved it to Ansley and began the publication of the Ansley Herald which he continued until June, 1918, when he sold it to J. A. Wallace, of Gilby, North Dakota, its present editor and publisher. During the years 1894-6 James Amsberry published in Ansley a Populist paper, which was called the Advocate.

ANSLEY'S POSTOFFICE

The first postmaster was Sam Royds, appointed. He died before his term expired and his wife, now Mrs. B. J. Tierney, filled out the term. In their order the postmasters, since Royds, have been Major E. S. Ellison, A. H. Turpen, T. T. Varney, Thomas Wright, E. P. Gaines, and A. H. Shepard. The first rural route was established in 1904, with Joe Hyatt as the carrier. There are at present three regular and two Star routes.

ANSLEY'S PATRIOTISM

The sons of Ansley have fought both in the Philippines and the world war. Those who fought in the first were E. A. Miller, C. C. Cooper, H. L. Kerr, C. V. Pinkley, William Lawson, Oliver Winch, Seymour Burton, Nat. S. Sims, F. C. Rucker, Lemuel Clay, Alvin Coxan, Parlie Busic, Fred Peterson, and Walter Ashworth, the last named having died of disease, in the Philippines.

Up to August 15, 1918, Ansley had made the following contributions to the financial support of the government. She has purchased bonds to the amount of over $151,000; she has bought war savings stamps to the amount of $53,000; she has contributed to the Red Cross $4,441.75; to the Young Men's Christian Association, $1,100; and to the Knights of Columbus, seventy-five dollars. The town has stood ready to do all that was demanded of it in the giving of its sons and the contributing of its wealth to the cause of liberty.

Up to August 15, 1918, ninety-nine of our boys have answered the call and were either in training camps or on the battlefields of Europe. They are: Argyle Knapp, Art Dobesh, Paul Martin, Hermie Dewey, Dr. C. L. Housel, Albert Thessen, Dr. R. P. Higgins, Claude Hoover, Orrie Amsberry, Walter Anderson, Raymond Dewey, Glen McCollister, Perley Comer, Clyde Oglevive, Earl Harris, Earl Case, Clyde Geeseman, Edwin F. Lund, Lee McCollough, Wehland Hayslip, William McCormack, Harvey Porter, Roy Shepard, William Moore, Rosil Draper, Floyd Junk, Fred Graff, George Martin, Arthur Stuckey, Norman Spalding, Leon Fowler, Art James, William Rigby, Clark Springman, Clyde Wills, Everett Carothers, Ray Lockhart, Richard Thessen, Otto Price, William Mackey, Arthur Hein, Lawrence Berry, Ernest Wilson, Glen Brisbane, Clifford Paine, Roy Burton, Lawrence Bristol, Earl Fox, Charles Armour, Fred James, Lawrence Lowery, Fenton McEwen, Vernon Devine, Harry Zahn, Ralph Smith, Richard Thessen, H. R. Norden, Edwin Burrows, Harry Hildebrant, Joseph W. Cassell, Roscoe Coleman, Ivo Dewey, Earl Watson, Levert Farrel, Emil Malm, Noel Ritenour, Fritz Baalhorn, Sam Hoblyn, Roscoe Rhodes, Edgar Haines, Frederick E. Butler, Clinton Applegarth, Bert Morrison, Clarence C. Arnold, Charles H. Munn, Wesley J. Anderson, John A. Crist, Alfred B. Mills, William Dudley Pester, Harry B. Duncan, Kresten Ray Jensen, Clyde Willis, Fayette Corlin, Henry Brown, James Rigby, William Ray Van Sant, Chester Harris, Wesley James Anderson, Henry Wrasse, G. Herbert Evans, Lynn Payne, Walter Smith, Alden Draper, Glen Glover, Frank Bubak, Jesse Holeman, Harry Hickenbottom, Leslie Nider.

Ansley! Fairest city of the prairie! May no portentous cloud arise to darken thy horizon! May thy sons ever be strong and thy daughters fair. And may the coming years behold naught but thy unfolding glory and increasing strength.

ANSLEY'S LIBRARY

The Ansley public library was first started by the Woman's Federated Club, in the fall of 1916, with books donated by the members and with a small purchase of new books. In 1917 the township elected a library board, consisting of Dr. W. R. Young, Mrs. D. W. Thomson, B. J. Tierney, F. B. Housel, and Lewis Newcomb. They also put a three-mill levy on the township for library purposes. At present we have on our shelves about 500 books and have made quite an extensive purchase besides. A large number of magazines have also been donated. The books are free to all residents of the township, but non-residents are assessed twenty-five cents per quarter. The board has an application in with the Carnegie library people and is awaiting their decision. If the decision is not favorable, a move will be made to build a building ourselves. The library is open Saturday afternoons and evenings. The weekly output of books is from thirty to fifty. Mrs. H. L. Fowler is the librarian.

THE STORY OF ANSELMO

[The story of Anselmo is contributed by Mrs. J. C. Moore.]

The village of Anselmo derived its name from Anselmo Smith, who was a civil engineer and who platted the towns along the Burlington Railroad for the Lincoln Townsite Company.

1 MAIN STREET, ANSELMO 2 STREET SCENE IN ANSELMO 3 COMMUNITY BUILDING, ANSELMO

When he arrived on the ground where the town was to be platted, he was so impressed by the beautiful surrounding country, that he suggested this site would bear his given name, and to harmonize with this he named the streets and avenues after the men who settled on the land in the early '80s, namely, M. R. Foster, Harvey Said, and Walter Scott.

Anselmo Smith, being a man of vision, in looking through his field glass, probably foresaw the future of the village that was to bear his name. Looking north and west, before him lay the virgin soil, which few thought it necessary to cultivate, and the great, dry, sandy plains which up until this time had been left to the hunter and his prey.

To the south and east the engineer saw the beautiful agricultural valleys of Eureka, Ortello, Dale, Victoria, and New Helena, overshadowed by vast table land, together with Victoria creek, rising in the plains to the west, passing underground through Anselmo and coming to the surface again, in the form of mineral springs, in the New Helena valley.

A pioneer with vision, once looked beyond what had been done and saw what might be done, then did it. H. B. Andrews, one of the pioneers of the early '70s, saw in these vast prairies an opportunity to make a fortune out of the cattle business, and how well he succeeded, would be a history in itself. For the next quarter of a century, Mr. Andrews was a familiar figure in the saddle, looking after his vast interests. C. R. Mathews, another pioneer of the early '70s, who blazed the trail across the tortuous west, found ample compensation for the travail he endured, in the superb fruitfulness of his labors—coming as he did from far away Virginia. Only the pioneer can appreciate his early struggles.

The common remark, that the world is now in the engineering age, is well borne out by the history of the years now under consideration, namely the spring and fall of 1886. It was signally manifest, in that it marked the entrance of the first train over the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad into Anselmo—a line of railway having been surveyed from Grand Island to the Black Hills—and Anselmo was platted in the fall of 1886 (November 20).

Henry Kelley erected the first building in the village, to be used as a drug store; C. F. Graves followed with a building to be used as a grocery store. Dorr Heffleman was already on the ground, located in a tent, in which, while his building was in the course of construction, he conducted a bank, afterward known as the First Bank of Anselmo.

While the town was being built, Harvey Said conducted a hotel in a sod house one-half mile from town. The first restaurant and short-order house was built by Thomas Flood, followed by what were then called modern hotels—the Bowman House, built by Crate Bowman; the Poor House, erected by Charles Poor; and later the Ong House, which is now known as the City hotel. The Bowman House was transferred to a new location by Moore Brothers, in 1911, and named the Commercial hotel. The present owner of the property is Al. Willet. The Poor House has long since gone out of existence. Weander Brothers conducted the first general store, after these came E. C. Gibbs, C. D. Pelham, Humphrey Smith, T. R. Brayton, T. P. Riley, James Phillips, William Fishroff, Fairchilds & Bodine, J. H. Brandenburg, Joe Michele, Hugh McKee, Pierce Cain, C. L. Tupper, Kelley Sisters, Doctors Stack, Hamilton, Kelley, and Gilligan, Thomas Russell, Otis Scovill, John Jessen, Kloman and Arnold, James Zane, William Stater, James McDermott, William Boyd, and others.

These were the merchants and business men of Anselmo from its infancy until 1895, and all did a thriving business. Then Anselmo met with reverses, on account of the drouth of 1894, and time passed slowly for the next two or three years, when business revived again, with G. M. Williams, store and postoffice; Lee Gordon, general store; H. K. Atkisson, general store; Wilson Brothers, elevator; W. E. Warren, elevator; Dierks Brothers, lumber; H. B. Andrews, stock buyer; Charles Smith, hardware; Warren & Bass, general merchandise.

The old corporation was revived, after a slumber of four years. A village election was held and gave to the village board the following personnel: F. C. Wilson, chairman; H. K. Atkisson, clerk; W. E. Warren, Henry Kelley, and Crate Bowman as village trustees. The little town once more began to show signs of life, and so went Anselmo until 1903, when come J. J. Tooley, with the Anselmo State Bank; Moore Brothers, general merchandise; B. C. Empfield, hardware, (succeeded by W. H. Danielson); Frank Taylor, meat market; Williams & Johnson, general merchandise.

Among the prominent business firms and corporations now in the city are Moore Brothers, wholesale automobile dealers; Anselmo State Bank, with Charles Sanders president and Dave Christen cashier; People's State Bank, with Henry Kelley president and R. E. Thompson cashier; Farmers' Mercantile Company, Aloin Daily manager; Moulton & Bass, general merchants; Williams & Taylor, general merchants; W. W. Bass & Company, and Moore Brothers, hardware; J. W. Crist, Frank Taylor, meat markets; Kelley & Wills, H. S. Mittonberger, drug stores; John Runner, jeweler; Mrs. Barr, hotel; Jay Barton, restaurant; Henry Doty, T. P. Maroney, pool halls; Harrington Brothers and George Tappan, dray lines; Henry Morrissey, Roy Parsons, barbers; Jack Wells, blacksmith; H. L. Day, Frank Willson, wells and windmills; Dierks Lumber Company, Melville Lumber Company, Central Granaries Company, Farmers' Elevator company; J. R. Kalar, doctor; Moore Brothers, Dennis & McMurtry, William Knight, Thomas Mahar, garages; M. C. Leonard, R. H. Miller, real estate; C. G. Empfield, J. E. Fodge, contractors; Anselmo Enterprise, R. H. Miller editor; Mrs. May Gibson, millinery.

POSTOFFICE HISTORY

master; it was located two miles north of Anselmo. In the spring of 1886 Joe Michele was appointed postmaster at Anselmo and the Wirt postoffice was discontinued.

With the different administrations of the government Anselmo's postmasters changed, and in the following order the local postal service was efficiently looked after by Hugh McKee, Harvey Said, Henry Kelley, Granville Adkins, George Williams, Henry Kelley, Roy Atkisson, B. C. Empfield, Fred Brechbuhl, and Patrick Leonard, the present postmaster.

TOWN IMPROVEMENTS

From the early beginning of Anselmo the people of the community were optimistic and determined, as was well represented by men who made life a success. The buildings in the beginning were of frame construction, neatly planned and well taken care of.

Anselmo has always been blessed with real "boosters"—men who had enough faith in the town to put their money back of their ideas—such men as Dorr Heffleman, William Moore, David Christen, Fred Brechbuhl.

Confident progressiveness has been manifested by the organizations of the Workmen and Masonic orders, Moore Brothers, F. C. Wilson, the community (in building the Community Hall) and others who had seen the bright side of an optimistic life.

A municipal water system was established and a voluntary fire department was organized in 1911. On April 21, 1913, Anselmo had its first electric lights installed, by Christen & Brechbuhl.

It may not come amiss here to mention the beginning of the Ford motor car in Custer county. On May 17, 1910, the firm of Moore Brothers made a contract with the Ford Motor Company and estimated forty cars for the Custer county territory. On May 26, 1910, they received their first shipment, and on the following Sunday they delivered the first car, to E. Knoell, of New Helena. Anselmo was also the beginning of the Dodge Brothers' production in Custer county, by Moore Brothers. This firm received the first Dodge car March 11, 1915. This car was sold May 12, 1915, to Jacob Geiser, of Sargent, who still owns it.

ANSELMO NEWSPAPERS

Anselmo very early in its existence had a newspaper, called the Sun, which illuminated the darkness that then prevailed. The first issue was from a tent, with S. I. Meseraull as its editor. J. H. Zerung, Ben Sanders, J. J. Tooley, and others tried their hands at making the Sun shine, but it eventually lost its luminary power, in 1890, causing a total eclipse, and was finally gathered into the bosom of whomsoever represents Abraham in the newspaper heaven.

The Enterprise was founded by B. C. Empfield and H. G. Campbell, and the first number made its appearance May 11, 1906. A few months after the establishment of the paper Mr. Empfield sold his interest to his partner, Mr. Campbell, who conducted its affairs until within one week of the close of the first volume, when he sold it to O. C. Anderson, who had been in the business of painting and paper-hanging in Anselmo for some time. He assumed charge with the issue of No. 52, volume 1, and conducted it for a little over two years, when he disposed of the plant and good will to Sherman Bly, of Hastings. Mr. Bly assumed charge with the issue of No. 10, volume 2, published July 10, 1908.

During this year the paper was increased to its present size, and with No. 50, volume 3, E. E. Philpot became the editor. He continued in charge of the paper until the first number of volume 7 was issued, when the paper was purchased by K. K. Smith, who issued his first paper under No. 2, volume 7, on May 10, 1912. After two and one-half years, C. M. Anderson became the owner and publisher. He remained in charge until August 1, 1917, when the business was sold to R. H. Miller, the present publisher.

In its initial number the editors announced the politics of the Enterprise as non-partisan, which, however, is not interpreted as being owned by a non-partisan league. The Enterprise has filled its niche as a paper for Anselmo and vicinity, and is enjoying the liberal patronage of the community.

ANSELMO FIGHTS THE KAISER

The American soldier and sailor of to-day stand in the public view as do no other individuals. Anselmo has contributed her share to the conflict. All honor to them! Men die for no better cause than theirs.

Those who have responded to the call of their country from Anselmo and vicinity are: Adlai and Elwyn Johnson, Ed. Baird, Walter Smith, Ervin Miller, Hubert Wilson, Harry Frye, Albert Campfield, Harold Kepler, Oak Kepler, Ora Dennis, Joe Wanischke, Walter Spooner, Ray Ross, Ralph Lewis, Fred Carr, Scott Winchester, Ray Adams, Nay Dishman, Russell Lehmanowski, Frank Crist, Davis Crist, Henry Cain, Dr. C. L. Wills, Lawrence Ray, George Spelts, Martin Gallington, Willard Mayfield, Talmage Smith, Ivan Province, Fred Hodapp, Shirley Parkison, and Peter Muys.

Few events in the history of Anselmo have been more inspiring than the zealous response to the appeal of the war fund, Red Cross, Young Men's Christian Association, and Knights of Columbus.

Anselmo has risen to the occasion magnanimously, gloriously. She has given sterling evidence not only of her patriotism, but also of power of organization, power of pushing a big thing through.

ANSELMO CHURCHES

Religion, the great bulwark of our ideal democracy, providing ever for the betterment of the masses, is represented by three denominations, namely: Methodist, Catholic, and Christian.

The Methodist church building was located in 1887, on a little knoll overlooking the town, with James Eads as pastor. The little building in a few years outgrew its usefulness, and in 1902 a modern structure was erected, on the corner of Dorr street and Foster avenue.

Long cherished hopes and ambitions were realized by the Catholic people of Anselmo and vicinity when, in 1905, St. Anselm's church was dedicated. Previously to this date the mission was attended, from Dale, by Father Flanagan. Rev. M. L. Daley succeeded Father Flanagan, and was successful in raising the money to build the church. Then came Rev. Father Donnelly, and during his administration the parsonage was built. He was succeeded by Rev. Thomas Minogue, the present pastor, who has built up the parish to one of the choicest in the Grand Island diocese and who enjoys the good will and esteem not only of his own congregation but also of the public at large.

ANSELMO FRATERNAL SOCIETIES

Social and fraternal orders had their beginning in Anselmo in the year 1895, when the Ancient Order of United Workmen was organized, on March 23, with Arthur P. Smith as master workman. Then followed Cedar Lodge, No. 185, Degree of Honor. The camp of Modern Woodmen of America was organized February 20, 1900, with Frank Britton, venerable counsel. The Modern Brotherhood of America was organized March 5, 1900. The Odd Fellows were organized on March 20, 1904, with M. J. Johnson as noble grand. The Masonic lodge was instituted June 7, 1905, with J. J. Tooley, master, and Chal Empfield, secretary. The Eastern Star was instituted May 8, 1907, Nettie Tooley, worthy matron. The Royal Neighbors was organized February 8, 1909. Woodmen of the World was organized June 27, 1913, Joseph C. Moore, counsel commander.

THE STORY OF OCONTO

Oconto is located on the Kearney & Black Hills branch of the Union Pacific Railroad, fifty-two miles from either end, thus making it the exact center of one of the most prosperous and best paying branches of the Union Pacific system. It is situated in the Wood River valley, known over the central United States as one of the most prosperous and fertile valleys to be found.

Oconto was located in the fall of 1887, by the Lincoln Townsite Company, which bought 160 acres of land, of Wallace Highbee, for that purpose. R. G. Crossett and a Mr. Johnson built the first general store, hauling the material from Plum Creek, now the town of Lexington, and the same building is now occupied by the Jones Drug Company. The next store building was moved from Lodi, being the pioneer building used as a store in this portion of Custer county, and having been built by John Moran, now postmaster of Callaway. This building was occupied by W. D. Cox as a general store. H. Bockman built the first hotel and Lewis Wambsgan built the first livery stable, which was run by Gottlieb Bensler. Mr. Crossett, at the same time, acted as first postmaster.

On April 25, 1905, Oconto was honored with the first edition of the Oconto Register, a paper started and edited here by Bryner Brothers, Fred and Walter, who conducted the paper for a few years, when Fred bought the interest of his brother Walter, who moved to Eddyville, purchasing the paper there. Fred edited the paper, and also acted as postmaster, until 1913, when he sold the newspaper plant and business to F. J. Dunn, of Callaway. Mr. Dunn manipulated the type for a couple of years, when he sold the paper to F. C. Ferguson, who was editor in chief until the fall of 1917, when he sold to Ashton Henderson, of Callaway. Mr. Henderson conducted the paper but a short time, when it was again sold, to the Queen Publishing Company, making it one of a line of papers owned by this company, along the Kearney & Black Hills branch of the Union Pacific Railroad. U. A. Brown was temporarily placed in charge as manager, but at the present time Fred Bryner, the original editor, is conducting the news-gathering.

Oconto has been given state-wide prominence by Orel Jones, of the Jones Drug Company, who has just closed a five years' term of service for the state, as a member of the state examining board in pharmacy, and this past year he was state delegate to the National Association of Boards of Pharmacy as well as to the national meeting of the American Pharmaceutical Association, whose meetings were held at Indianapolis, Indiana.

In the world-war crisis, Oconto went over the top in everything asked of it. In the stamp, bond, Red Cross, and other war activities it was to be found near the head of the column. It has been well represented in the fighting part, by about fifty of its best young men, and more were awaiting their call at the time when the historic armistice came. There has been maintained also a home guard organization of seventy-seven members, with G. Campau as captain.

Educationally, Oconto had one of the first schools in this part of Custer county. In 1909 a nice, four-room building was erected, only three of the rooms being occupied until 1913, when the fourth teacher was added. At the present time there is an accredited eleventh-grade high school, with Miss Georgina Tolbert as principal; Miss Helen Paine, grammar teacher; Miss Nellis O'Nele, intermediate; and Miss Allegra O'Nele, primary teacher.

Oconto has three churches. The Catholic church was the first to be established, in 1889, and Rev. Father Pedlock, of Kearney, officiated. At the present time Rev. Father Moynihan is pastor. The Episcopal church was organized in 1890, being supplied from Kearney. In April, 1901, a church building was completed and dedicated by the United Evangelical church, with Rev. B. Hillier, now presiding elder for this district, as one of the first pastors. The following pastors have served since then: Rev. J. H. Williams, four years; J. F. Hendricks, one year; H. S. Tool, four years; J. A. Lemming, one year; Frank Majors, one year; J. N. Melton, three years; and W. H. Garries is completing his first year.

At the present time Oconto is considered one of the best business towns in this part of the state, all classes of business being well represented by hustlers in their respective lines. Oconto has a doctor, a weekly paper, two well stocked drug stores, two restaurants, two banks, two lumber yards (which also handle coal), three garages, three well stocked general stores, two cream stations, two blacksmith shops, two implement dealers, a harness shop, two barber shops, electric lights, two elevators, and one of the most up-to-the-minute opera houses to be found.

THE SCHOOL SYSTEM IN SOD AND BRICK

The present-day school system of Custer county has long been heralded to the world as one of the best in the central west, and the facts bear out the reputation. No county in the state has made greater development or achieved such a signal success in forty years. The initial years were largely handicapped by conditions which must always prevail in a new country. There was no money for school purposes and the first districts had to resort to all kinds of schemes to secure any kind of school privileges.

The first school houses were built of sod, and from these the entire system has developed until to-day there are to be found in every town in the county great brick structures into which all grade-schools graduate fine classes of young Custerites. The road from sod to brick has been long and the toil of development sometimes irksome but the tireless efforts of the teachers and the sacrifice of the patrons have banished the "soddy" and ushered in the great, brick high school.

For the data which follow the present county superintendent of public instruction, C. T. Grimes, is to be given credit.

THE BEGINNING

The people of Custer county have always held the education of children in high regard, and the very first settlers gave the matter considerable attention. In the spring of 1874 Mr. and Mrs. E. D. Eubank settled in the unorganized territory which afterward became Custer county.

At that time there was neither school district nor school, but during the fall Mrs. Eubank brought this important matter before the settlers and they were delighted to have her organize and conduct a private school for them. She gives the following account of her experiences:

"We could not have a public school, because there were no funds. At last I concocted a plan. I would organize a neighborhood school. 'But where is your salary to come from?' my husband asked. I replied, 'I will teach without any stipulated salary. I will take what each feels he can give.' Accordingly I drew up a subscription paper and presented it to my neighbors. They were delighted. They had very little money, but there were vast herds of elk and many antelope and deer; the men were good marksmen, and killed many elk. So it came to pass that the most of my salary consisted of elk meat. This was in the winter of 1874-5. That fall, 1875, we built a kitchen of logs, and when it was completed I used it for a school-room. That was the first school in what is now Custer county."

About the same time the cause of education was attracting considerable attention along Victoria creek, in the community of New Helena. During the summer of 1876 a private school was taught by Miss Callie Dryden, in the home of Mrs. Forsythe. In order to secure a certificate, Miss Dryden would have to make a long and unhappy journey over to North Loup, in Valley county, where the superintendent, having supervision over the schools of this section, then resided. This the young lady refused to do. To overcome this inconvenience Judge Mathews, the sage of New Helena, evolved a new plan. He decided to conduct the examination himself. Accordingly he drew up his questions and submitted them to the teacher. She wrote her answers in the best manner she could, considering writing material to be had and other inconveniences. After she had completed her writing the Judge gathered up the answer papers and carried them to North Loup. He laid the case before the county superintendent, Oscar Babcock, who, after due consideration, decided that the case was very unusual, but nevertheless, the exigencies of the occasion demanded that the certificate should be issued, and it is altogether likely that no other Custer county certificate was ever issued in such manner. The next year the lady secured a regular certificate from Superintendent Eubank, and she was one of the first certificated teachers in Custer county. During the summer of 1878 was erected a splendid cedar-log building which for several years served the people as an educational and social center. This building is still standing.

DISTRICTS ORGANIZED

In the fall of 1877 E. D. Eubank, the first superintendent of Custer county, was elected and for four years he was busy organizing new districts and re-arranging boundary lines to meet the rapidly changing centers of population. During his term of four years he formed twenty-seven school districts.

Early in the administration, petitions were received from the people of what are now districts No. 1 and No. 2. No. 2 was the first presented, but a remonstrance was filed against the formation of the district and action on it was deferred. Later, the objections were finally withdrawn, but not until after another petition had been presented, and thus it came about that the first petition presented resulted in the establishing of the second district by number, that is, No. 2.

District No. 3 was organized in 1880, covering the greater part of the southwest quarter of the county and comprising 900 square miles of territory, but before this organization was effected Alfred Schreyer taught a term of school in an upstairs room in the home of David Sprouse. The next year a sod house was built, and for many years it was the seat of attraction for almost every kind of public entertainment, from preaching and Sunday school on down to political meetings and general elections.

Before the close of the year 1881, districts Nos. 23, 26, 27, 34, and 42 were carved out of this territory, and within a short time thereafter Nos. 73, 88, 89, and 102 further reduced the size. Before the close of the year 1885, Nos. 106 and 113 were cut off, and so the territory of this district continued to be divided and subdivided until nearly a hundred schools are now being supported within the limits of what once was district No. 3.

About the year 1882 settlers came into the county in great numbers, and educational affairs became very interesting. Schools were established in almost every part of the county. D. M. Amsberry, superintendent from 1882 to 1888, organized more than 160 districts, and changed the boundaries in many places.

The first teachers' examination ever held in Broken Bow was conducted by Superintendent Amsberry, on the third Saturday in January, 1882. Miss Raymond was the only person taking the test.

FIRST COUNTY INSTITUTE

During the month of August, 1882, Mr. Amsberry organized and conducted the first county institute for the county. It was held in a wareroom of the lumber yard at Westerville. Only a few teachers were in attendance and the superintendent was his own general manager, instructor, and conductor of the whole affair. The next year he changed his place for holding the institute, called it for Broken Bow and held it in the room now occupied by the Custer County Chief. He secured the assistance of several experienced instructors and laid the foundation of what has come to be one of the important factors in the educational system of Custer county—the teachers' institute.

THE MASON CITY SCHOOLS

The following description of the Mason City schools, written by M. M. Warrington, will give a suggestive idea of the varying scenes and changes through which most of our graded schools passed—from the little sod shanty to the splendidly built and well equipped institutions of learning that adorn all of our towns.

"The town of Mason City was started in April, 1886, and continued to grow in rather an apathetic manner until the arrival of the railroad, in July of that year, and then things went on with a boom.

"Among the things to be provided were school facilities. The only building in the way of a schoolhouse in sight was one of sod, north of Muddy creek, near town, which was the schoolhouse of the district as it was then formed.

"Henry M. Kidder, a young attorney who had cast his fortunes with the embryo city, was employed to teach the fall term of school, which was attended by the boys and girls from the town. The population of the town grew so rapidly in the fall months that the winter term of school was held in a sod house north of the railroad track, near where the railroad section-house now stands. Miss Lincoln Groat was the teacher, this term being under the old district arrangement.

"School district No. 169, the Mason City district, was organized in March, 1887, by electing John A. Hall director, C. H. Coricks moderator, and Mrs. Ellen O. Gates treasurer. The lady finally refused to qualify, and Judson C. Porter was appointed treasurer in her place. J. J. Tooley, now secretary of the state banking board, was elected teacher, which position he held for three years. The first term of school was held in a store building which had been moved from old Algernon. The second school year another teacher for the primary department was added, in the person of Mrs. J. H. Kerr.

"The red-brick schoolhouse, of two rooms, was built in the summer of 1888. This building was partially destroyed by a cyclone on July 2, 1892. One story of it was rebuilt that year, and a vacant store-room rented for the primary department. This arrangement continued for two years, when an additional frame structure of two rooms was built. The present two-story-and-basement school building was erected in 1905. The first high-school work done in the Mason City schools was under the superintendence of J. H. Hays, in 1895 and 1896, when the first class was graduated. Now seven teachers are employed in the Mason City schools, and the schools occupy a prominent place among the other good schools of Custer county."

BROKEN BOW

Broken Bow school district was the twenty-fifth district to be formed within the county. It came into existence during the last part of the closing years of Superintendent E. D. Eubank's term of office. The first school was taught in the spring of 1881, by Mrs. Martha E. Lewis, wife of Moses Lewis, who resided on his homestead a mile east of the north part of the city. Since her three boys, John, Amos, and George, constituted the greater part of her pupils, the school was taught in her sod house. In the fall the school was moved to a sod shanty located a block north of where the Grand Central hotel now stands.

The school site had previously been located a mile or more from town, and to remedy this inconvenience, the director, C. D. Pelham, called a meeting of the district, at the post-office in Broken Bow. The site was placed where the South Side school now stands and in the next year a new house was put up. In the meantime school was held in a frame store-room on the southwest corner of block No. 2 of the original townsite. In 1885 a new frame building was put up in the southeast part of town, but this was abandoned when the North ward school was formed. During the year 1888 the present South ward building was erected, and it was not until January 1, 1911, that the full, complete system, including the high school was established. The Broken Bow high school represents an outlay of about $50,000 and is not only the best in the county, but also one of the modern and well equipped high schools in this part of the state.

ANSLEY

The Ansley district was organized during the year 1888, with Miss Michael as teacher. Her school was composed of twelve pupils. The school population increased very rapidly, so that in 1890 a second, or primary, teacher was employed. It was not long until a larger building was required and this, after rapid succession, was supplanted by the present beautiful, brick structure, erected at a cost of $27,000, with an equipment valued at $8,000. The district employs ten teachers, carries a course of twelve grades, is accredited as a normal training high school, and has an enrollment of about 300 pupils. The personnel of the present school board is as follows: A. F. Pinkley, president; E. P. Gaines, secretary; J. T. McGowan, treasurer; and H. D. Reed, D. P. Scott, and E. O. Morris. Professor Clem Wilder has been engaged as the superintendent for the year 1918-19.

ANSELMO

The Anselmo district came with the busy times between 1884 and 1887, with J. A. Homis teaching the "young idea how to shoot." He carried on his work in the Methodist church. In 1888 a two-room building was put up and two teachers were employed. This number of teachers was found adequate to the needs of the district until 1905, when a third was found necessary.

The present beautiful, brick schoolhouse was erected in 1916, at an expense of $11,000, four teachers being employed and eleven grades introduced. That same year the school was organized as a high-school district. The school equipment is valued at $7,000, five teachers are employed, and more than 150 pupils are enrolled. Already the building has come to be too small for the accommodation of the rapidly increasing school population, and the people are beginning to plan for an addition to their educational plant.

No community in the county has shown a greater interest in school affairs than that manifested at Arnold. The district was found necessary during the early '80s, but because of the lack of railroad communication with other points, the school population did not increase very rapidly. In 1911 two teachers were introduced and an attempt at high-school work was begun. Progress was made so rapidly that by the fall of 1915 it was found possible to open the school in a most beautiful, convenient, and commodious brick structure that had cost, including equipment, the goodly sum of $25,000.

The district is accredited for high-school purposes, and eleventh-grade work is given. Six teachers are employed. Like many other school plants in Custer county, this one has become inadequate and before many years will have to be enlarged.

CALLAWAY

During the closing year of Mr. Amsberry's term of office, the Callaway high-school district was organized. It was one of the hundred or more to be carved out of the original and interesting district No. 3. The first building was greatly impaired, and a second was erected in its stead. Not only was this structure found to be too small, but the location proved unsatisfactory, hence, in 1906, the present site was secured and new building erected, at a cost of practically $30,000 for the entire plant. The school grounds are ample, and are well provided with trees and shrubbery, thus giving a very attractive appearance.

The school maintains eleven grades, employs seven teachers, and has enrolled as many as 325 students.

COMSTOCK

District No. 28, including the village of Comstock, was the first to be organized by Superintendent Amsberry in the early part of the year 1882, and Mrs. Ida Strop was installed as teacher. Her school was made up of ten or twelve pupils, varying in age from five to twelve years. For some time the school did not grow very fast, and not until 1907 or 1908 was any attempt made at organizing a high school. From 1911 to the present time a good eleven-grade school has been maintained. There are six teachers, with 155 pupils. The present building was erected in 1905 and with furniture, grounds, and fixtures represents an investment of $10,000.

SARGENT.

Sargent not only has a very progressive people, with enthusiasm for the education of the youth of the community, but also one of the most beautiful, convenient, and expensive school equipments in Custer county. The district was organized in 1884, with Mrs. A. R. Humphrey as teacher. Twenty-five pupils engaged her attention.

In 1897 a second teacher was found to be necessary, and from that time the school has increased in enrollment and grown in importance. In 1914 the school site was changed and a new house was erected, at a cost, including furnishings, of about $30,000.

The school carries twelve grades and is fully accredited to the State University. It is also accredited for high-school purposes. The school requires and employs ten teachers.

OCONTO

The Oconto district was one of the last graded schools to be established. Originally the territory of this district was a part of district No. 34, but in 1896 the people from the country turned out at the school meeting in a body and voted to move the schoolhouse out of the village and to locate it more than a mile in the country. This so much displeased the villagers that they immediately petitioned the county superintendent to detach a part of the territory and form the present district No. 256.

One teacher was employed until 1908, when a second teacher was engaged. During the year 1909 the present building was erected and a third teacher was added to the corps of instructors. The school now employs four teachers, gives eleven grades of training and enrolls 120 pupils.

MERNA

The Merna district seems to have been named after a previously discontinued district. In the early days cattlemen had a custom of organizing large tracts of land into school districts. They invariably chose territory on which very few, if any, settlers lived, so that a school would not be needed. Two purposes were accomplished by this plan. First, it avoided the school tax and, second, it prevented the annexation of unorganized territory to other organized districts for school taxation. In the course of time the county superintendent would discover that the district existed only in name and he would give some new district that number. This, it seems was the case with district No. 15. However, in 1884, there being a school population of more than twenty pupils within the community, the county superintendent granted the petition that added the Merna district to the list of schools. Miss Affie Gordon was the first teacher and twenty-five pupils were enrolled.

In 1905, a high-school, with four teachers, was supported. Three years later the present building was put up, at an expense of $25,000. Nine teachers are employed and 193 pupils are attending school.

JAYNESVILLE

District No. 33 has been constantly in the lime light since the year 1914, and has been written and talked about a great deal. Many magazines, including the Ladies' Home Journal and practically every farm paper in the United States, have written articles about this school. The picture of the building and a depiction of its floor plans have been printed in many publications. The plant was erected in 1915, at a cost of about $4,500. It has a teacherage, a barn, and a complete equipment. Two teachers are employed and ten grades are taught.

BERWYN

When the state rural-school inspector visited Berwin in 1916, he was quite generous in his commendations of the Berwyn school property, which he declared to be one of the best three-teacher buildings he had ever seen. When completed the entire plant cost about $7,000. It stands on an elevated plat of ground and faces down the main street of the village.

Considering the fact that the school district is very small and the village itself has just recently begun to grow, the people deserve to be given great credit for their school. A good ten-grade course is given and the teachers have been unusually strong in their work.

LOWER LODI

Unfortunately the Lodi community has two schools where one could well supply all the needed school advantages, thus dividing the interest and needed success. District No. 73 has for the past three years employed two teachers and maintained a good ten-grade school. The people are interested in such affairs and are looking forward to a better school condition. Ten grades are maintained and successful work is being done in each.

DISTRICT NO. NINETY-SEVEN

Nine miles northeast of Broken Bow another ten-grade, two-teacher school is maintained. It was opened in September, 1917, is growing in popularity, and the number of attendants is increasing. Grades nine and eleven are open to students.

KING

District No. 32 is an interesting two-teacher school, organized in 1917. It is located in the valley of Muddy creek, about seven miles southeast of Broken Bow. The people are enthusiastic over their new building and the results of their efforts. The building is well equipped and the grounds contain numerous new playground devices. The ten-grade work usually done in such schools is being accomplished.

HOOSIER VALLEY

In the sand-hill region of Custer county has lately been organized what is known as the "Hoosier Valley High School." It was formed by combining districts Nos. 210, 252, and 262. It is composed of fifty sections and has about ten miles of railroad to help defray the expense of the school. When completed the plant will comprise a two-room school, with a teachers' residence, a good well, and a barn. This will be the first school of the kind in the county and its progress will be watched with interest.

LONGWOOD

The Longwood school is especially interesting because of its splendid building and grounds. It is the best equipped one-teacher school in the county and one of the best of its kind in the state. The building has a large school-room, a porch, a vestibule, a cloak-room, library, dinner room, and a full basement, which is reached either through the dinner room or from an outside entrance. This plant is standard as to light, heat, and ventilation. The entire plant is valued at $3,000. A good salary is paid the teacher and, of course, none but a good teacher is ever secured.

SAND VALLEY

About seven miles southwest of Callaway, in a beautiful community known as Sand Valley, is found a very successfully conducted ten-grade school. It is district No. 95. It came into usefulness with the rush of school organizations between the years 1882 and 1888. This school is well located and well equipped, with two pleasant rooms, so arranged that they may be thrown together, thus forming a large assembly room. It is well lighted and heated. Trees have been planted and a splendid well, with a windmill, adds to the advantages. There is a barn for horses and a large yard for carriages. The course covers ten grades.

IN GENERAL

For the last five or six years the school sentiment of the county has grown to a very high order. Nearly all of the schools have good, comfortable houses which are well kept. More than 150 room-furnaces are in use and a half hundred wells give good drinking water. The teachers are earnest, progressive, and thorough; the children are interested and happy, and the patrons are earnestly endeavoring to bring the Custer county schools up to the realization of what they should be — "Things of beauty and a joy forever."

Governor Bradley once said that at the end of every buffalo's tail was a Methodist preacher going west. That was a fine tribute to the pioneer work of the Methodist people. It is a tribute, too, that they deserve in connection with Custer county, as subsequent history of Methodism in the county will disclose.

But on the Middle Loup at least one buffalo's tail was ornamented with a Christian preacher instead of a Methodist, and that animal seems to have led the herd, for the preacher referred to, the Rev. E. D. Eubanks, was probably the first preacher in the county and the one who preached the first sermon and performed the first marriage ceremony.

In 1875 Rev. Eubanks held services in different homes of the Douglas Grove community, and accordingly he was the first representative of his denomination, or of any denomination, to pre-empt the field for Christian work.

Also in the same year came a Methodist preacher, by the name of Lemin, and held the first Methodist services of which any record can be found. Rev. Lemin, like Rev. Eubanks, made the homes of the people the sanctuaries of worship. It was in the home of A. A. Higgins that the first Methodist quarterly meeting was held by the pioneer divine. Rev. Lemin is, therefore, credited with beginning Methodist work some time late in the fall of 1875.

As will be seen under the head of Baptist Pioneer Work, a Rev. J. P. Cook began the denominational work for the Baptists by holding services and conducting Sunday schools in the settlers' homes of Lee's Park, in 1878.

In 1880 a minister from West Virginia settled in the New Helena district and, like the other pioneer preachers, began a series of house meetings. His denomination is not recorded by the historian who chronicles his advent in the country, but as the work he began was followed up by that of a Presbyterian minister, L. L. Burbank, who came afterward, the work of the Rev. Stevens is accredited to the Presbyterians.

This puts the denominational work of the churches in Custer county in the following order: First, Christians or Disciples; second, Methodists; third, Baptists; fourth, Presbyterians. Other denominations early on the field were the United Brethren, the Lutherans, the Catholics, the Church of God, the Free Methodists, and perhaps others were among the pioneers, but their advent did not affect the order named above.

A COWBOY PREACHER

One of the pioneer preachers who seems to have been effective and practical in his work, even if he was lacking in theological training, is described by James Whitehead as a cowboy preacher, in the following paragraph, written twenty years ago. He is not credited with any denominational affiliation:

"Although most of us had held membership in different churches in our former homes, no minister of any denomination had come among us, and no preaching services had been held in that vicinity. With the erection of a schoolhouse we were anxious to make amends for this apparent neglect and begin life aright in our new home. Mr. Crewdson, who was an Episcopalian, assured us he had a man in mind that could be secured, and soon thereafter services were announced with Rev. L. G. Brooker, 'The Cowboy Preacher,' officiating; owing to reports that had reached us relative to the man's past, great interest was attached to this first sermon. The Rev. Brooker, or 'Brooker,' as he was commonly called, was a character as unique, and possessed a personality as striking as in their day did Lorenzo Dow or Peter Cartwright. He owned and lived upon a farm in Platte valley, twenty-two miles to the south, had been converted some four years before, and became so strongly imbued with the conviction that he was 'divinely called' to preach that he could find neither rest nor peace until he had consecrated himself to the ministry. Ordained by the Evangelical Association, he had been engaged in the work about three years when, in the fall of 1885, he preached his first sermon on Buffalo Table. It was the first religious service or meeting that some who were there had attended in two years. His efforts were well received and in due time he made fortnightly appointments, which, in connection with other points, he continued to fill for three years. As an evangelist and organizer this unlettered Bonarges had but few equals, and, measured by results, he attained a success denied to many whose entire lives had been devoted to the study of theology and rhetoric."

A STORY OF EARLY CHURCH WORK

The late E. N. Bishop leaves us this story, in which early church work is graphically pictured:

"Early in the spring of 1880 a preacher from Harper's Ferry, West Virginia, named Stephenson, took the claim now owned by Robert Ross and commenced preaching at New Helena, but as he tired of keeping 'bach,' he returned east and left the people without a minister. Learning that a Presbyterian minister of the name of Burbank, living at Georgetown, on the South Loup, could be procured to preach once a month, the people of all denominations interested sent for him. He came, organized a Presbyterian church, and preached about two years, or until the Methodists made arrangements to start a class which included this appointment, on the Westerville circuit, with preaching every two weeks. Some years later, I have forgotten the date, a preacher of the name of Ross, living in Indiana, offered to come to Broken Bow if the church there would pay his fare to Grand Island. As Broken Bow was not able to support a preacher at that time, the class at Gates united with them and helped to pay the passage of the Indiana preacher to Grand Island. He came, reorganized the class and preached in the old sod schoolhouse, near where the Gates schoolhouse stands at this time. Since that time this church has always maintained an organization and Sunday school, even keeping a minister during all the years of the drouth. About 1888 the Christian church organized a society at the White Pigeon schoolhouse, and have maintained it ever since, as have also the Free Methodists at the Oxford schoolhouse and the Lutherans at Round Valley. In the fall of 1880 A. N. Peale taught a three months' school in district number 13, now generally known as the Oxford district. As this was the first and only school within fourteen miles, the children either went to it or went fishing. During the first years of our settlement the ranchmen and new settlers consumed everything the farmers could raise, but when farming became more general and on a larger scale, and new settlers ceased to come in so fast, the farmers commenced to raise hogs to consume their produce; consequently when the fall of 1890 came, the country was full of hogs. Having no corn to feed them, some of the farmers sold their stock hogs to eastern feeders, some knocked them in the head, while others let them stand around and squeal. Under these conditions church work had a hard beginning."

AND NOW THE METHODISTS

The Methodists now cover the county with ten circuits or stations, the headquarters of which are located in Ansley, Arnold, Anselmo, Berwyn, Broken Bow, Callaway, Mason City, Sargent, Merna, and Westerville.

The denomination owns fifteen church buildings, valued at $60,000. Two of them, the Sargent and Arnold buildings, are modern brick edifices, of the latest type, and would do splendid credit to much older communities. There are ten parsonages now in the county, all for the most part modern cottages, which as many Methodist preachers with their families occupy. These parsonages are valued at $20,000. The ten pastors receive good salaries and the churches have a combined membership of 1,856, with a family constituency of approximately 3,600 persons.

THE ANSLEY CHURCH

Prior to the founding of Ansley, Methodist itinerants rode over the hills and valleys, preaching in schoolhouses and homes. One of these men was Rev. J. C. Dorris. In September, 1886, Rev. William Esplin, who was homesteading seven miles southwest of Ansley, was appointed as the first regularly located pastor of the Methodist body of Ansley and vicinity, and preached alternately at Pleasant Valley and at this point. At first, services were held in the new Burlington depot, but when the Presbyterian church was built, the services were held there. The church was organized July 12, 1887, and in 1890, under the pastorate of Rev. D. M. Ellsworth, the present church building was erected. The pastors who have served this church up to 1918 are as follows: William Esplin (1886-7), Francis Brock (1887-8), D. M. Ellsworth (1888-90), H. H. York (1890-1891), B. F. Peck (1891-2), John P. Crane and D. W. Denny (1892-3), L. W. Chandler (1893-5), A. Gibson (1895-7), W. H. Forsyth (1897-1900), M. S. Foutch (1900-1901), L. W. Chandler (1901-3), Selden Ewing (1903-5), Raymond Rush (1905-8), John Carton (1908-9), W. S. McCallester (1909-1914), R. H. Carr (1914-15), E. O. Johnson (1915-16), W. L. Hadsell (1916-18). Under the pastorate of Rev. O. E. Johnson, the church building was greatly improved, by the addition of a basement. The church now has a membership of 200, a Sunday-school enrollment of 180, an Epworth League membership of thirty, and a Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of twenty members. The officers of the church are: Trustees, J. H. Hiser, T. F. Elliott, Albert Arnold, E. O. Morris, W. O. Phillips, Andrew Sherbeck, and A. J. Hockom; stewards, L. S. Newcomb, Mrs. George Nelms, O. D. Dran, Mrs. Clem Wilder, Mrs. A. J. Hockom, and R. M. Hayslip; Sunday-school superintendent, L. S. Newcomb; president of the Epworth League, Mrs. Curtis McCallister; president of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, Mrs. L. S. Newcomb.

The first Methodist class was organized in the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy depot, July 12, 1887, by the Rev. William Esplin. Nineteen charter members formed the roll of this new class. The names of these members are as follows: Mrs. D. A. Vasant, C. J. Stevens, W. A. Cross, T. T. Daniels, James Davis, Mrs. James Davis, William Hawk, Sarah Gilbert, Anna Hawk, May Hawk, J. Harson, Mrs. J. Harson, Mary McCarger, J. M. Porter, Mrs. J. M. Porter, and C. D. Munson and family.

THE BROKEN BOW METHODISTS

Broken Bow has always been the county's stronghold of Methodism. The first Methodist church of the county-seat town is one of the strongest churches in the county, of any denomination. It was organized in May, 1883. In the same month of the class organization, the first sermon was preached by Rev. M. R. Pierce, in a store building. The following were the charter members of the class: W. A. Gandy, A. M. Graham, Howard Graham, L. McCandless, J. S. Benjamin, John Roland, L. Trefren, Emma McCandless, Bertha Gandy, H. J. Reeder, Wesley Vannice, W. M. Herbert, and L. H. Jewett.

Since the organization of this class, services have been maintained without any interruption, and in later years, with added strength of numbers in the membership, came added influence and prominence in the community.

The pastors of this church began life in a two-room sod parsonage and in this palace of "prairie marble" many couples were united in marriage and started on their careers as pioneer home-makers. Many social functions held sway in the neat rooms of this sod bungalow.

In 1883, the same year of the organization, a small, brick church was erected in the south part of town, and this did duty as Methodist sanctuary and community auditorium until 1898, when the present structure, on the block west of the court house, was erected, under the direction of the Rev. W. H. D. Hornaday. This structure is still in good repair and its auditorium is the largest in the town. It was built at a cost of seven thousand dollars.

The second parsonage, and the one which supplanted the pioneer soddy, was erected in 1886, during the pastorate of the Rev. F. H. Calder. This dwelling was afterward outgrown, and the third parsonage was erected in 1902, during the first pastorate of the Rev. George P. Trites, who is to-day closing the second year of his second pastorate. Two years ago (1916) the parsonage was again remodeled, and was made thoroughly modern. The present membership of this church is between three and four hundred. They maintain a live Sunday-school, ladies' society, and all missionary societies working in connection with Methodist polity.

In the roster of pastors who have served this church are many of the strongest Methodist preachers of the state, among whom are R. H. Thompson, A. A. Randall, and the present incumbent, the Rev. George P. Trites, who is a strong man in the pulpit, a faithful pastor, and who, withal, belongs to that class of genial spirits commonly called "good mixers."

GATES AND WALWORTH

Gates and Walworth are country churches. They were intended to be city churches, but the respective cities of Gates and Walworth have been slow to materialize; consequently, the churches stand in country places, each beside a lone store and postoffice.

The first Methodist service at Gates was held in the sod house of Stillman Gates, who was one of the river pioneers. This service was conducted by Rev. M. R. Pierce, in 1884. The class was organized the same year, with nine charter members: Mr. and Mrs. Stillman Gates, Mr. and Mrs. R. Young, Mr. and Mrs. Ed. Bishop, Mr. and Mrs. W. M. Herbert, and Will Athey.

The present church building was erected during the pastorate of the Rev. J. M. Eads, in 1905. The pastoral work at this point is supplied from Anselmo.

John W. Cole, whether a reverend or not, is not recorded, held the first Methodist service in Walworth, in 1881, in the home of John Walker. A Sunday school was organized in the same year. There were but few charter members who constituted the first class. Only the names of Mr. and Mrs. John Predmore and Mr. and Mrs. John Walker are recorded. The present church building was erected in 1907.

ARNOLD METHODIST CHURCH

One of the best Methodist churches in the county is the Arnold church, concerning which no data have been obtainable. It is the strongest church of the community and has a corps of stalwart supporters. They have a fine, new church, built in the year 1915, during the pastorate of Rev. Mr. Gettys. The church has been served in the past by such men as Rev. George B. Mayfield, Rev. Charles Bottom, and others.

SARGENT METHODISTS

The Methodists were among the first on the ground at Sargent, yet little data are obtainable. They commenced with a very few members and have steadily grown until to-day they really have the best church property of any church of their denomination in the county. Herewith is submitted a splendid picture of the church, which was built a few years ago.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH AT ARNOLD

MERNA METHODISTS

A splendid little church has been maintained by the Methodists of Merna since 1885. The first sermon of this denomination was preached by the Rev. John F. Haney, who is today a resident of Broken Bow. The first class was organized by Henry Reeder. The present church building was built in 1901, by the Rev. W. C. Swartz. It is a small, four-gabled building, with class-room attachments, and makes a very neat appearance, in its location on the principal street of Merna. The attractive five-room parsonage was built in 1909.

The phenomenal success of the Methodists is largely due to their pioneer work. They never neglected the sparsely settled country. Wherever they could find a Methodist home, there they had a Methodist sanctuary. And if a "circuit-rider," a "local exhorter," or "class leader" could be procured, a Methodist service was held, a Methodist Sunday school organized, and Christian work commenced in that community.

WESTERVILLE METHODIST CHURCH

The date of the Westerville organization is not given in any record at hand, but it was effected some time in the early '80s and was one of the first churches in the county. Mrs. Floy Leech Cannon, who wrote the Westerville story in 1900, makes the statement that the Westerville Methodist church was the first frame church-building erected in the county. The church bell, which was placed in the belfry, was the first church bell that ever rang out upon Custer county air. It was freighted from Kearney, and its Sunday morning performances gave the Westerville church a citified air of unusual dignity. Mrs. Cannon also makes the statement that a Rev. Mr. Brooks was the first regular minister and that Rev. Mr. Hale, of the Orleans district in western Nebraska, was one of their early pastors. The church to-day is prosperous, and maintains regular services, with Rev. Mr. Gettys in charge.

METHODIST CHURCH OF CALLAWAY

In the early winter of 1880-81 Rev. Asbury Collins, one of the bold pioneer preachers whose labors are known throughout the whole of western Nebraska, preached the first sermon in or near the settlement of Delight. This service was held in the sod schoolhouse, which stood at the foot of the hill, one mile west of the present site of Callaway. At Mr. Collins' next appointment, which was probably in January, 1881, he organized a society of the Methodist Episcopal church, with nine members, four of whom lived in the immediate neighborhood, the remaining five coming as far as ten miles from their homes in Wood River valley. Mark H. Deems was appointed class-leader, which office in the church he held until he moved away from Callaway. Mr. Collins' work was principally organizing new churches and forming new circuits, and he came to Delight only once a month during the spring and summer following the organization of the church. In the summer of 1881 Rev. Charles H. Savidge, a local preacher from Wisconsin, came into the community and lived with his son at the Cottonwood ranch, about three miles from Delight postoffice. Because of his own heavy work, Mr. Collins placed the church at Delight in the hands of Mr. Savidge, who preached regularly for over two years.

In the fall of 1884 the church received, for the first time, a minister regularly appointed by the annual conference — Rev. D. M. Ellsworth, who had just come from Illinois. Mr. Ellsworth had shipped his goods to Kearney, where the conference was held that year. In order to have a home for his family, he filed a homestead on a quarter-section of land and put up a little house. The preaching places in the circuit were Delight, Roten Valley, and Cliff. There had been a gradual increase in the membership, and after a protracted meeting, held in a sod schoolhouse, in the winter of 1884-5, the membership was thirty-five. The salary paid this year was $340, to which was added $125 from the missionary society of the church. In the summer of 1885, the people united in building a neat sod church, on the timber claim of Ira Graves, not far from the sod schoolhouse where they had heretofore worshipped. The trustees were Ira Graves, Mark H. Deems, I. F. Miller, O. C. Murphy, and William Engels, who were elected by the quarterly conference July 18th. The lumber for the roof and floor of the new church was hauled from Cozad, a distance of forty miles, and the chairs for seating from Plum Creek, now Lexington. The church was dedicated in November following, Rev. George W. Martin, presiding elder. During this year Arnold was added to the Delight circuit.

When the town of Callaway was laid out, in the summer of 1886, the services were moved from the church, which was nearly a mile out, to the dining room of the Deems hotel, then in course of erection. After the hotel was completed and occupied, the church services were held in Smith's hall, over a hardware store owned by Smith & Needham. This hall was commonly known as the "Callaway Opera House." For its use the church paid two dollars each Sunday and the same amount for each prayer meeting or extra service.

Rev. Thomas H. Thurber was the next pastor, coming to the charge in the fall of 1886. His family made their home in a sod house belonging to Mark H. Deems and reserved by him when he sold his homestead for the town-site. Mr. Thurber himself was "holding down" a claim in Dawson county, and so moved his family back to the claim in the spring, where they remained until he made final proof, in the fall. Mr. Thurber was re-appointed for another year, and immediately after his return from conference, the people commenced the building of the first frame church in the town of Callaway. The building cost $1,000 and was considered at that time quite an undertaking, but the trustees and members were determined in their efforts and the people of the community responded generously. The church was dedicated December 4, 1887, by Rev. Leslie Stevens, at that time presiding elder. Only $300 yet remained unpaid, but to those who had already contributed all they felt able, it seemed like attempting the impossible to try to raise that amount. Unwilling to fail at the last moment, eight men agreed together to give each twenty-five dollars more, and when the call was made and these eight in succession subscribed so liberally, others also responded, and in a few minutes the whole amount was raised. After returning from their homestead, the pastor's family had occupied a single room over one of the stores in the town, for which they had to pay twelve dollars per month, and it was not difficult to see that a parsonage was an actual necessity. Accordingly, as soon as the church was completed, the trustees took shares in the building and loan association and immediately commenced work on the parsonage. It was completed in February, 1888, and from that time a good home — small, but cozy and comfortable — has been ready for the Methodist minister and his family. The securing of a church building and parsonage may be considered as closing the pioneer history of the Methodist church of Callaway, and, having laid aside its swaddling clothes, it has had only the ordinary experience of a church — hardships, opposition, and varying degrees of success — important in themselves but not of sufficient interest for a pioneer history.

BAPTIST PIONEER WORK

The following facts and data concerning the inception and progress of Baptist work in Custer county have been furnished by Mrs. J. H. Kerr, of Ansley, who for a number of years, has been the clerk of the Baptist Association.

The first work inaugurated by the Baptists in the early days, when pioneers were struggling with the conditions incident to all new countries, was the holding of intermittent services in Lee's Park, by Rev. J. P. Cook, an aged Baptist minister, familiarly called Father Cook. Father Cook was a scholarly man, with a theological training, and during his early ministry held some very important pulpits. He homesteaded on the Middle Loup in the spring of 1878, and, following his natural inclination for missionary work, gathered the settlers together in some available home, and held preaching services and maintained Sunday school work. His work in Lee's Park resulted later in the organization of a small Baptist church, which held together for a few years, but in the process of western moving and shifting, the constituent members moved to other localities and the church was short-lived.

The second Baptist minister to adopt Custer county as a missionary field was the Rev. Amos Weaver, who preached his first Custer county sermon in the fall of 1880, in the home of Mr. and Mrs. D. M. Amsberry, on the Muddy creek. Rev. Weaver, too, was a missionary man and was then engaged in western missionary work with his field of labor mostly in Valley county. During the last session of the Baptist Association, held June 28-30, 1918, at Mason City, the announcement of his death, which occurred only a few weeks before, was made. The association interrupted its business and caused a tribute to be paid to his life and character, besides ordering a fitting resolution of respect to be incorporated in the associational minutes.

The Baptists were the third denomination to begin work in the county, and since the inception of church organization, in 1881, nineteen Baptist churches have been organized within the limits of the county. These have had a more or less checkered career. Out of the nineteen, only eleven survive until this present time. In the eight dead churches, like in the seven churches of Asia, there was much to commend. Their work is done, and the workers, for the most part, have transferred their Christian activities to other fields. Among the churches that were, and now are not, is the Baptist church of Clear Creek, which was organized some time late in 1881, by Rev. I. D. Fleming. This was the third church organized in the county. It survived but a few years. W. T. Powers, then of Westerville, was the church clerk. The second in this list of deceased churches was the Oconto Baptist church, organized in 1884, by Rev. J. E. Ingham, assisted by B. W. Southwell, of Gibbon, and Mark King, of Broken Bow. I. H. Edmisten was the first clerk of the Oconto church. Rev. J. W. Osborn, a general missionary, preached the first Baptist sermon in Oconto. The Oconto church lasted five years. No building was ever erected, and since 1889 no Baptist work has been maintained.

Lee's Park church was organized probably in 1888, but we have no records or information concerning its organization. It was admitted into the association in 1889, and probably passed out of existence without ever having a settled pastor.

Ash Grove Baptist church, Dale Valley Baptist church, and Ortello Baptist church, have likewise a paucity of recorded history. We know but little concerning them. The Ortello church seems to have died the same year the Dale church was born, but removals soon disbanded the Dale church. Of the Ash Grove church there are absolutely no available records concerning its work, other than it died in 1894.

Some time in 1887 Rev. William Elliot organized a church known as the Union Valley Baptist church, eight or nine miles south and west of the present site of Broken Bow. This church flourished for a little season. Within the year 1888 they built a sod meeting-house and they maintained for some time community services. There is no record that they ever had a settled pastor. J. Q. Daggett, who was then a regularly ordained Baptist minister, preached for them and did considerable pastoral work. The following year, 1889, the little church encountered the difficulties of a changing, shifting population, and after a few of the stalwart leaders moved away, the few remaining members disbanded.

In 1894 a church was organized at Spring Creek, with Rev. D. S. Hulbert, pastor. That is all the record that is obtainable of the Spring Creek organization.

THE BAPTIST CHURCHES THAT LIVE

The Baptists of Custer county now maintain eleven live and more or less prosperous churches. All of them, with one exception, have buildings adequate to their needs. They have seven parsonages, located as follows: Lomax, Arnold, Merna, Broken Bow (two), Ansley, and Mason City. This parsonage property is worth approximately $12,000.

Ever since 1884 an associational organization, made up of delegates from the various churches named, has been maintained. The first session was held in Broken Bow October 24, 1884. Five churches were represented in that meeting, namely: Broken Bow, Oak Springs (now Mason City), Clear Creek, Oconto, and Merna. The late Edmund King, of Broken Bow, was elected moderator and J. H. Edmisten of Oconto, was elected clerk. Since that time, without any interruptions, the association meetings have been held at some place where the delegates have been the guests of the entertaining church. For the last eighteen or twenty years, D. M. Amsberry, of Broken Bow, has served as moderator and Mrs. J. H. Kerr, of Ansley, has served as clerk.

THE BROKEN BOW CHURCH

The county seat being the metropolis, it naturally would be expected to have the strongest church, and in this expectations are realized. This was the first Baptist church organized in the county. The date of its organization was July 5, 1881. Lucky or unlucky, there were thirteen charter members — Edmund King, Emily King, Mark King, Martha King, Cyrus King, Moses Lewis, Martha Lewis, Henry C. Reyner, Emma Reyner, Jacob Mauk, Catherine Mauk, Samuel A. Miller, and Laura Miller.

The church was organized by Rev. I. D. Fleming, who served as first pastor. In 1885 they erected a small but commodious building that met the needs of the little congregation in those days. In 1897 this building was remodeled, enlarged, and made more attractive. In 1887 this church built the first Baptist parsonage of the county, a building which still stands, on lower Broadway, and is owned by W. A. Tooley. A few years later, another parsonage was built, on the corner of Broadway and Tenth avenue, beside the remodeled church. This building is a five-room cottage, modernized, and located, as it is, in close proximity to the church, it makes an ideal home for the janitor. Last year, 1917, the church bought a valuable property in the same block, fronting on Broadway, and converted it into a pastorium, located in a beautiful grove of maple and mountain ash. It adds much to the appearance and value of the church property and equipment. Since the organization of the church the following pastors have served, in the order named: Rev. I. D. Fleming. Rev. J. E. Ingham, Rev. D. W. Hall. Rev. Charles Davis. Rev.

In 1912, during the pastorate of Rev. A. E. Rapp, a new building enterprise was undertaken. The old church, on the corner of Broadway and Tenth avenues, directly south of the court-house, was sold and moved away, and preparations were made for the erection of a modern brick edifice in its place.

At this time Rev. Rapp tendered his resignation, and the succeeding pastor, Rev. W. L. Gaston, who was a resident of the county, was called to the pastorate and assigned the task of building the church. Mr. Gaston is now (1919) serving Nebraska as assistant secretary of state.

The membership of the church, however, were united, harmonious, and in working spirit, and the task was not a hard one. Generous assistance was given by the members of other churches and the town people generally.

NEW BAPTIST CHURCH AT BROKEN BOW

In striking contrast to the primitive sod sanctuary, or the private dugout, in which were set up the first altars before which Custer county pioneers worshiped, is the modern brick edifice standing on the corner of Broadway and Tenth avenue in Broken Bow. Because of the striking contrast, a description of the church, written five years ago, just before the church building was dedicated, is appended.

The final dedicatory services of the handsome new Baptist church, which is now fully completed, will be held the coming Sunday, both morning, afternoon, and evening. This splendid house of worship as it stands, cost approximately $15,000 and is thoroughly modern in every particular. The finely equipped basement, with its spacious Sunday-school room, is worth going some distance to see.

This place can be turned into the finest banquet room in the city and is perfectly equipped in the way of culinary paraphernalia. Up-to-date lavatories and toilets also are to be found here. This banquet room, by the way, served to splendid advantage during the land registration. The ladies of the church conducted a dining-room here at all hours of the day and night, and during the two weeks succeeded in taking in a magnificent sum of $1,200 or over. This will make a good showing in the church-debt fund.

But it is up in the auditorium, where the beautiful colored windows of opalescent glass as the Good Shepherd, which was donated by the Junior and Busy Bees classes.

The Talbot memorial is on the south side, and was given by the children of Dr. and Mrs. R. C. Talbot, while the children of Mr. and Mrs. Jacob F. Mauk have donated a like memorial. Then there are the windows given by the boys' and primary classes, the prevailing colors in them being delicate shades of green and yellow.

On the west, immediately back of the choir gallery, is a very unusual window, there being no other like it in the United States. It is an original design by Rev. W. L. Gaston, pastor are, that the visitor is really impressed. These windows, of which there are sixteen, were manufactured in St. Joseph, Missouri, and are really works of art. In the large hall of the church is the American flag window, which was donated by the Ladies' Missionary Society.

On the east side of the auditorium are two column windows in green and amber, one presented by the Sunday school to Mr. and Mrs. D. M. Amsberry; while the other is a King memorial, presented by the relatives of Edmund and Mark King, who were prominently connected with the church in an early day. Between the column windows is a rich and beautiful piece of coloring, showing Christ of the church. Across the top of the window is a double bar of music with the words: "Praise God From Whom All Blessings Flow." This window was donated by the choir, in honor of Mrs. Willis Cadwell, who has been the church organist for many years. The color scheme of this window is about the same as the rest.

Directly in the west is a square window, in the center of which, portrayed in rich color is Hoffman's "Ecce Homo," which shows the agony of Christ, on whose head is the crown of thorns. This is the gift of Mrs. W. L. Gaston and children, Gladys and Orvin. Next to this is a memorial window, donated by Frank Kelsey in honor of his mother.

In the pastor's study, the Ladies' Aid Society has placed its window. Another window in the west is modest in design and is historical, not to say unique. At the top is a picture of the old church and pastorium. Below the picture are names of all charter members and complete list of pastors up to the present time. There are also the names of the present officers and the building committee. This is a gift of the young ladies of the church. There is only one other window like this in the world, and that is in the Baptist church at Creston, Iowa.

On the north side of the lecture room is a Calvary window, showing the scene of Calvary in the distance, with three crosses. It is an elegant painting and is the gift of the young men. The Bible-class window is also shown on the north side.

MASON CITY CHURCH

Ten days after the organization of the Broken Bow church, another Baptist church was organized, at Oak Springs, in the vicinity of old Algernon. This was called the Oak Springs Baptist church. John A. Hall was elected as first church clerk. This church seems to have been a strong, vigorous organization, composed of representative people who were alive to their opportunity and very willing to make sacrifices for the cause. Rev. I. D. Fleming was the organizer and first pastor of this church.

With the building of the Chicago, Burlington, & Quincy Railroad up to the Muddy, old Algernon disbanded and the Oak Springs church removed to Mason City, where it is today a strong, prosperous organization. The church has passed through many trying times and has encountered many difficulties, but its members have hung together, weathered every storm, and are now out on the open sea of smoother sailing. The evolution of their church buildings would be hard to describe, other than to say that to-day they have a beautiful, commodious, not over-pretentious edifice, which will meet their requirements for a few more years.

In 1917 the church tore down the old pas-torium and erected a new one in its place. The new building is the finest pastorium owned by any denomination in the state, west of Grand Island.

The membership represents a good deal of wealth, so that the church is able to secure the services of able preachers and maintain all branches of denominational work. The membership approximates two hundred. During later years they have been served by strong men, among whom the present pastor, Rev. Paul Scheuk, rates high.

THE MERNA BAPTIST CHURCH

The Merna Baptist church was organized in 1884, by J. E. Ingham, assisted by Mark King. Rev. William Elliott was called as first pastor and F. M. Frazier was church clerk. Here was a handful of devoted spirits, who were never able to make much progress but who have maintained worship, erected an edifice and a pastorium, and who at the present time maintain a local pastor.

This organization seems to have nearly collapsed, and later, in 1887, there was a reorganization, by Rev. Sterns, of Grand Island. He conducted revival meetings, which resulted in a number of conversions and increased the membership to thirty-five.

About this time the Lincoln Townsite Company promised a lot to the denomination that built the first church. The Merna Baptist church took advantage of this offer, and at once solicited a building fund, as a result of which the present building was dedicated in the fall of 1887.

The charter members, with the exception of two, have either died or moved away. The exceptions are J. B. Smith and Mrs. Nona Filkins. Among the pastors who have served the church are Rev. W. M. Jewel, W. A. Farrell, F. A. Reisner, J. D. Brady, W. L. Gaston, and the present incumbent, the Rev. C. C. Van Gorkon.

THE ANSLEY BAPTIST CHURCH ORGANIZED

The Baptist church of Ansley was organized September 19, 1886, at the close of a sermon by the Rev. J. E. Ingham. There were thirteen charter members, as follows: A. B. Fleming and wife, C. F. Davis and wife, Mrs. Jane Amsberry, M. S. Coffman, Walter W. Theobald and wife, Mrs. E. H. Burrows, Mrs. Charlotte A. Stevenson, James Westervelt and wife, and J. G. Amsberry. It was first represented at the Custer Association, held at Broken Bow, September 24, 1886, by the following delegates: Mrs. Charlotte Stevenson, W. W. Theobald, James Westervelt, and the pastor, J. E. Ingham. Meetings were first held in the town hall and afterward in the Presbyterian church. The church entertained the Custer Association in September, 1887. Rev. Theobald came next as minister and preached until Rev. L. W. Gowen was called for part time. Rev. Mr. Gowen was pastor also at Mason City and continued to serve the two churches until November, 1889. Having no church building and losing by removal its efficient church clerk, W. W. Theobald, and by death one of its most faithful members, Mrs. E. H. Burrows, it had no regular services from 1889 to 1899. On August 8, 1899, Rev. S. C. Green, secretary of the Nebraska State Baptist Association, reorganized the Baptist church, the meeting being held in the parlor of Mrs. C. R. Stevenson. Those going into the new organization were: Mrs. Charlotte Stevenson, J. H. Kerr and wife, N. Amsberry and wife, Arthur, Myrtle, and Minnie Meyers, A. H. Lewis and wife, E. J. Owens and wife, and Verla and Esty Lewis. The officers chosen were: Rev. J. R. Woods, pastor for part time; deacon, N. Amsberry; clerk, A. H. Lewis; trustees, J. H. Kerr, Henry Zimmerman, and E. J. Owens; treasurer, Mrs. J. H. Kerr. On August 20, 1899, the church was given recognition and again received into the Custer Association as a Baptist church, regularly organized. In 1901 J. H. Kerr was appointed to purchase three lots for the church building. These lots were located on Main street, and on October 25, 1903, the church was dedicated. In February, 1906, two more lots were purchased and a parsonage built. In 1917 a basement was built, at a cost of $2,000. Pastors who have served the church: J. E. Ingham, L. W.

Gowen, J. R. Woods, D. J. Briggs, W. K. Markland, J. M. F. Heuman, Frank C. Barrett, F. A. Conners, R. Richards, C. T. McKee, J. T. Brown, C. A. Spaulding, and the present pastor, R. Richards. The church has always been a missionary church and has contributed largely to all the denominational interests. In 1911 a branch of the church was organized at Happy Hill schoolhouse, J. E. Staab, Lyman Amsberry, and Ray Zimmerman being the officers. The present membership is 165. The church property is valued at $8,000. The present officers are: Pastor, R. Richards; deacons, N. Amsberry, William Ihlow, and Chester Loyd; trustees, J. H. Kerr, William Price, and W. J. McCullough; treasurer, Mrs. J. H. Kerr; Sunday-school superintendent, J. B. Jones; Sunday-school secretary, Elsie Butler; Sunday-school treasurer, Mrs. Mabel Lewis; organist, Miss Crissie Southard; chorister, Mrs. J. H. Holeman; B. Y. P. U. president, Mrs. Fannie Austrand. At the reorganization of the church in 1899, a Mission Circle was formed, of which Mrs. J. H. Kerr has always been the president. Mrs. E. W. Pester is at present the secretary-treasurer.

In 1906 a new parsonage was built, which has since been improved and modernized, and it is to-day occupied by the incumbent pastor, Rev. R. Richards.

THE EUELLES

Rev. J. M. Maxwell, an able and educated minister, from Indiana, located at Cumro and in 1886 organized the first Eudell Baptist church, with Nc George as church clerk. Shortly after its organization, a sod church was built, and this served the purposes of the congregation and community for a number of years—until it was replaced by the frame building which is now in use. The work in this community has been steady, never large, but always the faithful resident members have sustained Sunday-school and, most of the time, preaching services.

The church to-day is under the pastoral care of Rev. W. C. Walcott, who serves this church in connection with the field at Sumner. In 1891 a branch of this church was organized, by the Rev. J. M. Maxwell, at a point six or seven miles east of the first church, and this newer branch organization is now called the Second Eudell Baptist church.

The career of the second church has been much the same as that of the first. A few substantial Baptist families, such as those of William Eleo and B. F. Nicholas, have contributed both the life and support of the church for the last twenty years or more. At present the church employs a pastor for half time. Rev. W. E. Stilson serves this church and also that of Bethel Union, eight miles north of Broken Bow.

LOMAX AND LODI

Owing to the missionary work of O. A. Buzzell, two small churches were organized in the Wood river and South Loup country, at Lomax and Lodi. These organizations were effected some time in the early '90s. Both have secured frame buildings and a comfortable parsonage has been built at Lomax. These are both rural churches and preaching services have been more or less intermittent. In each neighborhood, however, reside one or two staunch Baptist families, who have managed to keep church expenses paid and the church door open. At the present time both churches are without pastors.

BETHEL UNION

On January 20, 1901, the Bethel Union church, eight miles north of Broken Bow, was organized in the home of Mrs. Amanda Holcomb. Seven persons were present, and only a few charter members were obtained, but meetings were held in a schoolhouse and the people of the community, generally, gave the church their support. Several additions were made to the church as the result of evangelistic meetings.

In 1906 the church built the present building and dedicated it, free of debt. The regular services have been maintained most of the time since. The Rev. J. R. Woods served as pastor for a number of years next after the organization.

Rev. W. L. Gaston, then of Merna, commenced afternoon services in August, 1909, and continued them every two weeks until the close of 1915. Since that time the church has been without services most of the time. Rev. W. E. Stilson is present pastor and is spending much time upon the field. Only a few of the original members remain, removals and death having changed entirely the first church roll.

HIGHLAND

The Highland church is the baby church of the association, as the result of a meeting held on the extreme west and southern rim of the West Table, by the Rev. F. A. Reisner, in the fall of 1916. A few families were banded together into a church organization, known as the Highland Baptist church.

The work they have been doing, which consists mainly of maintaining a Sunday-school and an occasional preaching service, has been largely of a union character. Rev. C. C. Van Gorkon, pastor of the Merna church, is now serving the Highland church with afternoon appointments. The organization has no building, but maintains services in a schoolhouse.

THE FREE METHODIST CHURCH

The Free Methodist church of Ansley has a membership of twenty-five, but they are holding no services at present. They own a parsonage, the value of which is $1,800. The trustees of the church are M. V. Hawk, J. H. Brand, and John Daniels. This denomination has a small following throughout the county, but their work has been intermittent and confined to localities in the country precincts. They have no church buildings at the present time and no county organization.

THE PRESBYTERIANS

The first Presbyterian services of which there is any record were held in the home of S. C. Stuckey, on Burr Oak creek, in 1879, by Rev. Mr. Cornett, who was then located at Lexington.

The first Presbyterian organization, as stated elsewhere, was in the New Helena district, in 1880, at which time a minister named Stevenson, from West Virginia, located on a New Helena homestead. Stevenson stayed but a short time, perhaps less than one year, but during that time effected a local organization of some nature, which later was carried on by Rev. Lysander T. Burbank, who in the same year located in the vicinity of Burr Oak. Afterward, however, this New Helena and Lillian work was taken over by the Methodists, who supplied the preaching stations from Westerville.

Some time in the spring of 1880 a Presbyterian church was organized at Burr Oak, by a Rev. Mr. Little, who was the first synodical missionary to do Presbyterian work in Custer county. Rev.

Dr. Burbank, who arrived in Custer county October 1, 1880, came to assume the pastorate of this church, which he served for a number of years without salary. Aside from being a preacher, Dr. Burbank was a physician, and he practiced medicine up and down the South Loup in the early days. The records show that he was a student under Mark Hopkins, the illustrious president of Williams College. President Garfield and ex-Senator John J. Ingalls were both upper-class men in this institution while Dr. Burbank was an undergraduate.

This Burr Oak church is maintained at the present time, but has no pastor.

BROKEN BOW PRESBYTERIANS

The Presbyterian church of Broken Bow was organized in 1885, by a Rev. Mr. Doremus, who at the time was serving the Ansley church. The charter members were E. A. Hemsworth, Mrs. Hemsworth, G. H. Tuttle, Mrs. Addie Tuttle, Mrs. Jennie Biggerstaff, Mrs. R. E. Martin, and Mrs. Kimel Barnes.

For some time services were held in a public hall, the congregation awaiting the time when they felt they would be able to build the church home they required. This was done in 1893. A very commodious, beautiful structure, for the time, was erected on the north side of the railroad, on Tenth avenue, at a cost of about $3,500. The Rev. George Bailey was pastor during the building and dedication of the church. This was at the time the best church building in the county. In 1904 the structure was destroyed by fire, and it was rebuilt in the fall of the same year. It was dedicated in April, 1906.

The following account of the dedication is from a denominational paper published at the time:

"More than a year ago this church lost its pleasant house of worship through a visitation of fire, and the people were forced to meet in a rented hall — as in the early days of their organization. At once they began to plan for a new church which would be larger and more convenient than the one destroyed. As a result of their energy and liberality, a building costing about $6,000 was dedicated on April 10, during the session of Kearney presbytery, which was being held at Broken Bow. Rev. George A. Ray, D.D., of St. Paul, preached the dedicatory sermon; the pastor, Rev. A. A. Mitchell, conducted the formal service of dedication, Rev. Dr. Thomas C. Clark, of Grand Island, offering the prayers. During this same session of the presbytery a formal call was presented from the Broken Bow church to Rev. A. A. Mitchell, and he was installed as pastor, on the evening of April 11, 1906. Since that time the church has had renewed life, receiving on one Sabbath forty new members into its communion."

While Rev. A. A. Mitchell was not settled as pastor until the time of dedication, he had been acting as stated supply and it was due to his labor that the church was built.

The church has a membership of approximately 150 and is a very liberal contributor to every denominational and benevolent cause.

The church erected a manse which is a splendid, two-story, modern structure, equal to all the needs of a minister's family. The present pastor, Rev. A. H. Frazer, has been eight years with the church, loved by his people and respected by the community.

THE ANSLEY PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH

The Presbyterian building was the first church structure erected in Ansley. It was built in the spring of 1887 and was dedicated in July of the same year, Rev. Mr. Sexton, of Seward, officiating. The first pastor was Rev. Mr. Doremus. Being the only church in the town, it was used by all denominations until each was able to erect a church edifice of its own. Several ministers, whose names are not now remembered, served the church before 1893. But in that year Rev. Mr. Mitchelmore became its pastor. He continued in that capacity up to 1894, and thereafter, on account of the drouth, the church stood vacant for several years. The next pastor was Rev. Paul Naylor, since whose pastorate the ministers whose names we have been able to secure, have been Rev. Mr. McCachran, Rev. Mr. Strickler, and Rev. Mr. Thomas. The church is now inactive.

EPISCOPALIAN WORK IN THE COUNTY

Although the people of the Protestant Episcopal church were not among the early pioneers, they have, nevertheless, been missionaries of no mean dimensions. They have operated, in a small way, in most of the towns of the county. Their people were among the early settlers in most localities, although, in most instances, not numerous enough to warrant the establishing of a church.

At the present time they maintain service at Broken Bow and Callaway, where they have strong churches and good equipment.

CALLAWAY PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH

While an occasional service was held in Callaway by the missionary resident of Broken Bow, under the direction of the Right Reverend George Worthington, bishop of the diocese of Nebraska, it was not until the consecration of Right Reverend Anson R. Graves, January 1, 1890, and the setting aside of the jurisdiction of the Platte, that any regular services were held in Callaway. Bishop Graves visited Callaway May 16, 1890, and arranged for regular services by Rev. W. S. Sayres, rector at Broken Bow. Under his active encouragement and help, Holy Trinity church was erected and the mission built up. The church building cost $1,500 and was erected in 1890. To the ceaseless energy of Mrs. Georgia Ingram, more than to any other one person, is due the credit for the erection of the largest church building in Callaway. Its corner-stone was laid, with due Masonic ceremonies, November 25, 1890, this being the first instance in which this symbolic service was held in Custer county. The officers present were: M. W. Robert E. French, grand master; and R. W. Lee P. Gillett, grand custodian. They were assisted by forty master Masons, local and visitors. Broken Bow sent twenty-six Masons. In the furnishing of the church many beautiful and useful articles were received from various liberal churchmen, among which were: Silver communion service, by the sons of O. M. Carter, Omaha; Holy Bible, Church of the Heavenly Rest, New York; bell, John Taylor & Company, Laughborough, England; altar linen, altar hangings, and dosal curtain, beautiful white set, Mrs. Georgia Ingram, San Diego, California; purple set, Mrs. Graves, wife of the bishop; green set, Ladies' Guild; alms basin, Rev. R. G. Osborn, of Platte Collegiate Institute; corner stone, cross, Mr. Osborn, of Kearney granite works; candlesticks, gilt and silver, Arthur Bird; vases, V. G. Gurinian.

The year 1893 brought a financial panic and a failure of crops. A tornado, on June 4, 1894, threw the church off its foundation and injured everything in the building. In this year of misfortunes, the church was moved to a new location, was repaired, a furnace was put in, and a rectory built, necessitating an expenditure of $950 in cash. By some strange coincidence, the greatest material advance to Holy Trinity church has seemed to come in times of greatest financial depressions. The church was consecrated, free of debt, January 1, 1895, and organized as a mission, under the rules of the bishop of the Platte, July 7, 1895. The jurisdiction of the Platte was abolished and the jurisdiction of Laramie took its place in 1898. At first, services were held once a month, sometimes once in two months, but the church has so prospered that since 1900 regular morning and evening services have been held every Sunday. The rector does missionary work along the Kearney & Black Hills Railroad and around Callaway. The following rectors have had charge of this mission under Rt. Rev. Anson R. Graves, S. T. D., bishop of Laramie: Rev. W. S. Sayres, Rev. S. A. Potter, Rev. H. E. Robbins, Rev. Austin F. Morgan, Rev. E. P. Chittenden, Ph. D., Rev. John Powers, Rev. A. E. Osborn, Rev. R. A. Russell, Rev. Charles Ferguson, Rev. R. M. Herdman, Rev. J. M. Bates. The number of communicants on May 1, 1901, was fifty. The, then, official members of the church were: Senior warden, H. H. Andrews; junior warden, George O. Benger; clerk, Mrs. Clara Benger; organist, Miss Emily Holloway; lay-reader, H. H. Andrews. To the chief shepherd of the flock, Bishop Graves, is due chief praise for his good work in his mission, giving it the best of his clergy and ever raising funds to improve its property.

The Ladies' Guild of the Protestant Episcopal church was organized by the Rt. Rev. Anson R. Graves at the time of his first visit to Callaway, on May, 16, 1890. This organization was completed May 27, 1890, by the adoption of the by-laws and the election of the following officers. President, Mrs. Lydia F. Bird; vice-president, Mrs. Catherine E. Nixon; secretary, Mrs. Georgia A. Ingram; treasurer, George S. Smith. The following members were first enrolled: Mrs. Lydia F. Bird, Mrs. Anna Tyson, Mrs. Catherine E. Nixon, Mrs. Etta Bergman, Mrs. Georgia A. Ingram, Mrs. Fannie Sherwood, Mrs. Martha Pike, Miss Lucy J. Johnston. From this nucleus sprang not a large but a very active guild, which has been the mainstay of Holy Trinity church. The history of the guild is the history of the church. The guild really was the prime mover in building and furnishing the church. It purchased the historical organ—the organ which for years was the only one in town, one which was used to every occasion, and which finally, through the liberality of the guild, found a resting place within the church, where it now dispenses sacred music as sweetly as it did secular harmonies in its youth. The guild furnished the seats of the church, the communion rail, and the altar. It paid for half of the English bell and paid freight and custom duties on it. The bell was a half-gift from John Taylor & Company, Laughborough, England. So not only is the church in communion with the Church of England, but the congregation assembles every Sunday at the ring and call of its English bell. The guild has supported in part the rector's salary, paid incidental expenses, sexton and organist, and made up deficiencies in general. During the drouth of 1890, the guild disbursed needful articles to the indigent and worthy poor, and the same was true of the great drouth of 1894. It is the active, working organization of the church, rich in good deeds and worthy of the highest praise. The officers at that time were: President, Mrs. Hattie Andrews; secretary, Mrs. Clara Benger; vice-president, Mrs. Josephine Phillips; treasurer, Mr. H. H. Andrews. The membership is about twenty.

Holy Trinity Sunday-school membership has remained about stationary. The superintendent, from the time of organization, has been H. H. Andrews. Teachers: Olive Phillips, Mabel Decker, Emma Conly, Emily Holloway, and Emily Brega.

THE BROKEN BOW EPISCOPAL CHURCH

The ministrations of the Episcopal church were first brought to Broken Bow during the days of the late Bishop Worthington, who, in 1886, sent Rev. M. Fullforth out from Omaha to look over the field. There being but a small handful of Episcopalians in this community at that time, Rev. Mr. Fullforth called them together during his church service in August, 1886, in what was then the Opera House. This new church was organized as St. John's Protestant Episcopal church. Later that year, or in the early part of 1887, Rev. Dr. Zahner came to Broken Bow and obtained something like $800 in subscriptions for building a church, the land being given by the Lincoln Land Company for that purpose. In 1887, following a short stay by Dr. Zahner, came the Rev. Oliver J. Booth, who was the first settled rector. The church services were held in various places, among which were the Burlington hotel and the homes of some of the members. It was during the Rev. Mr. Booth's pastorate that a church building was erected. Operations were begun in April, 1889, and finished in September of the same year. The first service held in the new edifice was a marriage ceremony. Bishop Worthington paid an episcopal visit to this new field in September, 1888.

During the time between Bishop Worthington's visit and the completion of the church building, Bishop A. R. Graves was made bishop over this part of the state of Nebraska, and he made his first visitation to Broken Bow January 9, 1890. At the time of this visit a subscription for supporting a clergyman was begun, and also a fund for wiping out the indebtedness created by building a church.

The woman's guild, which was organized in February, 1887, offered their services, took over the indebtedness of the church and pledged themselves to pay it off at a rate of $200 each year for five years.

Between the resignation of Rev. Mr. Booth, in October, 1889, and the arrival of the Rev. W. S. Sayres, May 30, 1890, services were not held with any regularity. Upon Mr. Sayres taking charge of the work the services were held weekly, except for one Sunday each month, when he went to Callaway for service. This arrangement prevailed until January, 1893, when the Callaway church obtained a rector for itself, thus releasing Mr. Sayres for other work, in Ansley, where he managed to hold services every Sunday afternoon. In June, 1893, the church received its first coat of paint. Very shortly after this, July 4th, Mr. Sayres resigned to take up work in another field. During his stay here he held services at different times in Litchfield, Mason City, Ravenna, Ashley, Custer Center, Merna, Sargent, West Union, Hyannis, Sand Valley, and Callaway.

From July 12 to September 28, 1893, this work was taken charge of by Rev. F. M. Bacon, deacon, and Broken Bow was given weekly service. Throughout the following year the Rev. R. L. Knox had charge of the work. Mr. Knox, upon leaving Broken Bow, took charge of the church at Arapahoe. His place was filled in Broken Bow by the Rev. H. E. Robbins, deacon, who remained until July 30, 1895. During a period of nearly two years only occasional services were held by ordained clergymen, the interim being supplied by lay-readers. The Rev. George Green was in charge of St. John's church from June, 1897, until the following August. In October, 1897, the Rev. J. B. VanFleet took charge of the work, and after remaining one year, he removed to Norford, Nevada.

BROKEN BOW EPISCOPAL CHURCH AND RECTORY

From October, 1898, to September, 1899, the Rev. Charles Ferguson had charge, and during his pastorate he held a monthly service at Callaway, where he resided during his last month in the state, whence he went to Tucson, Arizona. While in charge of Broken Bow and Callaway, he prepared for publication his book entitled "The Religion of Democracy."

Then followed a period of more than two years during which the sacraments of the church were administered only occasionally, the most of the services being conducted by a lay-reader.

From January, 1900, to May, 1902, the Rev. Walton H. Daggett held the pastorate in Broken Bow. It was during his charge here that many minor improvements were made in the church building and the rectory, which had been provided by the Woman's Guild. Among the improvements in the church were an altar, brass candle-sticks, brass cross, a hymn board, etc., besides vestments for the choir.

The Rev. William H. Xanders then took up the work, and he remained from May, 1902, to January, 1910. During his pastorate other improvements were added to the church and rectory, the rectory being enlarged.

Mr. W. C. J. Dumville, a lay-reader, had charge of the work from May, 1910, to November, 1912. While in charge of this work he pursued his theological studies, and in March, 1911, he was made a deacon, by our present bishop, Rt. Rev. George Allen Beecher, D. D.

From November, 1912, until 1914, the Rev. L. A. Arthur, of Grand Island, ministered occasionally to the people of Broken Bow, and early in 1915 the Rev. F. A. Henry took up the work. He remained until March, 1918.

Sunday, June 9, 1918, Rev. T. W. Morgan, deacon, was advanced to the priesthood, in St. John's church, and he immediately took charge of the work of this parish, of which he has since continued the rector.

THE CHURCH OF GOD

The early work done by the pioneer preachers of the Church of God should be recorded along with the account of work done by devoted men of other denominations. This body of devoted people have never lacked in enthusiasm, and when it is considered that they have not been backed by a large denomination which could render outside support, and have been led by an unpaid ministry, they have made a creditable showing. Their pioneer work was done mostly at Weissert and Berwyn. The most prominent, and perhaps the ablest, of their preachers is the Rev. Richard Bellis, who during the years has conducted farming operations in connection with his ministry. The fertile fields of Custer county soil, if not the spiritual fields of Custer county churches, have rewarded Rev. Bellis and his good wife with a competency for their old age, so that they now live in comfortable retirement on their farm near Berwyn.

This denomination maintains at the present time, two organizations, in Custer county, one at Weissert, where they have a frame church building, and the other at Berwyn, where they have a very neat, three-gabled building, nicely furnished, and adequate for the needs of the small town. These two churches are served by the Rev. John Armour, who, like his predecessor, depends upon the good soil of the realm for the staff of life, and "eats his bread in the sweat of his brow." Rev. John Armour, preacher and farmer, is young and vigorous, and his Sabbath ministrations are carried on with a zeal and fervor unrestrained by the farm labor of the week.

CHRISTIAN CHURCH

Rev. W. A. Baldwin, of Broken Bow, has furnished the following summary:

To Elder E. D. Eubank, now a resident of Broken Bow, must be given the honor of opening Custer county to the plea of the Disciples of Christ, commonly known as the Christian church. He moved here in 1874, and settled on the Middle Loup river near Wescott. In common with all preachers of this communion, he was full of the desire to preach the gospel wheresoever he found himself, and it was not long until he began to gather the people together for worship. Mrs. Eubank led in forming a Sunday school, as well as gathering the few children of the neighborhood into her own home for a day school. As a result of this beginning, there was effected, in 1875, a small organization, with Mr. Guthrie as elder, and this continued to hold services for a time. The members thus drawn together in this early day mostly united with the church at Sargent, at the time of its organization.

Elder Eubank had the experience that often met the pioneer preacher, and frequently had to walk to places of meeting. At one time he was called across the Loup for a funeral, and went over in the morning on the ice. On his return, in the afternoon, he was taken to the river in a conveyance by one of the neighbors, who drove away at once and the preacher wended his way to the ice. A change had taken place during the day, and, before he was very far along, the ice was showing signs of breaking up. Finally he had to wade the water, 'midst floating ice, because of a rift that separated him from the shore. He preached the first funeral sermon in the county and married the first couple—Edgar Denial and Miss Josephine Eubank. He served as the first county superintendent of schools. Two other men preached in those early days at Wescott—Elders Reuben Manning and S. A. Kopp. Both of these have passed to their reward, Mr. Manning being buried at Sargent July 26, 1918.

ARNOLD

The next organization effected was at Arnold, or more correctly at Henry Brothers' cattle ranch, then occupied by Morgan S. Parks and William W. Frazier and family. Elder Landis J. Correll, a veteran pioneer preacher, held services April 1, 1883, with about twenty-five persons present. Regular preaching was had thereafter, and on July 11, 1884, the church was formally organized, with the following charter members: L. J. Correll, Martha Correll, Marcellus Sargent, Lena Sargent, William W. Frazier, Laura J. Frazier, Charles Tremmel, Mrs. Charles Tremmel, A. Moffett, Mrs. A. Moffett, Anna M. Saunders, Allen Holeman, and Amos S. Gamble. The record of the first officers is not available, but Elder Correll continued to minister to the congregation for a number of years and doubtless served as elder.

Twelve members were added during the year of 1884 and as a result of a meeting held in the fall of 1885, by Elder Henderson and L. J. Correll, nine others united with the church. During this year a frame building was erected, at a cost of $1200, and was dedicated by R. C. Barrow, state evangelist, December 19, 1885. February 14, 1886, John T. Smith, of Nebraska City, conducted a series of revival meetings, lasting four weeks, and seven members were added. Again, in 1893, Evangelist Smith was called, and twenty-one additions resulted from the meetings held. "Father" Correll, as he was familiarly called, still served as pastor.

All of this time a regular Bible school was conducted by the church, but the names of officers cannot be given. D. A. Youtzy followed L. J. Correll as pastor. Owen J. Owens served six months in 1897; E. D. Eubank a like period in 1890; Ford A. Ellis, from April to September 1, 1906, during his vacation while attending Cotner University; and E. J. Ratcliffe in 1907; N. S. Carpenter in 1908; Ford A. Ellis again in 1911-12; J. G. Slick one year, 1913; G. W. Gentry, part of 1914; and F. H. Gerrett a part of 1916-17. School is held regularly every Lord's day, with an enrollment of fifty. John M. Saunders is the superintendent. The church now numbers eighty-three members, with the following officers: Elders, Charles Sanderson, John Samuelson, Warren Copeland; deacons, George Ransier, John Backes, Charles Backes, Oral Gunter, Harry Shaw, Arthur Scott; trustees, John Backes, Charles Sanderson, John Samuelson; deaconesses, Lydia Backes, Verda Smith, Sis. Bassett; clerk, Etta Backes; treasurer, Martha A. Morrow; organist, Oma Brown.

LIBERTY

The church at Liberty was organized on Clear creek, about ten miles east of Ansley, following a meeting held by M. A. Sweeney in October, 1883. There were about twenty-five charter members, of whom John Sargent and A. W. Hyatt served as elders. About the year 1886 H. L. Burns held a meeting at the Kimball schoolhouse, seven miles northwest of where the first church was organized, and a new organization was effected, of which Bradford Rose, Cain Moody, Ernest House, and Joseph Hyatt were deacons. The two churches came together in 1887, midway between the two locations, on the farm of J. W. Bryan. There they built a large sod meeting-house, in which they continued to worship, under the name Liberty Christian church, until the year 1903, when a neat and comfortable frame structure was built, the same having been dedicated the same autumn, by the state secretary, W. A. Baldwin. The following ministers have served as pastors, beginning with the first organization, in 1886: A. M. Sweeney, C. A. Miller, H. L. Burns, E. D. Eubank, S. A. Kopp, Jesse R. Teagarden, J. P. Waldron, Carl Knapp, Fred Galliger, P. G. Dennis, and Charles A. Shook. At this writing the organization is defunct, through death and removal of the members. A number of the remaining members are now identified with the Banner church, organized by Charles A. Shook, in December, 1917.

BROKEN BOW

The beginnings of the Christian church in Broken Bow date back to May, 1886, when the state evangelist, N. B. Alley, formed an organization which met for a time in the Baptist church building and then, again for a brief period, in a hall. Among the charter members were John Van Horn, J. B. Farrell, J. J. Brown and wife, David Brinson and wife, W. S. Boyce and wife, Mrs. Nellie Humphrey, W. R. Wiley, B. W. Blair, Nettie Atkinson, and E. E. Hastings. The evangelist appointed the following officers: Elders, J. J. Brown, W. R. Wiley, and B. W. Blair; deacons, John Van Horn and E. E. Hastings; deaconesses, M. Louisa Brown, Nettie Atkinson, and Mrs. Nellie Humphrey. The work did not flourish for a time, because of lack of pastoral care, and in December, 1886, Elder E. D. Eubank held a meeting of a month, in the Baptist church, thereafter serving the congregation as its pastor. During this meeting three trustees were elected, as follows: John Van Horn, David Brinson, and J. J. Brown. This church has enjoyed the usual vicissitudes meeting those who would establish the Lord's work on the very frontiers of advancing settlements and civilization. Periods of growth and exaltation were intermingled with times of depression and discouragement. The common lot of a new organization in the midst of a moving and shifting population was theirs. But throughout the years the church has been able to maintain its organization and for the most part has had pastoral oversight. The loss of the original records makes it uncertain whether the following list of preachers is exactly correct, but it is substantially so. Following E. D. Eubank, they are as follows: D. A. Youtzy, Porter, Pace, Surgeson, Shields, Sherman Hill, J. R. Teagarden, T. L. McDonald, George Boomer, L. R. Harman, C. V. Allison, A. J. Hargett, J. S. Early, N. T. Harmon, Z. O. Doward, W. C. Lessley, J. E. Ferguson, and the present pastor, W. A. Baldwin. Several of these were supply men only and some were students, serving only through vacations. J. R. Teagarden served at several different periods, being called to the work in connection with other business.

In 1887 a frame building was erected, at the corner of Eleventh avenue and P street, and this housed the congregation during the years intervening until 1907, when J. S. Early was serving the church. Mr. Early took up work begun in the summer by A. J. Hargett, who was filling the pastorate in his vacation. He had raised a part of the subscriptions toward a new building and a lot was secured on the corner at Tenth avenue and O street. Under the businesslike leadership of Mr.

Early the present house of worship was completed, at a total cost of $6,000. It was dedicated by F. M. Rains, of Cincinnati, Ohio, secretary of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. The old church building and site were sold to J. C. Moore, who converted the building into a comfortable residence, which is now occupied by the pastor, W. A. Baldwin.

This church has always maintained a Bible school from the earliest days. The first list of officers was lost with the records. It now has an enrolment of 105 and the officers are as follows: Superintendent, Mrs. W. R. Morgan; assistant superintendent, G. Dillard Lessley (at this time serving his country and part, accounts for the large list of non-resident members.

The present officers are as follows: Elders, J. M. Fodge, E. W. Morrison; deacons, C. W. Beal, B. F. Williams, B. H. Headley, J. D. Lemmon; deaconesses, Mrs. Belle Barratt, Mrs. E. I. Irvin, Mrs. G. E. Pennington, Mrs. W. R. Morgan; church clerk, H. C. Kimball; treasurer, Dr. G. E. Pennington; trustees, J. C. Moore, B. E. Williams, B. H. Headley; chorister, Mrs. E. I. Irvin; pianists, Mrs. Mabel Darnell, Miss Ethel Roberts.

Officers absent in the service of the United States at the time of this writing are: Elder G. Dillard Lessley, Hospital Train No. 39, American Expeditionary Force; deacons Mauritz Malm, Company B, 342, 89th Division, Machine Gun Battalion, American Expeditionary Force; Walter Ellis, Headquarters Company 339, Field Artillery, 88th Division, American Expeditionary Force.

Two women's societies are maintained, the Sisterhood doing a social and helpful work in the affairs of the church. President, Mrs. C. H. Holcomb; secretary, Mrs. William Darnell; treasurer, Mrs. G. B. Landis. The missionary society known as the Christian Woman's Board of Missions Auxiliary, with Miss Maude Baldwin president; Mrs. J. H. Johnson, secretary; and Mrs. H. C. Kimball, treasurer. Mrs. J. Beckwith is literary superintendent.

The Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor has a membership of fifteen. Miss Bessie Latzke is president; Miss Atlanta Tuttle, secretary and treasurer; Miss Ethel Roberts, corresponding secretary.

ANSELMO

In 1887, at the Grandview schoolhouse, a Sunday school was opened, with Charles Jones as superintendent. Preaching services were conducted by George Dixon. The work was continued until, in 1889, as the result of a meeting held by J. R. Teagarden, in which some twenty-five persons were converted, an organization was consummated at Windy Point schoolhouse. Practically the same group who were interested in the first work, went humanity "Somewhere in France"); secretary, Miss Alice Francis; treasurer, Miss Bessie Latzke; pianist, Miss Atlanta Tuttle. The school is following modern methods in Bible-school work, using graded lessons in the primary and intermediate departments. Two strong Bible classes among the seniors are taught by J. C. Moore and Hon. C. W. Beal.

In the matter of membership in the church, the earlier information is lacking, but it has grown with the passing of the years. At present the roll shows 231 members, including an absent list of more than forty. Many revival meetings have been held and have always given additional names to the list of members. Many students from other places have come in and then returned to their homes. This, in into the latter. This church met with varying degrees of success and failure as the years slipped by. In May, 1911, S. R. McClure, evangelist of the Nebraska Christian Missionary Society, who was in a meeting at Lillian, visited Anselmo and, finding there a desire for the work to be revived, he arranged to begin a meeting in the town the same month. The results were unexpectedly gratifying, eighty-four persons coming out on the side of the Lord. Steps were immediately taken to build, and by the time the meeting closed the new house was well along toward completion. It was fully fitted out that summer, at a cost of $2,000, and in the early fall it was dedicated, by W. A. Baldwin, state secretary of the missionary society that had supported the evangelist in the work. Of the eighty-four persons coming into the church during the meeting, fifty-three were received by confession and baptism. Twenty of the former members joined with the new material to form the new congregation. Frank Reeder served as pastor for a short time thereafter, as he had been preaching for them previously. A Bible school has been maintained regularly, and William V. White is now the superintendent.

The following preachers have served the congregations during the period from the beginning: George Dixon, E. D. Eubank, Frank J. Emerson, Ford A. Ellis, J. R. Teagarden, Frank Reeder, W. C. Lessley. Mr. Lessley has been serving, as his time would permit, for several years and is still looked to for preaching when he can give them time. William White is elder, and Mrs. William White is church clerk. There are about thirty members.

WHITE PIGEON

At White Pigeon schoolhouse, E. D. Eubank held services and organized a small congregation into a working church in 1888. Most of these members later became members of the Lillian church. It remained a preaching point for a number of years.

ANSLEY

The Christian church of Ansley was organized in March 1889, following a meeting held in a hall over C. J. Stevens' store, by the state evangelist, R. C. Barrow. The charter members were Dan Hagin, Mrs. Dovia Hagin, Frank Hagin, John Sargent, Laura A. Sargent, Simon Rigby, Alice Rigby, Mary Hagin, George Rich, Marie Rich, Fanny Gaines, Mrs. Anthony, and Jeanette Stevenson (now Mrs. Frank Housel). The officary consisted of two elders, John Sargent and George Rich, and two deacons, Dan Hagin and Simon Rigby. In 1892 the present house of worship was erected, at a cost of $3,000, and it was dedicated in August of that year, by Dr. W. P. Aylsworth, dean of the sacred-literature department of Cotner University. The succession of pastors is here recorded: W. H. Hedges, Fred Hagin, J. Sherman Hill, J. W. Walker, George Bailey, Jesse R. Teagarden, C. V. Allison, T. C. McIntyre, D. G. Wagner, F. D. Hobson, P. G. Dennis, and the present pastor, Charles A. Shook. The church now has an active membership of 153 and an outlying membership of about thirty-five in the church organized at the Banner schoolhouse in December, 1917, by the pastor, Charles A. Shook. It has a Bible school enrollment of about 150, with an average attendance of seventy-one. C. W. Hawk is the present superintendent. The Christian Endeavor Society has thirteen members and Miss Eva Stuckey is president. There is a strong woman's missionary society, known as the Christian Woman's Board of Missions Auxiliary, with thirty members. Mrs. J. T. McGowan is its president.

The present officers of the church are: Elders, Frank Housel, Charles W. Hawk, J. N. Trout, E. C. Moody, and Charles A. Shook; deacons, J. T. McGowan, William Housel, Roy Waters, B. F. Crouch, and Ed. Ming; clerk, J. T. McGowan; treasurer, W. C. Housel.

This church has sent out one preacher, Fred Hagin, son of Dan and Mrs. Dovia Hagin, and he has been for some years a missionary in the foreign field, at Tokio, Japan. This has been one of the strong churches of the Disciples of Christ in this county. It has maintained its vitality and has a prominent place in the village of Ansley and the community round about.

COBURG

The church at Coburg began its work in a sod schoolhouse, about the year 1890, E. D. Eubank and Reuben Manning leading in the organization and afterward both of these men ministered to the congregation. The list of charter members is not available, but the officers chosen were as follows: Elder, L. L. Wood; deacons, J. S. Amos, John Jorn; clerk and treasurer, Richard Eubank. A Bible school was organized, with Richard Eubank as superintendent. Regular services were maintained, with occasional vacancies in the pastorate. In 1913 a meeting-house was constructed, and it is now the home of the congregation.

The following preachers have served: S. A. Kopp, E. D. Eubank, R. D. McCance, H. L. Denton, A. O. Startwood, A. L. Field, N. C. Carpenter, and J. S. Reel, the last named being the present minister, in co-operation with the Sargent church. The present membership is forty-five and the officers are: Elders, J. Jorn, Emmet Bebout, Lester Thompson; deacons, Elmer Galaher, Wayne Amos, J. L. Amos, Roy Durham, Charles Bedford, Henry Eggers; clerk, Mrs. J. L. Amos; treasurer, Lester Thompson; Bible-school superintendent, Wayne Amos. The enrollment of the Bible school is sixty-three. The value of the church property is $2,000. During the life of this congregation two of its young men have declared for the ministry.

MASON CITY

In October, 1906, O. A. Adams, pastor of the church at Ansley, with Louis Epler as singing evangelist, held a meeting in the opera hall at Mason City resulting in an organization with the following officers: Elders, Sherman Knox, Oren Dolen; deacons, George Chipps, Vannie Reed, William Davis, Ross Rhodes; church clerk, Oren Dolen.

The following named persons were charter members: Mrs. W. T. Whitehead, Mrs. William Russmisell, George Chipps, Ella Chipps, Blanche Weaver, Hannah Anderson, Ovidia Anderson, Iva Browning, Bessie Reed, Viola Gouley, Oren Dolen, Vannie Reed, William Davis, Rose Davis, Jennie Weaver, Lewis Weaver, Mabel Chipps, Howard Chipps, James Gouley, Ellen Gouley, Ross Rhodes, Sadie Thorne, Mary E. Shelton, Martha E. Dolan, Sherman Knox, Frances Knox, Marie Knox, Frank Knox, Felix Shelton, Elva Rhodes.

The following preachers have ministered to the church: E. D. Eubank, J. R. Teagarden, William Sumpter, Fred Galiger, Carl Knapp, F. C. Wilson, George P. Brammel. Early in 1907 the church began the erection of a house of worship, and it was completed in June. It was dedicated June 16th, by State Secretary W. A. Baldwin. The church has maintained a Sunday school, which was for a time under the superintendency of W. T. Whitehead. At times the congregation was without preaching and suffered from removals and the inability to support a pastor. At the present time there are thirty names on the records, with Mrs. R. F. McCloughan, clerk and treasurer, and Mrs. W. T. Whitehead, superintendent of the Sunday school.

LILLIAN

The beginnings of the church at Lillian are found in a meeting held by Elder S. A. Kopp in the Lillian schoolhouse. An organization was effected December 12, 1906, following the meeting. They called Elder Kopp as their pastor and he served them until his death, March 28, 1910. The officers elected were: Elders, W. W. Barnes, O. L. Swick, I. P. Bell; deacons, W. F. Myers, C. H. Leisure; clerk, Harry Swick.

The following named persons united to form the organization: Wm. W. Barnes, Mrs. Lorena Barnes, Lura Barnes, Mrs. Alice Bartlett, Eva Bartlett, Ethel Bartlett, Isaac P. Bell, Mrs. Mary Bell, Jabez Bowman, Mrs. Sarah Bowman, James Dare, Mrs. Mary Dare, S. A. Kopp, Charles H. Leisure, Robert Metzger, William F. Myers, Mrs. Kittie Myers, Oliver L. Swick, Mrs. Hope Swick. Later, protracted meetings were held by the pastor and brought in a large number of the young people of the community, most of them young men. At one time the pastor baptized thirty at the Broken Bow church. A Bible school has been maintained since the spring before the church was organized, W. W. Barnes serving as its first superintendent.

A house of worship was planned and erected on a site adjoining the school grounds, in the fall of 1908, and was dedicated in January following, by N. T. Harmon, pastor of the Broken Bow church. It is a most comfortable building and has become a center of community interest in that portion of the county. Following the death of its pastor, the church was served by E. D. Eubank, Frank Reeder, Joseph Lamm, and W. C. Lessley, who is still the pastor, having served since September, 1914. Under his ministry the work has grown and prospered. The present officers are: Elders, W. F. Myers, O. L. Swick; deacons, E. H. Myers, S. D. Myers; clerk and treasurer, D. E. Banning; superintendent of Bible school, William J. Books.

This church has maintained its preaching service and worship, with the communion, since the beginning, without interruption. Pastorless at times, it yet went steadily forward in the support of worship, never forgetting to assemble on the Lord's day. The success of this work lies especially in its faithful leadership. Maintaining preaching service only on alternate Lord's days, it has nevertheless demonstrated the power of the local rural church to do its work successfully. The country church need not die if its members are simply faithful.

SARGENT

The Sargent church came into being as a result of a meeting held by State Evangelist Samuel Gregg in March, 1908. J. H. Currie, of Bradshaw, Nebraska, having business interests and large acquaintance in the Sargent district, asked the state missionary society to consider that field and send this evangelist, whom he was supporting through the society, to organize a church in that town. The Congregational church was secured for the meeting and the organization resulted, following that meeting. The first officers were: Elders, L. L. Wood, C. C. Davis; deacons, J. D. Crownover, Charles Howland, A. B. Hartley, W. B. Kenyon; clerk, Zella M. Wood; treasurer, A. C. Davis. Sixty-three persons joined in the new organization, as follows: Allona Wood, Lena Kaohn, Ernest Kaohn, Ross Wood, Irma Crownover, Harold Crownover, Kenneth Crownover, Sadie Hesselgesser, Jeannie Kenyon, Mrs. W. B. Kenyon, W. F. Abbott, Mrs. Emma Wyckoff, Mrs. Livia Kaohn, Mrs. W. F. Abbott, O. W. Davis, Mrs. O. W. Davis, Florence Debusk, Rufus Manning, Alfred Grim, Mrs. Inez Grim, Mrs. Laura Core, James Debusk, Lucy Debusk, Grace Deforest, Mrs. Westopher, Mrs. Forest Abbott, Mrs. Sarah Evans, Elsie Chase, Paul Chase, C. H. Chase, Mrs. C. H. Chase, L. L. Wood, Minerva Wood, W. H. Wood, Zella M. Wood, E. M. Wood, Gustie Wood, Seth Austin, Mrs. J. D. Crownover, J. D. Crownover, A. C. Davis, R. J. Kennedy, A. B. Hartley, Mrs. A. B. Hartley, O. S. Pulliam, W. B. Kenyon, C. Howland, Eliza Brumbaugh, Mrs. C. A. Liminger, Mrs. Alice Pulliam, Della Sturm, Mrs. Ella Armstrong, Candace Lawson, Mrs. C. Howland, Robert Hesselgesser, Emma Hesselgesser, J. D. Holt, Augusta Kaohn, Eunice Kaohn, John Clifton, Sr., John Clifton, Jr., Bessie Hartley, Mabel Hartley.

R. D. McCance became the pastor of the new church, and later called Z. O. Doward for a meeting, the same being held in a tabernacle structure on the main street. A move to build a new house of worship followed, and resulted finally in the purchase and remodeling of the Congregational church building, in which the church had been meeting, maintaining a union Bible school with the Congregationalists. The building purchased is still the home of the church. The membership at this time is 110, and the Bible school has an enrolment of 120. Services are maintained regularly, under the ministry of J. S. Reel, and in connection with the Coburg church, each taking half-time services. The ministers who

MILBURN

In March, 1917, Rev. W. C. Lessley, of Broken Bow, and pastor of the churches at Lillian and Anselmo, held a meeting in the Community hall at Milburn. In spite of bad weather and worse roads, the meetings were well attended and a decided interest was manifested. There were twenty-six conversions, and arrangements were made for the evangelist to visit them regularly on Sunday afternoon each alternate week during the summer and winter. A Bible school was organized, meeting every Lord's day. In February, 1918, Rev. W. C. Lessley held a second meeting, resulting in forty-five conversions. An organization was asked for, and the new converts, with a number of the people of the community who were members of different religious bodies, came together late in February, at which time the Milburn Church of Christ was organized by Rev. Mr. Lessley, with 100 members. Officers were chosen as follows: Elders, Mr. Reynolds and G. W. Simmons; deacons, Bryan Holmes, Mr. Pike, Mrs. Holcomb, and Mr. Daley; church clerk, Miller Books; treasurer, Robert Farley. Mr. Reynolds was made superintendent of the Bible school, numbering sixty to seventy-five, and he still holds that office. Eight members have since been added to the organization and preaching is maintained every alternate Lord's day, morning and evening. Services are still held in the Community hall. The present officers are the same as at the beginning, save that John Kramer is now the treasurer. The congregation looks forward to the erection of a house of worship as soon as war conditions will permit.

In concluding this sketch of the work of the Christian churches—Disciples of Christ—in this county, it should be said that much of the record sources are meagerly kept and in some cases lost entirely. The early preachers were more interested in winning souls to Christ than in keeping accurate account of the history they were making. Many of the matters that would be most interesting in this late account, are entirely omitted. There are a number of places where preaching, and for a have served the church are: R. D. McCance, W. Bailor, H. E. Denton, Mr. Field, A. O. Swartwood, N. C. Carpenter, and J. S. Reel.

BANNER SCHOOLHOUSE

Rev. Charles A. Shook, pastor of the Ansley church, held a meeting in the Banner schoolhouse in November, 1917. There were twelve conversions, and, on December 26th following, an organization was effected, with fifteen charter members. Regular services have been maintained, and Mr. Shook has preached for them in the afternoon. A good Bible school, now numbering forty-five members, has been kept up, with Frank Sadler as superintendent. The church now numbers twenty-seven and is known as the Banner Christian church.

time regular, services were held, that did not develop into a formal organization. Such a place is New Helena, where the work was maintained for a time. At this time there is no work there.

In the county the total membership affiliated with the churches is 990. There are nine houses of worship, one of them unoccupied. These, at a moderate estimate of their value, in the light of cost and state of repair, is $27,800. There are nine Bible schools con-as best they could to their communicants. They have manifested, always, the spirit of strong conviction and extreme generosity. They have been responsive to all public appeals and been general contributors to the public welfare. They have been party to no denominational factions calculated to disrupt the general harmony of the religious status prevailing in the county. Custer county has had no exhibition of denominational animosity. Good will and harmony prevail to-day

[Phot. by S. D. Butcher]

DALE CATHOLIC CHURCH AND PARSONAGE
The parsonage was later destroyed by fire

ducted regularly, with an enrollment of 715. At this time there are five preachers resident in the county, namely: Elder E. D. Eubank, Broken Bow; Rev. W. C. Lessley, Broken Bow; Rev. Charles A. Shook, Ansley; Rev. W. A. Baldwin, Broken Bow; and Rev. J. S. Reel, Sargent. The church at Liberty is disbanded and that at Mason City has no pastoral work.

CUSTER COUNTY CATHOLICS

Among the pioneers of the county were many Catholics and in a very early day they began their church activities and administered throughout the county, and this statement is true of the years past. Credit is given to Frank Kelly for the following data concerning Catholic work in the county.

BEGINNING OF CATHOLIC WORK IN DALE

Rev. T. P. Haley, writing in 1901 gives the following summary of Catholic work in the Dale vicinity:

"The Dale mission was established some time in 1882, by Rev. Father Boyle. The first ones to ask for a priest, as far as the writer knows, were J. J. Downey and Robert McCarthy. Father Boyle was the first priest, and visited Dale valley in 1882, to administer to the wants of the few families that first settled there. He made the Dale mission a regular station. Mass was said alternately at each house. During Father Hayes' administration the people made preparations to build a church. The building was to be of brick and for the purpose of obtaining the material with which to build the church a brick yard was laid out on one of Mr. McCarthy's claims. One hundred thousand bricks were made and burned for the church. Lumber was purchased and hauled from Grand Island, a distance of 150 miles. About this time the people had spent over $800, but on account of the new railroad which was to be built through this section to the Black Hills, the church was not built at that time, as difficulties arose as to where the church should be located. Some wanted it on their farms or near their homes, while others wanted it built at Merna or Anselmo. The old settlers advocated building it at Dale. Father Hayes' last visit to the mission found matters in a worse condition than ever. In June, 1886, Father Hayes was appointed pastor of the church at O'Connor, Greeley county, and his assistant, Father Haley, was made pastor of Kearney and its missions, which included Dale. To his surprise, when he visited Dale mission, he found a divided people, caused by the disputes as to the location of the church. After a consultation with the principal members of the missions, it was decided to lay the matter before Bishop O'Connor. This was some time in July, 1886. In about a week Bishop O'Connor ordered the church to be built at Dale. It is easy to imagine the joy of the old settlers — J. J. Downey, Robert McCarthy, William Couhig, Con Fleischman, William Walsh, Robert Kelley, George Grove, Chris. Grove, William Brookman, and Charles Michael — when they learned of the bishop's decision. A subscription list was opened and the necessary preparations made to begin work as soon as possible. The bricks already burned were of poor quality and not sufficient in quantity for a brick building. Some were used for the foundation of the residence and church and for the chimneys. The balance were sold, out of which was realized some $400. There was a loss of about the same amount. Nearly all the lumber that had been hauled from Grand Island had been made use of by some kind friends who thought it well to help themselves. A few pieces of dimension lumber, with the shingles, remained for the use for which they had been purchased. The lumber for the church and residence was purchased from Goodman, Bogue & Company, of Kearney, and shipped to Broken Bow, then hauled to Dale by team, the hauling being done by the members of the mission. On the sixth day of November, 1886, Father Haley was appointed the first resident pastor of Dale. He arrived on the above date, at the beginning of one of the worst blizzards the state has ever had. For three days he was snowbound at the home of J. J. Downey. When the storm was over, the foundation for the residence was begun. Many hands made light work. In a few weeks the residence was partly completed. Father Haley moved into and lived in it for nearly two years before it was properly plastered. Mass was said in the south half of the residence until the church was built. One fine day in November — the very last day of the month — several of the old settlers met to break ground for the church. While so doing, George Grove said to Father Haley: "Father, to-day is St. Andrew's day; would it not be a good idea to name the church St. Andrew's church?" Father Haley paused, and said: "Men, what do you think?" They all assented, and hence the church of St. Andrew's at Dale received its name. The church was built, but was not completed for several years. Notwithstanding the difficulties under which the church and residence were built, sufficient notes were given by the members to pay the debt, and these were deposited with the lumber company to pay for the lumber. Father Haley governed the parish with success, and in October, 1888, a successful mission was given by the famous Father Ramen, for which the people gave him $118.25 for one week's work. After this mission, Father Hocheisel was sent to Dale as an assistant to Father Haley. January 8th, Father Hoeheisel was appointed pastor of Dale, under the supervision and direction of Father Haley, who then moved to Broken Bow, to take charge of that church and the missions attached. Father Hoeheisel remained but a short time as pastor of Dale, and Father Donahue was sent to take his place. He in turn was succeeded by Father Flood, who was followed by Father Flanagan, the present pastor."

THE BROKEN BOW CATHOLIC CHURCH

One of the missionary spirits who did much of the initial Catholic work in Custer county was Rev. Father Thomas B. Haley, who labored in the county from 1886 to 1897, at which time he was assigned to the work at North Platte. Father Haley was a very devoted worker and exceedingly popular with his own people and the community in general. For some time the Dale mission was the center from which Father Haley did his church work. Later he removed to Broken Bow and made the mission at this place his residence and headquarters. St. Joseph's church, of Broken Bow, was dedicated July 29, 1888. After the removal of Father Haley this charge was served by Father Donnelly. Among priests also serving here were Father Moser and Father Minogue, the latter of whom is now in charge at Anselmo and Dale. Both served at Broken Bow church and rendered splendid service.

CATHOLIC RECTORY AT BROKEN BOW

In 1917 one of the best rectories to be found anywhere in the middle west was built and furnished, and it is at present occupied by Father James Hermese and his assistant, Father Cornelius, both very excellent young men, who are devoted to the parish work and generally popular with the people of the community. The mission here consists of approximately thirty families.

CATHOLIC CHURCH AT OCONTO

THE OCONTO CHURCH AND MASON CITY CHURCH

During the regime of Father Haley a church was built at Oconto, in 1891, and in the preceding year the church at Mason City was erected. The Oconto church is still maintained, is a progressive body of devoted people, and it constitutes one of the strongest missions, if not the strongest, that the Catholics have in Custer county.

ANSLEY CATHOLIC CHURCH

The Ansley congregation of the Catholic church had its origin in the early days of the town, mass first being said in the home of Mrs.

CATHOLIC CHURCH AT SARGENT

B. J. Tierney. Later, in the year 1911, a small but beautiful church structure was erected, at the cost of $3,800, under the labors of the Rev. Father Moser, of Broken Bow. On the night of October 21, 1917, this building was burned to the ground, since which time the congregation has been worshipping in the old Presbyterian building. However, plans are already being laid for the erection of a larger church building in the near future. Among the priests who have been pastors of the church in recent years, may be mentioned Father Moser, Father Kavanaugh, Father Gleeson, Father Mathias, and the present incumbent, Father Cornelius. The parish comprises thirty-six families and the board of trustees is composed of Thomas Berry, B. J. Tierney, and A. F. Dobesh.

the drouth of 1894 the mission was disorganized by removals. The second was served by S. Dean, J. E. Hawley, and B. E. Smith. The last was the only one that survived the drouth and the removals incident to the early history of our county. In 1885 and 1886 G. F. Deal organized the church in Broken Bow, and the following year the Ortello circuit, comprising the Mount Hope, Ortello, Custer Center, and Union Valley appointments, was cut off. It thus remained until 1894. Broken Bow church was built in 1887 and was served by G. F. Deal, D. W. Proffit, F. W. Brink, and C. D. Stro-

CATHOLIC CHURCH AND RECTORY AT ANSELMO

UNITED BRETHREN IN CHRIST

The United Brethren in Christ were among the pioneers in Custer county, coming in the late '70s. Rev. W. S. Spenner was the first preacher of this denomination to hold regular services in the county, preaching about the year 1876, on the Muddy, near Mason City, and also on the Middle Loup, near where Sargent now is. Under his supervision, Rev. A. L. Pense organized a class near Algernon in 1880, and one in Lee's Park in 1881. In 1882 J. F. Green preached at Algernon, Box Elder, Pilot, Lee's Park, Westerville, Lone Tree, Custer Center, and Ortello. From these were organized, in 1884, Algernon, Westerville, and Custer missions. The first was served by J. F. Green, T. Aikman, J. E. Hawley, S. Dean, B. E. Smith, W. C. Williams, and J. L. Brown, and during mire. From 1894, after losing almost the whole membership by removals, the church was closed until 1897, when F. M. Bell took charge, and the church slowly but surely regained its strength. L. L. Epley had charge in 1900. The people of Custer Center deserve much credit for their loyalty to the church through the years. In Hoosier valley a class was organized in 1897, by C. W. Bohart, and in 1900, one was organized at the Marquis schoolhouse. This church has suffered from removals more than any other church in the county. Among those who have been well known throughout the county and who were active in the early work of the church we would name J. S. Kirkpatrick, D. F. Weimer, G. R. Street, J. J. Pickett, J. C. Maulick, W. M. Harrell, and M. F. Blankenship.

For the compilation of the facts set forth above, this volume is indebted to the Rev. L. L. Epley, for several years a presiding elder in the United Brethren denomination.

THE UNITED BRETHREN BEGIN AT CUSTER CENTER

M. F. Blankenship volunteers the following information concerning the inception of United Brethren denominational work in the county, a work which began at Custer Center.

"Some time during the winter of 1882-3, Rev. Theodore Squires came to the home of M. F. Blankenship, preached the first sermon, and left an appointment to return in two weeks. At the appointed time a good-sized audience greeted him, and the minister, at the close of the service, invited all who wished to unite with the United Brethren church to meet him on the following Wednesday at the home of J. S. Kirkpatrick, in the new town of Broken Bow, which had been laid out in March, 1882. At the time appointed, a class was organized, consisting of John S. Kirkpatrick and wife, James Courtney and wife, and M. F. Blankenship, who was chosen class-leader. James Courtney was chosen class steward and the class was named the Custer Center Class. In a few weeks, Rev. John F. Green was sent to preach for the little church. For two years thereafter he served them faithfully, and was loved and respected by all. Our number increased and religious interest was aroused until we began to feel that a church building was a necessity, but we were all so poor we did not feel able to build. The writer was led to speak to J. S. Kirkpatrick about it, but he thought it was a pretty big undertaking. We asked him to draw up a subscription paper and we would do the soliciting and give the ground for the building. J. S. Kirkpatrick did so, heading the paper with ten dollars opposite his name. M. F. Blankenship placed his name next, with another ten dollars. Then came C. T. Crawford, with a ten-dollar pledge, and R. H. Miller, with five dollars. This was encouraging, for now they had a fund of thirty-five dollars to start with, and they felt sure that the church would be built. In May they met and laid up the walls of sod. A few days later, M. F. Blankenship was plowing in his field east of the church, when a man drove up with a mule team and asked if he was the man who was building the church. He replied that he was as much interested in it as any one. The man told him his name was David Weymer, that he was on his way to Kearney, and that, with M. F. Blankenship's permission, on his return he would stay all night with him and give him ten dollars to apply on the church building fund. Mr. Blankenship assured the man he would be quite welcome, indeed, and true to his word, he did as he said he would do. In June two of their bachelor neighbors (John R. Street and Elmer E. Morris) volunteered to haul the lumber from Kearney for the roofing of the building, and by the last of the month, they had it inclosed but it was seatless. We had no money, so we built some sod pedestals, laid boards on them, scattered some hay on the ground floor, and we were ready for service. The next Sunday the whole neighborhood assembled in the new church, as much pleased as they would have been if they had been in the finest building in the state. We now had a place to worship, and with great pride we wrote our friends in the east that we had a church in our neighborhood. At the first meeting in this new building, we organized a Sunday school. S. S. Southmayd was the first superintendent. In December following, we floored our new church and put in a few seats. By Christmas eve we not only had a floor and seats but we also had a rostrum. They were homely, but good enough, and we felt proud of our success. We had a Christmas tree. The exercises were a success, and we have often thought that we never saw a happier man than was Judge W. W. Cowels on that night. In fact, everybody seemed happy. During the following summer we finished the seating and our church was completed and paid for.

"In 1902 the old sod church was torn down, and in its place was erected a nice little frame building, which was finished and dedicated in the spring of 1903. This church building is twenty-six by thirty-six feet, is in a good state of preservation, and regular services are still kept up. At the present time Rev. G. B. Weaver of Broken Bow is the pastor in charge."

SUNDAY SCHOOLS IN CUSTER COUNTY

The following comprehensive account of Sunday-school work in Custer county is given by J. M. Fodge, who is the veteran Sunday-school man of the county. He and his good wife have lived in Nebraska forty-seven years and in Custer county thirty-five years. For thirty-four years Mr. Fodge has been actively engaged in Sunday-school work—a Sunday-school superintendent for thirty-three years, and president of the county Sunday-school conventions for a number of years.

"In assuming to give to the public a very brief history of the organization and growth of the Sunday schools of our county, I little thought of the obstacles and difficulties which would have to be overcome in order to gather data from which to give a true history. After much fruitless correspondence and begging for information from those who were, in many cases, participants in the organization of some of the first schools in the county, and after weary months of awaiting answers from living witnesses, I am forced to conclude that the Sunday schools, like very many other objects and enterprises which go to make up the history of a people, state, or county, have failed to keep records of any kind, or at best very imperfect records, so that I shall not attempt to give a history of this, one of the greatest factors in the civilization and Christianization of our great commonwealth.

"In the context to follow, I shall endeavor to give to the public in a general way something of the development and growth of the Sunday-school cause since my residence in the county, from the information at my command. Knowing that he who chronicles past events for the scrutiny of the public often receives criticism and even ridicule, I shall at all times be governed by the truth as I understand it. Suffice it to say that such a daring, heroic, and God-fearing people as make up the citizenship of our county, would not live in any place long without raising to the God of our fathers some altar as a remembrance of His mercies to them since leaving the old home, which could be done in no more appropriate way than by meeting together to read His work and study His dealings with the children of men. Indeed, to such an extent were they permeated by this spirit of reverence and thankfulness, that in some cases where a little settlement was formed, even though there were none among them who prayed, they would meet and form an organization for the purpose of praising God and civilizing the community. In some cases this work was begun by missionaries, and in others by some local minister, who, with his family, had come west to find a temporal home.

"In this connection I am indebted to Elder E. D. Eubank for an account of the organization of the first Sunday-school in the county, in what is now Douglas Grove township. This school was organized in the spring of 1875, by Mrs. E. D. Eubank, who was elected superintendent and secretary, with a membership of twelve, who met at the home of Elder Eubank.

It bore the name of 'Christian Union Sunday School,' and upon application to I. D. Gage, state missionary of the American Sunday School Union, was supplied with second-hand books. It was afterward moved to the home of Charles Hales and changed to a Methodist Episcopal school, and eventually it ceased to exist. Prior to the uprising of the Indians, a few men of adventurous and hardy spirit who had settled with their families here and there over parts of the country—on the South Loup, Clear creek, Middle Loup, and Victoria creek—abandoned their homes until the dangers were past. Not until about the year 1880 did the pioneers with families settle in numbers sufficiently strong to begin work for the purpose of bringing about a higher state of civilization and Christianity in their respective neighborhoods. We are informed that on the Middle Loup, near where Walworth now stands, also on Clear creek near Westerville, schools were organized in the year 1881, but we can give no particulars. During the years 1881 and 1882 the settlements in the county extended further west, chiefly along the streams, and in 1883 schools were formed at Broken Bow, Custer Center, Arnold, Delight, Rose Valley, and Ortello.

"Elder F. M. Graham, a local minister of the M. P. denomination, gathered a few persons at the old sod schoolhouse just north of Merna, in May of that year, and the school has continued ever since, except, perhaps, the first winter, and now numbers a membership of more than one hundred. The Ortello school was organized by D. F. Weimer, in June, at his own home, with his family, A. L. Embree and J. H. Edwards—nine persons in all—as members. A year later the place of meeting was changed to the Ortello schoolhouse, where it continues to meet during the whole of each year. Rev. Savidge, a Methodist minister, having located near the present site of Callaway, a Sunday-school was organized. This languished after a year or two, but was reorganized in 1886, after the town of Callaway was started. In 1883 or 1884 Elder Correll, of the Christian church at Arnold, gathered a few persons at his home and organized the first Sunday-school in that vicinity, and the year following both the Methodist and Baptist people started at or near the same place.

"During 1884 and 1885 schools were organized on the South Loup at Burr Oak and Eu-dell; on Clear creek near Myrtle and Lee Park; on the Muddy near Algernon and Mason City; on the Middle Loup at Sargent, West Union, Oxford schoolhouse near Milburn; in 1885 on Wood river near Lodi, at Stop Table, Roten Valley, Sand Creek, Cliff, Maple Grove, Berwyn, and Keota, many of which have continued to flourish both summer and winter, wielding a most healthful influence for good in the respective localities; while others did 'run well for a season' and then, when the dark days of drouth and panic came, succumbed. Up to 1886 the work was carried on in the county locally. Then, as my memory serves me, a movement was made toward organizing a county association, for more perfect work and for the purpose of organizing schools in every settlement, which had by this time spread over nearly the entire county. Among those who were prominent in this movement were Rev. E. A. Russell, a Baptist state Sunday-school missionary, located at Ord; Rev. English, of Arnold; I. N. Atkisson, D. M. Amsberry, Willis Cadwell, W. A. Gilmore, and Dr. J. J. Pickett, of Broken Bow; J. H. Blair and D. S. Weimer, of Ortello. A call was made for a meeting of Sunday-school workers at Broken Bow, a program was prepared and a date fixed for holding a county convention. A temporary organization was effected by electing as president, I. N. Atkisson, and as secretary, Willis Cadwell. When the convention met, a permanent organization was made by adopting a constitution and by-laws. The county was divided into four districts, each part of the county to be under the supervision of a vice-president of the county association, elected by that body. It was the intention of the association to divide each of the districts into minor districts, to be known as township associations, with a vice-president for each of them, under whose supervision a Sunday-school would be organized in every community. This outline of work succeeded admirably in the southeast and northwest quarters especially, to such an extent that in every settlement a school was organized, but in the northeast and southwest quarters there was not such perfect organization—in fact, the southwest district was practically unrepresented in the county association until ten years later. In the years following, this association held annual conventions until the year 1891, when, for some unexplained reason, there was no call made by the president for the executive committee to meet and prepare a program, so in 1892-3-4 the president, D. S. Weimer, having removed from the county, leaving the association without a head, it ceased to exist. Many schools in the county died, partly from lack of the fostering care of county and district associations, but perhaps more because of the discouragements incident to the excessive drouth of 1892-3-4, coupled with the panic which followed—many families removing from the county, leaving homes and all that had been gathered about them since their settlement. This languishing condition of the cause led some of the more zealous workers to take the initiative steps in the resurrection of the county association, or the formation of a new one. Accordingly, in the fall of 1895, a call was made for those interested to meet in Broken Bow, for the purpose of taking action in the matter. The response thereto met fully the expectations of those who had taken the leading steps, the different parts of the county being represented. The records of the former association not being obtainable, it was voted to form a new county organization. This was done by electing L. W. F. Cole, of Sargent, as president, and Mr. Herring as secretary, and by appointing Mrs. Herring, W. C. Elliott, of Mason City, and J. M. Fodge, of Ortello, as a committee on constitution. The county was again divided into districts, each with a vice-president, selected by the district association. Among those prominent in this organization were T. J. Strickler, W. H. Hornday, George Bailey, H. Lomax, E. J. Pittaway, Mrs. Daniel Hagin, W. C. Elliott, and others, whose names I do not recall. By means of this association new energy was given to the schools over the county, new schools were organized, annual conventions were held, and a pledge of fifty dollars made by the old association to the state association was paid, followed by a more hopeful outlook for the future. The officers of the county association were: E. J. Pittaway, president; Rev. Mr. Burns, secretary; and David McGugin, P. Wymore, R. E. Allen, and W. C. Elliott, executive committee.

“Many of the noble men and women who were active in the upbuilding of the Sunday-school work, have gone to other fields to labor; others have been called to their reward beyond this life, and their works do follow them; while yet others are still doing the Master’s work, awaiting that call. Whatever else can be said of the efforts and labors of these consecrated ones, all must admit that a high state of civilization and Christianity pervades our society by reason of the upholding of the Master’s standing in this line of work.

“The result of this reorganization of the county association was to line up and get in touch with the schools of the county, establish new ones where it could be done, and to divide the county into four districts, with a president for each district, to be elected by and from the schools that comprised that district, the president of the district to be vice-president of the county, and a member of the executive committee of the Custer County Sunday-school Association. The duties of said district president were to establish sub-districts, hold convention, therein each year, and to make annual report to the county convention, as to number of schools, pupils, and officers, the number of conventions held, and such other items as would give the county association complete information as to the Sunday-school interests of his district.

“For example, the reports from the several districts, through their presidents, to the county convention in 1899, showed in the county fourteen district conventions held; and seventy-six schools, with average enrollment of 3,339 pupils. Is not this well worth the effort to organize and to encourage the people to put forth an effort in every community to study God’s Word, to band together as Christian workers to counterbalance the work of the evil one?

"Following are the names of persons who have been elected and served as president of the county association since its organization, in 1886, for one or more terms, up to and including 1918-19: I. N. Atkisson, J. J. Pickett, I. W. F. Cole, D. F. Weimer, T. A. Moss, E. J. Pittaway, Uriah Keeler, H. Lomax, J. R. Dean, and J. M. Fodge, the last named having

J. M. FODGE

For many years president of Custer County
Sunday School Association

been re-elected consecutively each year since May 27, 1905.

"In giving this account of the work of the Sunday-schools and the association, with what has been accomplished by their efforts, we cannot, if we would dare, give the credit for the success to any one, or to all of the presidents above named, although all have enjoyed the esteem of their friends and some have held positions as law-makers, place on the supreme bench of our state, county offices, and other places of trust and honor in the formation of our commonwealth, and some only the humble public place. Yet to them is due only a share of the credit.

"We recall with all of appreciation the faces and names of the many whom we have met so often in the almost third of a century since the beginning of our labors in this county for the cause of the Master, and whom we learned to love and esteem. In the ministry we may mention the following names: Correll, Graham, Hagin, Stromire, Tubbs, English, Maze, Strickler, Brink, Stromire, Moss, Bradley, Richards, Wagner, Rasey, Smith, Sumner, Tool, Hall, Bell, Megan, Burns, Baress, and Cadwell. Of the laymen: Judson, Chumbley, Woody, Wymore, Hagin, Drums, Kerr, Damon, Cole, Barns, Chesley, Samuelson, Sanderson, Burrows, Foster, Walburn, Hanley, Lucas, Moomey, Pierce, Eastman, McGreggan, Mason, Nichols, Narragan, Franklin, Mills, Needham, Skillman, Amsberry, Conant, and Walton and Allen, with a host of others that space forbids to mention. All of these unselfishly gave their influence, counsel, time, and voice to encourage the cause that was so dear to their hearts in those pioneer days.

STATE SUNDAY SCHOOL CONVENTION AT BROKEN BOW

"In these days of large things, big jobs, colossal undertakings, we realize perhaps, more than ever, the benefit, encouragement, enthusiasm, inspiration, and determination we receive when we rub up against some one who has done things, has won, has overcome obstacles that seemed insurmountable, and we are more determined because that one has overcome some big task.

"It was because we had come in contact with such persons in the Sunday-school work, met them in our county and state conventions, and realized that they had become specialists in their work; it was because of this encouragement that your county officers were emboldened to think that 'Big Custer' might entertain the state Sunday School Association convention. It was with trepidation that we dared to speak to our most progressive and staunch workers, because of the magnitude of the undertaking, the possibility that we could not make a win of it.

"Then it was that we remembered that others had been able to do it, and so, as we went over the county with the state secretaries, meeting the workers of our county in district conventions in the year 1914, we suggested to them the idea, asking their help, and receiving some encouragement, we determined to put the matter up to the county convention, which was done and their approval secured. We immediately set in motion, plans to get the co-operation of Broken Bow, and the backing of the business men was soon obtained.

"It was then that the work was begun, by the appointment of the necessary committee to arrange the details, to carry the Broken Bow proposition and invitation to the board of managers of the state association, which would meet, at Aurora, in June, 1914.

"When the convention assembled, Custer county Sunday-schools and association were greatly in evidence. With a large delegation from the county, with badges, banners, and yells, with Scripture mottos, Big Custer was put on the map. Result, the 1915 State Sunday School Association convention was coming to Broken Bow.

"To many of our people this was their first opportunity to meet the lecture-speakers and specialists in Sunday-school methods and modern equipment, and all this would surely leave some ideals and aspiration in the minds and hearts of some young workers, the impress of noble, spiritual men and women. But the greatness, and magnitude of the job was yet before us. Would we be equal to the occasion? Could we do what we had promised the workers of the year ago? The task was yet before us.

"In the meantime every phase of the work necessary to meet, greet, and welcome the great host that would surely come to us, had been looked after, so that every one was entertained and cared for in the homes and public houses. The spirit of doing great things had caught our people to a degree that brought praise and compliments from our guests, from the first to the closing day of the convention."

What was the Broken Bow state convention, as to numbers and enthusiasm, as compared to former conventions? We will let State Secretary W. H. Kimberly tell: "I want to say, friends, to the people of Broken Bow, and to the Custer county association, that this is the record-breaker convention; the registration has gone nearly 600 above the high mark of former conventions. We never before spoke to such large audiences. We never saw so much enthusiasm in the convention work: entertainment and management have been of the highest order. We have never had smoother working machinery. The officers of the state association thank the committees, the people of Broken Bow, and the officers of Custer County Sunday School Association for our great convention."

The enrollment of the state convention was thirty per cent. greater than any previous convention.

Nowhere on the planet can be found a more sociable people than the Custerites have always been. In pioneer times they were not given to overmuch formality, but possessed that free and easy sociability and hospitality that always mark the western people. They visited in each other's homes, they congregated in the schoolhouses, they held public celebrations, a picnic was a favorite way of spending the day, informal dinner parties were served as often in the society of forty years ago as in that of to-day, according to population. Many of the prominent settlers had, before their migration, belonged to lodges of the east, and, with a lodgeman's nose for smelling out fraternal kinship, they formed their cliques and clans, which ripened into warm friendship before enough kindred spirits had arrived to form the lodge.

To illustrate some of the gatherings of pioneer days, elsewhere in this chapter will be found an account of a stag party and broncho entertainment which gives a very vivid portrayal of early society, before the advent of women. Reference is made to Mrs. Stuckey's dinner-party story, to show the improvement in society after the advent of women.

AN EARLY-DAY FEED

Mrs. H. C. Stuckey gives this glimpse of early-day society "pulling off" a dinner party:

"We would arrange to get together, as many as possible, on some set day, and go all together to the ranch of some neighbor. We never sent any warning when we might be expected, but we were always welcome, always had a good dinner, and the cook was never put out. Let me describe a ranch dinner of the olden time. This, of course, is an invited dinner. There were no menu cards, but there were turkey, chicken, quail stuffed with oysters, chicken salad, all kinds of vegetables, jellies and preserves made from wild fruit which grew in abundance in the canyons, cakes and dainty desserts of various kinds, coffee, tea, or chocolate. The table was always beautiful, no matter how plain the surroundings. No fine paintings adorned the walls, but many pretty things for the table had been brought from eastern homes. Sometimes there was a knife short, but the butcher knife was drafted into service and proved an excellent substitute. Perhaps there were not enough chairs to accommodate all of the guests, but several molasses kegs, with which the ranch always abounded, were brought into requisition; a long board was laid on them and covered over with robes, which made a seat good enough for a king—a cattle king, at least. The hospitality of ranch days was unbounded —not the chilly and what-did-you-come-for hospitality of to-day.”

A STAG PARTY PERFORMANCE

Anent the hilarious times of early days, when whole-hearted hospitality was extended by every ranch to anybody that might pull the latch-string, and where neighbors were always welcome to shove their feet under the table or crawl into a bunk, R. E. Brega, of Callaway, gives an interesting account of an early-day stag party that took place on the Benger & Brown ranch, which was then located in Brown valley, about five miles southwest of the present Callaway. Brega describes it somewhat like this:

“On that memorable occasion there were present: Charles Thornburg, M. E. Schneringer, Fred Brown, George O. Benger, J. J. Douglass, R. E. Brega, and others, now forgotten. The first act on the program was to kill a sheep, the next to elect a cook, and by the way, in those days, the men were all pretty good cooks. The balance of the programme went round in circles. In turn, each told a story, sang a song, danced a jig, or played a tune on an old accordeon which Fred Brown brought from England, and the awful screeches of which told stories of neuralgia, rheumatism, and gout—and made the screech owls green with envy.

“At the end of each round, there was served, lamb, ram, sheep-meat, or mutton, together with pancakes and coffee. This continued through the night, until the lamb had entirely disappeared, and the pancakes ceased to be made, for lack of flour.

“That you may better determine the degree of enjoyment experienced by the participants, it is added that forty-eight hours later, George and Fred were located under a hay-stack, sound asleep—while the sheep wandered on the hills far away.”

FUN WITH A MEEK-EYED BRONCHO

A diverting record is that which follows:

“In early days they enjoyed life in various ways and one of the great factors of our early life, were the antics of the playful broncho.

To get an innocent tender-foot on ‘Sky-scraper,’ ‘Starjumper,’ ‘Dynamite,’ ‘Thunder-bolt,’ or some other ‘cowboy-buster,’ afforded much amusement, and I recall now, how mean we were, for the higher he went, and the harder he fell, the better we liked it. My sides ache when I think of one instance. Finch-Hatton Brothers had just received a friend from England, who was making a short stay, and who was afterward known as Frank Bannister. Frank was a very humane and kind-hearted fellow. He thought it was wrong—very wrong—to put a heavy saddle on a little broncho, and, in addition, he thought it was unnecessary. To be brief, he presented a very forcible lecture along this line, and insisted that we should use light saddles or ride our horses bare-back. Still further, to back up his assertions, he longed for an opportunity to demonstrate the correctness of his idea, remarking, ‘If I only had what you term a mean horse, I would be glad to show you how nice he would act.’ Well, this was something ‘soft.’ We had been looking for him for a long time, and before he concluded his sermon on the pony, Frank Brega slipped into the barn and brought forth a very pretty black mare called ‘Deceiver.’ By way of introduction, I will say that Al Wise, a noted broncho man of those days, had given her up as a bad job, and sent her further west. This pony was quiet and very gentle about the barn, which fact had given rise to her name, ‘Deceiver.’

“Mr. Bannister’s nerve was with him; he threw a blanket on the pony, and was on her back in a jiffy. Round and round he went! Not a pitch; not a buck. The crowd felt like—the boy the hen ran over, but our time was yet to come. ‘All things come to those who wait.’ Yet the crowd was impatient. Finally the pony was called to a halt just in front of the cabin door. Then it was that our punishment commenced, for how he did boast! ‘I will now,’ he said, ‘be able to go back to England and tell the people how the pony will be spared in the future.’ In this manner he continued for a time that seemed like ages, when a gentle wind came to our relief. A small whirlwind turned over a paper near the pony.

It would take an eye-witness with a circus education to tell the rest. 'He didn't know it was loaded,' but it went off just the same. He struck the building like a thousand bricks. How the crowd did double up and howl. They had laughing-stock enough to last six months. Frank has been in this country now many years, and no one has ever heard him talk of light saddles since, and if you see him riding, take notice that he rides a forty-pounder."

A PIONEER PICNIC

Twenty-six years after the organization of the county, the old settlers organized an Old Settlers' Association and arranged for the first annual picnic, to be held at Broken Bow, August 5, 1903. The account of the picnic, as it appeared in a local paper at the time, is inserted here, to show the spirit of the pioneers at that time and also because it contains valuable data:

"The first annual picnic of the Old Settlers' Association of Custer county, held in the public park at Broken Bow, August 5th, was a far greater success than was anticipated by any one. The crowd commenced to gather early, and by eleven o'clock quite a representative number of people had assembled. In the forenoon a business session was held, at which time officers were elected for the ensuing year. The officers are as follows: President, L. H. Jewett; first vice-president, J. E. Cavanaugh; second vice-president, J. R. Land; secretary-treasurer, E. R. Purcell; historian, George B. Mair. With the exception of Mr. Lang the officers were the same as for the preceding year.

"At twelve o'clock, dinner was spread in the park, and a very large number of picnic parties were scattered about the grassy plots in the splendid shade. It is estimated that about 500 people occupied the park during the noon hour. At 1:30 o'clock the Broken Bow band gave a half-hour concert, while the people were assembling. At two o'clock the gathering was called to order and the program commenced. By this time the crowd had swelled to immense proportions, and upward of 1,500 people congregated around the speaker's stand. President Jewett called the meeting to order, and made a very appropriate speech. The address of welcome on behalf of the city was then delivered by Mayor E. R. Purcell. Harry O'Neill, of Omaha, speaker of the day, was introduced, and entertained the audience for half an hour with a splendid talk. Mr. O'Neill is one of the old-time residents of Custer county, and his speech, as well as his presence here, was enjoyed by all. The Ryerson quartette then favored the audience with a choice selection, after which Daniel Sage, the long-haired poet, read one of his popular poems. Mrs. Stuckey, Broken Bow's popular singer, also favored the audience with a selection, which was heartily applauded. Another number on the program, which was appreciated, was a poem written by Tommy Burlin, and it was read by Mrs. G. O. Joyner, of Ortello. Mrs. Alice Dowse Sims read a paper descriptive of the first settlers of the northeast corner of Custer county, which was very entertaining.

"The balance of the program was given over to reminiscent talks from quite a number of old-time residents of Custer county, and this part of the program was a genuine treat to everyone. Among those who spoke were J. M. Fodge, Jess Gandy, H. M. Sullivan, Mrs. Moses Lewis, Alpha Morgan, Jud Kay, C. H. Jeffords, J. D. Ream, and G. R. Russom.

"The award of medals was an interesting feature of the day. The following are the winners: The earliest male settler of Custer county in attendance at the picnic, L. R. Dowse, of Comstock, who dates his residence from August, 1873. Mrs. L. R. Dowse won the medal for the earliest female settler of Custer county in attendance at the picnic. She came here in January, 1874. The earliest male child born in Custer county, in attendance at the picnic, was John F. Bell, of New Helena. Mr. Bell was born in New Helena, in March, 1876. The oldest female child born in Custer county, in attendance at the picnic, was found to be Mrs. Alice Dowse Sims, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Dowse, who won the medal for the oldest settlers. Mrs. Sims was born February 22, 1875. The four winners were called to the platform, where the medals were presented by Mr. Fodge. The committee on these awards consisted of J. M. Fodge, John Reese, and J. J. Douglass.

"The unsuccessful contestants for these medals were as follows: For oldest male settler Florian Jacobs, New Helena, November, 1875. For the oldest female settler, Mrs. Nc George, May 20, 1875. For the first-born boy, Lilburn Oxford, born July 22, 1876; and C. O. Taylor, born January 26, 1880. For the first-born girl, Mrs. Hattie Carr Osborne, born September 6, 1878; Mrs. Maude Noble Gliem, born September 11, 1878; Miss Myrtle Allen, born February 28, 1881; Miss Madge Potts, born May 25, 1881.

"Mr. Dowse, who up to the present time holds the record of being the oldest member of the association in attendance at the picnic, has been a resident of Custer county for almost thirty years. Whether he will be able to retain this, we cannot say. It is the intention of the association to award these medals each year, to the oldest settlers and the earliest born who are in attendance at each picnic. The program continued until nearly five o'clock, but the visiting and intermingling continued in the park for several hours later. The day was a decided success from every standpoint. The weather was all that could be desired, the program was replete with splendid things and the sociability of the crowd was a feature that was noticeable on every hand. It is a foregone conclusion that the old settlers' picnic of this county will be a great event every year. The membership of this organization at this time numbers something like 300 people, and it will no doubt continue to grow until the membership reaches into the thousands. Next week we expect to publish the papers that were read at this meeting.

"Among the very old settlers who were in attendance at the picnic in this city on Wednesday, we note the following: 1873: Mr. and Mrs. L. R. Dowse, of Comstock. 1874: J. R. Forsythe, New Helena; Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Lang, Algernon; W. H. Comstock, Comstock. 1875: William O. Boley, New Helena; Mr. and Mrs. H. C. Stuckey, Tuckerville; Mrs.

Nc George, Cumro; Florian Jacobs, New Helena; J. J. Douglass, Callaway. 1876: John E. Myers, Georgetown; John F. Bell, New Helena. 1877: R. E. Glass, Broken Bow. 1878: Mr. and Mrs. D. M. Amsberry, Broken Bow; J. E. Cavenee, Georgetown. 1879: J. O. Taylor, Berwyn; J. G. W. Lewis, Broken Bow; Jules Haumont, Elton. 1880: E. Taylor, Broken Bow; J. D. Ream, Broken Bow; Jacob Mauk, Broken Bow; Mrs. M. E. Lewis, Broken Bow; C. S. Elison, Ansley; W. P. Trew, Georgetown; P. F. Campbell, Georgetown; Mr. and Mrs. Jess Gandy, Broken Bow; James Lindly, Anselmo; A. L. Morgan, Cumro; C. W. Hoagland, Gates; J. H. Price, Broken Bow; Mr. and Mrs. James Daly, Merna; Mr. and Mrs. James Wood, Merna; R. R. Robinson, New Helena; John Snyder, New Helena; W. T. Powers, Broken Bow; J. H. Molvaney, Georgetown; Mrs. I. A. Reneau, Broken Bow."

AN OLD SETTLERS' ASSOCIATION

The first old settlers' association ever organized in the county, so far as obtainable records show, was the old settlers' association of the northwest quarter of Custer county, which was organized in 1890. At this time the oldest settlers in the district would have been residents only nineteen years. The meeting for the organization of this association was held in the home of J. J. Joyner, seven or eight miles west of the present town of Merna.

At this time temporary officers were elected. J. J. Joyner was made temporary chairman and D. V. Joyner temporary secretary. A committee, consisting of J. M. Fodge, S. H. Read, and S. K. Redman, was appointed to report on form of organization. The committee made an informal report, and after its adoption the permanent officers were elected, as follows: J. J. Joyner, president; J. M. Fodge, first vice-president; S. H. Read, second vice-president; W. M. McCandless, third vice-president; G. O. Joyner, secretary. The program committee of that year's picnic consisted of J. K. Cooper, Joe Kellenbarger, and Mrs. H. C. Fodge.

From this time on until the present time, the association has not failed to hold its annual picnic. These occasions have always been of a very enjoyable nature. The minutes of the association have been well kept and the organization is to be congratulated upon the data they have compiled. The minute book, which contains the membership roll, gives the names of 231 old settlers, with the respective years of their settlement.

1883 WAS THE BOOM YEAR

The dates of settlement show that of the first one hundred, two came in 1874, one in 1875, one in 1876, two in 1878, two in 1879, eleven in 1880, three in 1881, twenty-one in 1882, thirty-four in 1883, eighteen in 1884,

Association of the South Loup was organized. Then was held our first picnic. The thought of organizing and holding an annual picnic was first suggested by Mr. William Brown, who now resides, I believe, in Buffalo county. The grounds were located by Mr. Brown, Mr. Sammie Robinson, and Ne George. The speaker at our first celebration was Rev. Alex. Boyd, who recently moved to Illinois.

"Speakers, distinguished for their ability, from different parts of the country, have entertained us year by year. Among them we remember Rev. Crist, N. Dwight Ford, J. J. Douglass, Rev. W. L. Gaston, and Judge Sutton, of Omaha. Judge Sullivan, of Broken Bow, addressed us last year. His address was four in 1885, and one in 1886. Thirty-three present of this hundred came in the years 1882, 1883, and 1884. Those were the influx years, not only of the northwest quarter of the county but also in all parts.

OLD SETTLERS' ASSOCIATION OF SOUTH LOUP

One of the most successful and aggressive old-settlers' organizations of the county is the South Loup association, which has been in existence for ten years, and holds annually a picnic, the attendance and entertainment of which are famous throughout the county.

Mrs. Ne George, in a brief paper written not long since, outlines the inception and details the history of this organization. Because of its historic value the paper is here submitted:

"Ten years ago, in 1908, the Old Settlers' replete with patriotism and stirred the red blood of every patriotic citizen.

"We elect officers annually. Mr. James B. Jones was our first president and has served in this capacity a number of times since, which proves that some officers at least, 'are born, not made.' Mr. William Shoemaker is our present president, and I am sure you will concur with me in the dictum that he has done splendidly in giving us a pleasant and happy time together to-day. We have always been helped with the programmes rendered, and amused with various sports, but best of all is the greeting from old friends. The spoken word, the hearty handshake, and the forming of new acquaintances year by year, is a wonderful inspiration.

"Roughly speaking, at our first gathering

there were 500 people in attendance. At that time we were made happy at the prospect of the association being a success, by there being two automobiles on the grounds, one owned by Mr. Lambert Johnson, of Sumner, and the other owned by Mr. Venus Goodwin, of the same place. Now all have noted the difference in this respect to-day.

"Since the first year or two, the increase in attendance has been plainly manifest, and a thousand people would not be an exaggeration. Last year was a record-breaker and there were probably 1,500 people on the grounds. To-day we miss some familiar faces,—those of persons who have left us in recent years and months, among them being Mr. George Lash, Mrs. Ezra Wright, Mrs. Whitman Robinson, Mrs. Walter Brown, Mrs. George Williams, Mr. Eulie Brown, Mr. Joseph Cherry, Mr. Adelbert Mason, Mr. David Downey, Mrs. A. L. Downey. Most of these, if living, would be here to-day. Many of our younger men are in our national cantonments, training for service. Two boys from this immediate locality who were with us one short year ago are now in France. One, Arthur Stuckey, born and reared partly in a nearby neighborhood, sleeps the last, long sleep in France to-day.

"It has been the endeavor of the association to keep the morale high and to make the annual picnic a day in which all can find enjoyment of a high order."

ANCIENT FREE AND ACCEPTED MASONS

The annals of Masonry in Custer county date back to the coming of the settlers. Although no lodge was organized until 1885, eight years after the organization of the county, a number of the settlers were Masons and connected with lodges in their former homes. The late Frank H. Young, who during the last forty years had been the first apostle of Masonry in the county, if not in the state, joined the Masons in 1874, and in 1877, the year that the county was organized, he attended for the first time the grand lodge of the state. Thereafter he attended every session of the grand lodge up to and including the session of 1917. This remarkable record made him an attending delegate for forty consecutive annual sessions. With the record of such a man, and those of other kindred spirits, the work of Masonry had place in the county before the organization of the first lodge.

Credit is due to Alpha Morgan for the following epitome of Free Masonry history in the county:

The records of the Grand Lodge, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons of Nebraska, show that on July 13, 1885, a dispensation was granted by the then grand master, Monoah B. Reese, late supreme judge of the supreme court of Nebraska, to fifteen Master Masons to open a lodge at Broken Bow, under the name of Custer Lodge, U. D., with Frank H. Young, as worshipful master; James M. Kelsey, senior warden; and Hollis G. Rogers, junior warden of the new lodge. In addition to the above named brethren, the fifteen named included Isaac Merchant, Robert H. Miller, Leander H. Jewett, Michael Conley, James Lindly, Harvey Said, William H. Russell, Thomas T. Williams, Cornelius R. Pratt, Albert G. Bemis, Charles Kloman, and Ira M. Foster.

Brother Edward F. McClure informs us that during the previous spring he interviewed Robert H. Miller, the then editor and proprietor of the Custer County Republican, and suggested the calling together of the Free Masons of the county for the purpose of taking steps to organize a lodge. This undertaking may be judged when we consider that above named gentlemen lived from Lee's Park, on the east, to where now Callaway is, on the west; from New Helena, on the north, to near where Oconto is, on the south—a varying distance of sixty miles apart.

Brother McClure took it on himself to write each of these brethren a letter setting forth the object of the meeting, and fixed the time at the convening of the spring term of the district court, which was presided over by Judge Savage. The place of meeting was the Community building, which is now a part of the Burlington hotel, and the upstairs of which was a hall for all manner of meetings, as well as for holding court. At that meeting steps were taken that resulted later in the granting of the dispensation.

The records available show that Milo F. Young, the father of the first worshipful master, was the first initiate, and James D. Ream the second to be inducted into the mysteries. During the first year the degrees were conferred on Charles Penn, Robert P. McKnight, Emerson H. Potts (from near where Lomax now stands), Edmund King, Harvey B. Andrews, Walter C. Bedwell, Diah Woodruff, George E. Carr, Osborne P. Perley, William G. Brotherton, and James G. Brenizer. Brother Brenizer had already received the first two degrees, in Keystone Lodge, Number 2, located at Phillips, Nebraska, but by request was "raised" in the new lodge. All of above named were more or less active in the development and advancement of the new county, and one frequently meets with their names among the county records, in some capacity or another.

When we realize that the scope of territory covered by these different brothers and the amount of work accomplished during the year, as well as the conditions under which the work was done, we cannot but help compare our present surroundings and wonder what we would have done under the same conditions. Brother McClure tells us that the ante-room had cracks through which "a cat could be thrown," and when the cold, chilling blasts of the north wind would swoop down upon them during work, the candidate, as well as the brethren, would hug the stove in real earnestness.

At the annual meeting of the grand lodge in June, 1886, a charter was granted the new lodge, under the name of Emmet Crawford Lodge, Number 148. The selection of this name was due to the fact that in January, 1886, Captain Emmet Crawford, of the Regular Army, was murdered by a company of Mexican soldiers just across the border. He was buried at Kearney, Nebraska, April 11, 1886, having a military and Masonic funeral—one of the largest funerals ever held in the state. Regular Army officers came from Colorado, Missouri, and other places, as detailed, while numerous members of the craft were present, not only from Nebraska, but also Kansas, Colorado, Iowa, and Missouri. Captain Crawford was a member of Richmond Lodge, Number 230, Philadelphia, and the manner of his death not only excited the interest of army and fraternal circles but caused governmental inquiry and action. The burial having occurred a few weeks prior to the meeting of the grand lodge of Masons in Omaha, and the grand secretary, Brother William R. Bowen, being an ex-officer of the United States army, suggested the name for the new lodge, and it was adopted and accepted.

At the time Emmet Crawford Lodge was instituted, the nearest lodge to the east was at Grand Island, while to the west there was none in Nebraska. Its jurisdictional territory was much larger than many of our eastern states, but in population it was "few and far between." As the distance to travel in going to and from lodge was great, and the roads led across the treeless prairie, regular meeting-night was fixed on Saturday night on or before the full of the moon, so that the weary sojourner would have the light of that luminary to cheer him on his way.

While the surroundings, furnishings, and buildings were primitive as compared with those of to-day, yet to hear those old-timers tell it, they had many an enjoyable evening in concourse with their brethren, interspersed with an occasional banquet and dance, typical of the whole-heartedness of the times.

The first Masonic funeral, that of Edmund King, who was shot and killed by a dwarf, Ed. Demerit, was held on December 16, 1888, a goodly number of brethren from adjoining towns being present to assist.

As the settlement of the county increased, new centers sprang up, so it was not long until other lodges were formed, and in August, 1887, Mason City received a dispensation, on the petition of eight Master Masons; also Merna Lodge was formed, on the petition of nine Master Masons; while in February, 1888, Gladstone Lodge, of Ansley, was established, on the petition of sixteen Master Masons, the last two being recommended by Emmet Crawford Lodge.

On November 24, 1890, the members of Merna and Emmet Crawford Lodges, were invited by the most worshipful grand master, Robert E. French, to assist in the laying of the corner-stone of the Protestant Episcopal church at Callaway. This was the first corner-stone laid in the county under the auspices of the Masons. At this meeting, steps were by John Finch, who was re-elected and served for fifteen consecutive years—the longest record of all in the county.

December 10, 1904, on petition of eleven brethren, a dispensation was granted to form Anselmo Lodge, with Brother John J. Tooley as master; George E. Carr, senior warden; and Ira M. Foster, junior warden.

October 18, 1912, twenty-two Master Masons petitioned for a dispensation, which was granted, to form Swastika Lodge, at Sargent, taken for the formation of a lodge of Free Masons, so that on January 31, 1891, a dispensation was granted, on the petition of nine Master Masons, for Parian Lodge, at Callaway, with Brother Frank H. Young as its master; Michael Conley, senior warden; and Andrew J. McMurtry, junior warden. This was recommended by Merna Lodge.

LAYING CORNER STONE OF MASONIC TEMPLE AT ANSELMO

On November 17, 1893, on the petition of fourteen Master Masons, a dispensation was granted to open a lodge at Arnold, under the name of Cable Lodge. Albert G. Hoffman was named as its first master, in which office he continued two years, and he was succeeded with Brother Fred F. Cram as its master; E. Miller, senior warden; and Andrew F. Phillips, junior warden.

To the parent lodge, Emmet Crawford, each of these lodges looked for assistance, which it received, either in contribution of members at the time of formation, help in conferring the degrees, or such other aid as was needed. In their turn each of these have contributed to the parent by furnishing members for the "higher" degrees, such as chapter, council, and commandery, for Broken Bow has each of these bodies and is prepared to confer all the degrees of Ancient York Rite Masonry.

The total membership of the lodges of the county, as furnished by report to the last grand lodge, is 662. Add to this 138 Royal Arch Masons, 100 Royal and Select Masters, eighty-five Knights Templars, and some 300 that belong to the Scottish Rite, one can have a fair idea of the interest taken in the mysteries of Masonry by the inhabitants of the county.

Several of the lodges own their own homes, and many thousands of dollars have thus been expended in the upbuilding of their respective communities, by the erection of handsome buildings, used for lodge halls and business blocks. Perhaps those of Ansley, Anselmo, and Callaway are more worthy of special mention, as the buildings of the fraternity in those towns are splendid monuments to the zeal, industry, and self-sacrifice of the brethren. Each of these buildings has fine appointments and is beautifully furnished, tending to make one feel that true fraternalism prevails.

The grand lodge has at different times recognized the spirit prevailing, and has never hesitated to come when called upon for special ceremonies, such as the laying of corner-stones for public buildings, as well as lodge halls, the dedication of these halls, the holding of funerals of distinguished members, and other work of similar order.

Then, too, there are in the county, many of the members of the order who have received the highest honors that can be bestowed. Brother Reuben B. Mullins is now the only thirty-third-degree Mason in the county, and, indeed, it is an honor to be thus recognized for some meritorious act. The late Julius J. Wilson served the craft as grand high priest of Royal Arch Masonry in the state, during the year 1909. Alpha Morgan served as grand master of Masons during 1913 and 1914, and later as grand patron of the Order of Eastern Star. Judge N. Dwight Ford is the retiring grand patron of the Eastern Star, and Henry H. Andrews is now grand sentinel of the same order.

The late lamented Frank H. Young served the craft well, having held all the grand lodge offices of Ancient York Masonry that it was within the power of the craft to bestow, as well as that of grand patron of the Eastern Star. Reference has been made, elsewhere, to the record made by Brother Young in attending every consecutive session of the Grand Lodge for full forty years without break or interruption. In this connection it should be stated that during that time all the money allowed by the grand lodge for mileage and expenses was turned back into a charity fund for a children's home which he had planned and hoped to establish. The fund so started, grew until it reached $100,000, then its increment became available for use. Until this principal amount was reached not a dollar was ever used, so in a very large sense Frank H. Young was the founder of the cottage home for children, located in Fremont, and owned and maintained by the Masons. This home was built in 1915. For nine years Brother Young was the president of the Nebraska Masonic Home, at Plattsmouth, Nebraska, which institution has furnished home and comfort for a great many aged people. In point of attendance at grand lodge Mr. Young ranked second in the state. To augment his record of forty consecutive sessions at grand lodge he has a record of thirty-six consecutive sessions of the grand chapter and twenty-nine consecutive sessions of the grand commandery of the state.

FRANK H. YOUNG

In the general statement concerning the work of Masons in the county Mr. Morgan has given a skeleton outline, and very modestly has refrained from mentioning any of the service rendered the order by himself. Mr. Alpha Morgan is one of the prominent Masons of the state. He has passed through all the chairs of the grand lodge, and while grand

John J. Tooley is now deputy grand master of the state, and the brethren feel confident that he will be advanced to the higher position, that of grand master.

INDEPENDENT ORDER OF ODD FELLOWS

The Independent Order of Odd Fellows comes in for its share of importance, in the part it played in the early history of Custer county. It came with the pioneers, more than forty years ago, but no organized effort was made among the Odd Fellows of the county until the citizens of Broken Bow applied for a charter and Broken Bow Lodge, No. 119, was formed, June 21, 1884, with eleven charter members. Dr. R. C. Talbot, of Broken Bow, whose name appears on the charter, is the only one of that number still living.

The first meeting was held in the old city hall,—a building which now forms a part of the Burlington hotel,—the officers at that time being: N. H. Hopkins, noble grand; A. W. Gandy, vice-grand; L. H. Jewett, secretary. In decided contrast to the old meeting place is their present home, a beautiful white glazed-brick, fire-proof structure, which was erected and dedicated in 1916, at a cost of about $20,000. They now have one of the best halls in the state and a membership of 179.

In point of membership, W. G. Purcell is the oldest member in Custer county, having joined the order in 1882, and he has served a major part of that time as secretary of Broken Bow Lodge, No. 119.

The different branches of the order in this city have been highly complimented, by reason of the fact that each has been represented at the grand bodies in the jurisdiction of Nebraska. Mrs. Margaret Holcomb, of Rebekah Lodge, No. 110, was president of the Rebekah assembly the year 1911-2. W. G. Purcell was grand patriarch at the session of the grand encampment October, 1906; October, 1907. Dr. T. W. Bass was grand master of the 1912-13 session of the grand lodge, Nebraska jurisdiction, and in point of membership was the youngest grand master to serve, having come into the order April 23, 1900. During his administration the membership of master made a record of which his fellow craftsmen are proud. At the present time he occupies the exalted capitular position of grand king and in two years more will pass to the higher honors of grand priest.

Outside of fraternal circles Mr. Morgan is one of the first citizens of the county. An attorney of note and prominence in the county bar, he is a graduate of the law department of the Iowa State University, and he has been a resident of the county since 1887.

the state made a healthy growth. He was representative from the Nebraska jurisdiction at three sessions of the sovereign grand lodge — at Minneapolis, Minnesota; Atlantic City, New Jersey; and San Francisco, California.

Since the organization of the Broken Bow Lodge, have been organized in the county, lodges at Arnold, Callaway, Oconto, Anselmo, Merna, Berwyn, Ansley, Mason City, Sargent, Comstock, and Westerville, with a total membership in the county of 1,139. The lodges in Custer county are in a flourishing condition, many of them owning their own homes.

MODERN WOODMEN OF CUSTER COUNTY

Custer Camp, No. 4477, was organized at Broken Bow in 1897, with a very small membership. The Modern Woodmen of America is probably the strongest fraternal-insurance organization in this country, and the local camp at once became a popular one. It has grown rapidly in numbers, until at the present time it has a membership of 330 and is second in size of all the camps in this part of the state.

Custer Camp holds its meetings the second and fourth Tuesday evenings of each month, in the new I. O. O. F. building. The present officers are: N. Dwight Ford, venerable consul; Thomas H. Brown, adviser; E. H. Holcomb, banker; G. T. Robinson, clerk; and M. M. Runyan, escort.

ANSLEY'S LODGES

Ansley Lodge, No. 156, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, was organized December 8, 1887. Charter members: George W. Baugh, Daniel Hagin, E. H. Gaines, Robert J. Mills, Thomas J. Wood, O. M. Geeseman, Dana M. Saville, A. R. Humphrey, Edgar A. Hainsworth, J. J. Brown, and D. M. Amsberry. The present membership is 119, and the oldest member is C. S. Ellison. The present officers are: Noble grand, William Price; vice-grand, A. L. Real; treasurer, S. G. McCollister; secretary, L. D. Russell. Meetings are held every Wednesday evening.

The Ansley Rebekah Lodge was organized October 17, 1908, with the following charter members: Henry Schmid, A. Tina Hare, Agnes Carothers, John Thornton, A. H. Turpen, R. J. Holeman, E. G. Taylor, C. C. Tabor, C. E. Lawson, J. H. Carothers, Laura Turpen, Minnie Taylor, Mary Carothers, Elizabeth Geeseman, Hattie Thornton, Emilie Schmid, Herma Lawson, Jennie Geeseman, and Ogle Varney. The lodge is at present in good working order. During the ten years of its life, it has lost but one member by death, Sister Anna Harris, who answered to the last call on June 20, 1918. During the past year, the lodge has received by initiation, transfer, and reinstatement, twenty-one members. Our present membership is sixty-two. Present officers: Noble grand, Agula Springman; vice-grand, Emily Real; secretary, Addie Fowler; treasurer, Mary Nelms. "Our motto is friendship, love and truth; our aim is peace, harmony, and prosperity."

The charter for Gladstone Lodge No. 176, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, was issued February 18, 1888, to Francis M. Rublee, Brougham Stevenson, William O. Chapman, William D. Fritz, James F. Sharpless, Hiram H. Wirt, E. R. Burrows, Philip M. Evans, James W. Fairfield, Marion G. Hayes, John W. Russell, C. J. Stevens, Thomas T. Williams, Thomas A. White, James M. Scott, and Isaac Clark. The first meeting was held February 20, 1888, with the following officers: F. M. Rublee, worshipful master; Brougham Stevenson, senior warden; William O. Chapman, junior warden; Clark J. Stevens, treasurer; Edwin H. Burrows, secretary; William D. Fritz, senior deacon; Alex. Grierson, junior deacon; Philip M. Evans, tyler. Lodge was opened in entered-apprentice degree. The first petition was received from Josiah A. Armour, and he was the first to be initiated in the entered-apprentice degree, March 19, 1888. The first meeting was held in Stevens' hall, and the entered-apprentice degree was conferred the same evening on Samuel Royds, Isaac A. Reneau, George E. Snell, and J. A. Armour. On April 2, 1888, Lee P. Gillette, grand custodian, was present. The present Masonic temple was built at a cost of $10,725.08, and was dedicated November 19, 1914, the dedicatory service being in charge of Brother

Robert E. French. The building committee consisted of C. J. Stevens, A. F. Pinkley, John Davis, John W. Scott, and J. H. Kerr. The lodge now has a membership of 133, of whom 108 are Master Masons and twenty-five in the other degrees. The past masters up to the present time are: F. M. Rublee (1888), W. O. Chapman (1889), E. H. Burrows (1890), C. J. Stevens (1891), E. L. Cleveland (1892), J. A. Armour (1893-6), J. S. Fairfield (1897), E. L. Cleveland (1898), C. R. Hare (1899-1901), John Davis (1902-3), A. F. Pinkley (1904-5), J. W. Scott (1906-7), W. R. Young (1908-9), Levi Pringle (1910-11), J. H. Kerr (1912), N. D. Ford (1913-4), C. H. F. Steinmeir (1915), T. T. Varney (1916), R. J. Mills (1917), and E. P. Gaines, the present incumbent, 1918.

Ansley Chapter, No. 203, Order of the Eastern Star, was organized April 10, 1906, with the following charter members: A. F. Pinkley, W. R. Young, William Burdett, J. W. Scott, D. A. VanSant, John Davis, Mrs. L. M. VanSant, Mrs. Jemima Scott, Delia Scott, Florence Stevens, Mrs. Jennie Stevens, Mrs. Eliza Pinkley, Mrs. Lottie Shepard, Mrs. Fannie Gaines, Carrie VanSant, C. J. Stevens, E. H. Gaines, C. E. Mattley, J. H. Varney, Edgar Varney, and Mrs. Isabella Burrows. Its first officers were: Worthy matron, Mrs. Jemima Scott; worthy patron, John Davis; A.M., Mrs. Fannie B. Gaines; secretary, Mrs. Lizzie M. VanSant; treasurer, Mrs. Isabella Burrows; conductress, Mrs. Eliza Pinkley; associate conductress, Miss Delia Scott. The present membership is ninety-six; the oldest member is Mrs. Amelia Varney, and the youngest member is Miss Ellen Boyden. Present officers: Worthy matron, Ogle Varney; worthy patron, E. W. Rayson; A.M., Mrs. Della Lockhart; secretary, Mrs. Grace Maulick; treasurer, Mrs. May Morris; conductress, Mrs. Clara Gaines, associate conductress, Mrs. Elsie Mackey.

The Morning Star Camp, Royal Neighbors of America, was organized May 25, 1898, with the following officers: Oracle, Miss Jeane Wright; secretary, Miss Ethel Burns. The following were the charter members: Mary Carlin, Marcus Richtmyer, Mrs. M. Richtmyer, Charles Hare, F. E. Wolford, E. H. Burrows, John Thornton, C. J. Cummings, Thomas Harris, E. L. Cleveland, James Davis, W. Burdett, F. W. Carlin, A. H. Turpin, W. B. Young, L. H. Hoover, John Scott, Charles Cummings, Eugene Haines, Sarah Beach, Jennie Pixley, C. W. Hamilton, Alice Hamilton, Laura Wigent, F. A. Wigent, Frank Watson, Day Watson, G. A. Allen, Charles Mitten, C. E. Lawson, Elizabeth Boyd, Hannah M. Scott, Debbie Boyd, James Hiser, Josephine Hiser, Hattie Thornton, Emma Wolford, Hester House, Emma Hare, Dora Weath, T. C. Berry, Dr. E. A. Hanna, Clara Wakeley, Della McGowan, Jemima Scott, William Smith, Mrs. William Smith, Mollie Varney, J. W. Comstock, Mrs. J. W. Comstock, Mrs. William Burdett, Mrs. James Davies, E. B. Pinkley, A. F. Pinkley, and Emma Fox. At the present time, there are 121 members — eighty-nine beneficiary and thirty-two social. The present officers are: Oracle, Lilly Wilkinson; vice-oracle, Mary Lawson; treasurer, Amelia Schmid; chancellor, Anna Pester; physicians, Drs. Young and Hanna; secretary, Mrs. E. A. Butler; managers, J. W. Scott, Grace Maulick, and Gertie Horton.

Ansley Camp, No. 1234, Modern Woodmen of America, was organized October 24, 1889, with eleven charter members, as follows: J. S. Thomas, H. A. Goodrich, Ed. Fowler, A. H. Shepard, H. W. Comstock, G. W. Baugh, O. F. Smith, J. H. Chapman, I. F. Secrist, Peter Fowler, and C. R. Hare. The first officers were: V.C., J. S. Thomas; W.A., H. A. Goodrich; banker, Ed. Fowler; clerk, A. H. Shepard; escort, J. W. Comstock; watchman, G. W. Baugh; sentry, O. F. Smith; physician, J. S. Thomas; managers, J. H. Chapman, I. F. Secrist, and C. R. Hare; delegate, J. S. Thomas; alternate, G. W. Baugh. The camp was organized by the deputy head consul, N. W. Noble. The only two remaining charter members are A. H. Shepard and J. W. Comstock, and the present membership is 340. The oldest member is Dan Hagin, who was born February 12, 1842, and who was adopted March 27, 1891. The youngest member, C.

L. Horton, was born January 1, 1900, and adopted June 1, 1918. The present officers are: P.C., J. H. Gonge; consul, J. B. Jones; adviser, John Springman; banker, E. P. Gaines; clerk, Perry Foster; escort, Roy Patterson; watchman, D. P. Scott; sentry, W. K. Kimball; physicians, E. A. Hanna and W. R. Young; managers, J. H. Gonge, H. F. Springman, and J. B. Jones.

MASON CITY LODGES

M. C. Warrington gives the following data concerning the lodges of Mason City:

"The first lodge organized in Mason City was Mason City Lodge No. 100, Ancient Order of United Workmen, which was accomplished in December, 1886, and for many years this was a prominent fraternal society.

"Mason City Lodge, No. 170, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons was granted a dispensation in the year 1887, with Judson C. Porter, worshipful master; A. B. Johnston, senior warden; W. A. Runyan, junior warden; Robert Walker, secretary; Dr. Hiram C. Chase, treasurer; M. C. Warrington, senior deacon; James Gouley, junior deacon. A charter was granted the following year. This lodge is still in a flourishing condition, and is proud of the fact that its Service Flag has seven stars. The fraternity owns and occupies its own property and expects to erect a handsome temple after the termination of the war.

"The Independent Order of Odd Fellows is represented in Mason City by a live working lodge, which was instituted in November, 1890. This lodge has a large and enthusiastic membership, owns its own property, and has in contemplation the erection, at a not distant date, of a substantial new home.

"A thriving organization of the Modern Wodmen of America—Custer Camp, No. 1157—has long been a fixed institution in Mason City. The membership of this camp is large and 'log-rolling' meetings, to keep the members interested and to add new ones, are of frequent occurrence.

"Last, but not least, save one only, in membership, of Mason City's fraternal and beneficiary organizations is that of the old soldiers, Stone River Post, No. 247, Grand Army of the Republic. Few, indeed, are the old veterans of the Civil war who make up the membership of this post, but with that degree of duty and loyalty which marked the period of their lives which they so gallantly devoted to the cause of their country, with unfaltering devotion to the flag, they maintain their organization and have occasional meetings, to delve in days that are passed."

ROYAL NEIGHBORS OF ARNOLD

The Arnold Camp of the Royal Neighbors of America was organized March 31, 1898, with twenty-one charter members. The following were the first officers: Oracle, Mrs. May Finch; vice-oracle, Mrs. Eliza Daily; chancellor, Mrs. Carrie Ewing; recorder, Miss Dessie Chambers; receiver, Mrs. Clara Mills; marshal, Mrs. Edna Harden; inner sentinel, Mrs. Mary Hansbury; outer sentinel, Mrs. Ada Pierce. Within the period of the history of this interesting camp, Mrs. May Finch was oracle twelve years; Mrs. Mary Backes, vice-oracle, fourteen years; Mrs. Gertrude McCant, recorder fifteen years; Mrs. Harriett Coufal, marshal, fifteen years. At the present time the camp has forty-seven members, besides a number have moved away. In the life of the camp it has lost only two members by death,—one social and one beneficiary.

The Arnold Lodge of the Daughters of Rebekah was instituted March 6, 1916, and at the time of this writing is two years and five months old. It has a total of seventy-four members, of whom forty-eight were charter members.

March 13, 1917, the members organized a Rebekah kensington, which has taken up work for the Independent Order of Odd Fellows' home, and also Red Cross work, besides donating money to the Red Cross.

This lodge has bought fifty dollars' worth of war-savings stamps and has done all it could to help win the great world war. "Three of our members are in service now and more are to go soon," is the statement made for this lodge prior to the close of war hostilities.

THE GRANGE

During January, 1911, a National Grange organizer was surveying Nebraska with a view of organizing Granges in the state. On being invited by J. D. Ream to come to Custer county, and assured that he would find an audience that would be interested in listening to a discussion of the Grange organization and its work, he came early in February and found a fair audience awaiting him. Although this community had been noted from its earliest settlement for the progressive tendencies of its people and for the organized efforts it had made along social and educational lines, yet there were present only seven who had faith enough in the community push and energy to feel sure they could maintain a successful grange.

A temporary organization was effected and arrangements made for the organizer to return later. By the time the organizer returned, a sufficient interest had been aroused to make possible a permanent organization. A canvass was made of the surrounding territory, and Granges were organized in Tappan Valley, Lillian, East Table, Union, Dutchman, Fairview, New Helena, Highland, etc., and a State Grange was organized at Broken Bow November 1st. The Central Nebraska Pomona Grange was organized at the same time and of the same C. P. Jeffords was elected master and secretary.

The organization spread steadily until over fifty subordinate and four Pomona Granges had been organized in the county and a wonderfully increased interest in rural community-life conditions had been created. The rural-school problem was one of the first things the Grange grappled with, in real earnest, because the little, inefficient schoolhouses were recognized by the Grange workers as being very detrimental to the good work and growth of the Grange, and also very detrimental to the development of ideal rural-life conditions in general. The work of the Granges in this line bids fair to bring splendid results in the near future to the state at large.

These Grange organizations have done much good by bringing the people of the rural community together, getting them acquainted and giving them a chance to clasp hands with each other in their social, educational, and co-operative work, thus helping break the monotony and isolation of rural life and broadening their field of labor. Especially has this been true with the younger members.

In the co-operative line, scores of carloads of coal, lumber, fruits, salt, sugar, flour, and livestock have been handled, and two large, successful co-operative stores have been established in the county as a direct result of the work of the Grange. And there is no way of measuring the number of lives it has brightened and cheered or the number of those to whom it has brought a broader vision of the opportunities of life and their duties to those around them.

Among the many faithful workers in the good work of the Grange in Custer county may be mentioned J. A. Dietz and wife, S. A. Dean and wife, W. W. Bishop and wife, Ralph Johnson and wife, T. A. Ely and wife, L. O. Welch and wife, John Staab and wife, W. Miller and wife, Alvin Daily and wife, H. Jacobsen and wife, W. D. Holden and wife, George Pelkey and wife, and a great host of others who have done what they could to help make the rural communities of Custer county better places in which to live and to give to the younger members of the communities broader conceptions of the opportunities and responsibilities of life in general.

WOMAN'S CLUBS IN CUSTER COUNTY

The women of Custer county have always been the peers of their stronger consorts, not to say their lords and masters. A fitting tribute can never be paid those brave wives and mothers who endured the hardships incident to the time in which they lived. They did their work and laid the foundations of home culture and refined ideals in such a manner that the present womanhood of Custer county stands high in the estimation of all intelligent classes. To-day the women of the county have more time for self-culture and elevating pursuits than in the pioneer days of the past; for that reason, the following list of improvement, social, and literary clubs, organized and maintained by women, can be presented.

SHAKESPEARE CLUB

The Shakespeare Club, the oldest study club of Broken Bow, was organized January 11, 1895, with a membership of four, and was known as the Four Leaf Clover Club for several years. For the past twenty-three years, the Shakespeare Club has held weekly meetings, and its programs have consisted of the study and discussion of the great dramatic writings, research work in history, art, and literature, and interpretations of the music of the Shakespeare plays. During the later years, the personnel of the club has been increased to a membership of twelve. In January, 1918, it decided to suspend meetings until after period of war, in order to devote more time to Red Cross work.

CALLAWAY SOROSIS CLUB

The Callaway Sorosis Club was organized April 2, 1909. It was the first club organized in Callaway. The organization was effected at the home of Mrs. A. L. Matthews. The first year's officers were: President, Mrs. J. D. Caupsey; vice-presidents, Mrs. T. C. Grimes and Mrs. F. M. McGrew; secretary, Mrs. J. D. Laughlin; treasurer, Mrs. R. E. Brega. Other charter members were Mrs. John Felken, Mrs. Riggle, Mrs. Ray Bennett, Mrs. Ira Shupp, Mrs. Roy Grimes, Mrs. Arthur Higley, Mrs. Walter Wright, Mrs. O. C. Murphy, and Mrs. Allen. The work has been along the literary line and has included Bay View work, with some miscellaneous programs. This club joined the state federation in 1910 and was the first Custer county club to join that federation.

HISTORY OF BROWNING CLUB

In the fall of 1910 a group of ladies gathered at the home of Mrs. A. R. Humphrey, of Broken Bow, and organized a club, the purpose of which was to study the works of Robert Browning. Mrs. H. T. Bruce was elected president, and the work began with enthusiasm under her efficient leadership. The Browning

Club has always been strictly a study club and has studied some of Browning's most difficult works. The first two years the club studied "The Ring and the Book" with shorter poems. In the spring of 1912 the club, with a number of other Broken Bow ladies, had the pleasure of listening to a lecture on "Rabbi Ben Ezra" by Professor O. H. Venner, of the literature department of the Wesleyan University.

In the spring of 1914, occurred the death of one of the charter members, Mrs. A. R. Humphrey, who had always been a very loyal worker and who has been greatly missed by the members of the club. In the fall of 1914 the club decided to take up the study of Browning on a university basis, and accordingly began the study of the dramatic poems, as outlined by Professor Frederick Ames Struff, of the University of Nebraska. The poems studied were "Count Gismond," "Rabbi Ben Ezra," "My Last Duchess," "Saul," "Andrea Del Sarto," "A Death in the Desert," "Childe Roland to the Dark Tower Came," "Cleon," and "An Epistle."

In the summer of 1916 the club was again bereaved, by the death of Mrs. H. M. Sullivan, who had endeared herself to all the members. In 1916 the club studied "Paracelsus" and "Pippa Passes." In 1917 the poems studied were "Strafford," "Parleying with Charles Arison," "Old Pictures in Florence," "Sordello," "Christmas Eve," and "Easter Day."

The members of the club patriotically decided that for the duration of the war they would devote their time to Red Cross work as well as study.

THE BOOKLOVERS ORGANIZATION

In the summer of 1911 a Chautauqua class of Broken Bow decided that they preferred to study the history and literature of the different countries. A meeting was held, officers elected, and plans rather indefinitely made for the 1911-12 year.

A book committee, Mrs. J. G. Leonard and R. G. Moore, outlined the work for the first year—the French year. The French history was taken as the basis for the study, with historical novels, by the greatest French authors, in their chronological order, interspersing the history lessons.

The officers for this year were: Mrs. J. G. Leonard, president; Mrs. Leo Dean, vice-president; Mrs. R. G. Moore, secretary-treasurer. The members for this year were Mrs. R. G. Moore, Mrs. Leo Dean, Mrs. Charles Luce, Mrs. Emery Bush, Mrs. Will Osborn, Mrs. James Leonard, Mrs. William Lovelace, Mrs. John Turner, Miss Martha Fodge, and Miss Eva Cadwell.

The course was successful and passed all expectations of the club members. Each year they have improved in their methods of study. They were pioneers in club circles of the city and introduced such features as the use of wall maps, Perry pictures, printed yearly programs, and study of the music and art of the countries under consideration.

The 1912-13 year was German year, with Bayard Taylor's German history, and German novels and poems. The 1913-14 year was the English year, with Greene's English history, and, for the most part, the great English poetical classics, such as Milton's "Paradise Lost," Spencer's "Faerie Queen," and others.

In 1914-15 they studied the home country, taking John Fiske's United States history, and various novels describing different parts of the country, such as Cooper's "Last of the Mohicans," telling of the Indians; S. Weir Mitchell's "Hugh Wynne," depicting the Quakers; Irving's "Knickerbocker History of New York," showing the life of the early Dutch in New York.

In 1915-16 they used the general history and the greatest literary work of some of the countries, taking "The Divine Comedy" for Italy "Don Quixote" for Spain, the "Iliad" for Greece. In 1916-17 the work was the plays of Shakespeare. In 1917-18 they studied Old Testament history, using for text-books four volumes of Professor Kent's "Historical Bible."

The officers for the year 1917-18 are: Mrs. A. A. Alden, president; Mrs. Ralph Thompson, vice-president; Mrs. Horace Kennedy, secretary-treasurer; Mrs. James Leonard, chairman; and Miss Eva Cadwell and Mrs. Alden, book committee.

The present members are Mrs. A. A. Alden, Mrs. Ralph Thompson, Mrs. Horace Kennedy, Mrs. Emery Bush, Mrs. James Leonard, Mrs. Charles Luce, Mrs. Gaius Cadwell, and Miss Eva Cadwell. The club meets every Monday afternoon from the last Monday in September to the first Monday in June of each year.

BROKEN BOW ART CLUB

January 5, 1915, Mrs. H. T. Bruce and the active members of her china-painting class organized the Broken Bow Art Club. The purpose of this club was to engage in a systematic study of pictorial art in all its forms; to attain some knowledge of the use of oils and water colors, while specializing in mineral paints; to become acquainted with the best paintings; and to learn to judge values in all pictures.

The club has been very successful in the pursuit of these objects and met regularly at fortnightly intervals until the early spring of 1918, when it disbanded temporarily, to take up war work.

In addition to the activities described above, the Art Club has placed framed copies of good pictures in the public library of Broken Bow, and in both ward-school buildings.

ARNOLD WOMEN'S IMPROVEMENT CLUB

It would be hard to find a more wide-awake, energetic club than the Women's Improvement Club of Arnold. They were organized in 1913 and in the same year federated with the state federation. Mrs. Charles Beardsley and Mrs. Will Jennings were the prime movers in the matters of organization.

The first officers were as follows: President, Mrs. Fred Britten; vice-president, Mrs. William Jennings; treasurer, Mrs. Tom Backes; secretary, Mrs. E. L. Cleveland; and corresponding secretary, Mrs. Charles Beardsley.

The federated clubs' bulletin published in June, 1918, an extended article on the activities of this club, under the caption of "A Live Club." The club gave in 1917, "The Nebraska Institution Entertainment," for the benefit of the public; they also held a schoolhouse meeting and did much work to secure the co-operation of parents in school work. By the request of the school authorities the Shakespearean department gave the court scene from "The Merchant of Venice" at the school-house, for the benefit and instruction of the pupils and school patrons generally.

Arnold has the distinction of giving more money to the Young Women's Christian Association than any other town in the county. This was made possible by the leadership of this club.

The ladies of the club have been instrumental in establishing a public library and a public drinking fountain, and have purchased two centrally located lots for the erection of a club building. This fine record has been made while all kinds of war work have been carried on. At the present time the club has forty-seven members, and the officers are: President, Essie Haskell; vice-president, Lillian Anson; recording secretary, May Conrad; corresponding secretary, Jessie Brunt; treasurer, Jennie Backes; and reporter, Maude Meads.

WOMAN'S PUBLIC SERVICE CLUB

The Woman's Public Service Club of Broken Bow was organized in 1914, for the purpose of co-operating with the Public Service Club and doing what they could along civic lines. The officers for the first year were: Mrs. A. Morgan, president; Mrs. E. P. Walter, vice-president; Mrs. C. W. Bowman, treasurer; Mrs. A. E. Anderson, secretary. During this year, prizes were given for children's gardens; the club assisted also in putting on the Chautauqua and keeping up the social life of both clubs.

In 1915, at the County Fair, prizes were awarded for bird-houses, needlework, and cookery. At Christmas time a donation was given to the Associated Charities of Broken Bow, fruit sent to both county and city jails, and flowers to the hospital. In 1916 they again assisted in Chautauqua work, made arrangements for short courses in domestic science, and donated ten dollars to the state penitentiary, to be used to purchase music for the prison orchestra.

In October, 1916, they joined the State Federation and drafted the Nebraska nurse bill that same month. At Thanksgiving time they gave a donation to the Associated Charities and sent magazines and books to state penitentiary. In April the Nebraska nurse bill was passed, the federated clubs of the state having endorsed and supported this bill. In March the first year's course in domestic science was conducted by the State Extension Bureau, with an enrollment of sixty-five. The club gave garden prizes and held a two days' canning school. In August it co-operated with the Chautauqua. It bought a fifty-dollar Liberty Bond in October and started to work for the Woman County Agent. The club held an art exhibit in November, and presented a picture to the high school and each ward school. The officers for 1918 are: Mrs. M. S. Eddy, president; Mrs. L. W. Wilson, vice-president; Mrs. A. E. Anderson, treasurer; and Mrs. Will Darnell, secretary.

THE BROKEN BOW WOMAN'S CLUB

A few ladies met in the month of June, 1915, for the purpose of organizing a Mothers' Club in connection with the Maccabee lodge. At this meeting Mrs. George Mair was elected president, and Mrs. L. D. George, vice-president. The ladies forming the organization were Mrs. George Mair, Mrs. L. D. George, Mrs. Edwin Myers, Mrs. Dr. Hurst, Mrs. Lillie King, and Mrs. Della M. Hall.

No special work was taken up until September of the same year, when Mrs. Edwin Myers was made chairman of the programme committee. At this time the membership had grown from six to nineteen. A constitution was drawn up and adopted. From this time on the club studied, in full, the program mapped out in the Woman's Home Companion for that year, on "Child Training" and "The Home."

The club was admitted to membership in the Nebraska Federation of Woman's Clubs in September, 1916, changing its name at that time from the Mothers' Club to The Broken Bow Woman's Club.

Since its affiliation with the state federation, the Woman's Club has been very active in various lines of philanthropic work. The field of its endeavor is broad and comprehensive. It is a means of personal instruction and intellectual development, as well as a diligent, energetic, and efficient agent of civic improvement.

The work for the club year of 1918-19 is departmental. The work of each department in the state federation will be correspondingly represented by a department chairman. One program will be given by each department during the year.

The officers of the club for the ensuing year are: Mrs. J. H. Melville, president; Mrs. J. F. Bahr, vice-president; Mrs. Jules Haumont, secretary; and Mrs. T. C. Grimes, treasurer.

SARGENT WOMAN'S CLUB

This club was organized in January, 1915, under the name of Sargent Emanon Club, and the name was changed to Sargent Woman's Club in July, 1918. It was organized by Mrs. Leota Hartley. The first officers were: President, Mrs. Leota Hartley; vice-president, Mrs. Lizzie Morris.

The object has been to secure a wider information, with a view to improving intellectual and social conditions, and work is thoroughly planned for the present club year. Officers at the present time are: Mrs. Etta Reier, president; Mrs. Nellie Phillips, vice-president; Mrs. Flora Cropper, recording secretary; Mrs. Lizzie Morris, corresponding secretary; and Mrs. Lulu Hicks, treasurer.

WOMAN'S CLUB OF ANSLEY

The Woman's Club of Ansley was organized in 1916 and has been actively engaged in public improvements. The members established a public rest-room and have maintained it since the first year of their organization. In this room they have the nucleus of a public library, in which are some 400 volumes. They are now working to secure a Carnegie library building. The course of study for the regular club meetings includes a course in parliamentary law, conducted by Mrs. J. H. Ford. The club was federated in 1917. Mrs. S. W. Thompson is president, and Mrs. L. H. Fowler is librarian.

The club was first organized under the name of The Woman's Improvement Club, but this name was changed to the Woman's Club at the time of its becoming identified with the Nebraska Federation of Woman's Clubs. Mrs. C. H. England, of Broken Bow, assisted in its organization. The first president was Mrs. Earl Cooper, and the first secretary was Mrs. C. Steinmier.

CHAPTER XIII

POLITICAL AND PARTISAN ACTIVITIES

THE FIRST ELECTION — HAD SOME "PEP," HOWEVER — IN SCRAPPY DAYS — A JOINT DEBATE — THE POPULIST VERSION — THROUGH REPUBLICAN GOGGLES — THE "POPULIST" MOVEMENT IN CUSTER COUNTY — FIRST COUNTY TICKET — THE CAT CREEK CLUB — LIKE A LAMB TO THE SWALLOWING — THE REPUBLICAN PARTY ORGANIZES — THE REPUBLICANS SPLIT — THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY — VERY PROMINENT POLITICALLY — THE PRIMARIES OF 1918 — THE ELECTION OF 1918

The political solidarity of Custer county has always been a source of comment on the part of careful observers. Political lines have never been closely drawn. In the early days, local politics had small place. In his candidacy for any office the man, if he were competent and popular, was not handicapped by a political creed. Nor was there any political creed to which he must subscribe in order to be elected. Personal characteristics and qualities were the only things that counted. In the early Republican conventions, many who are now wheel-horses of the Democratic party affiliated heartily and served on many important committees. This indicates the lack of acid tests, and shows that the early conventions were a free-for-all, in which a man was pitted against a man and not a partisan against a partisan.

THE FIRST ELECTION

The first election ever held in the territory which now comprises Custer county was held at Douglas Grove, before the county was organized. A few years ago, among the papers of the late Captain W. H. Comstock, was found the poll-book of this election, which was held in November, 1876.

At that time the territory west of Valley county was attached to Valley for judicial purposes, and a corner, twenty-four miles square, was cut off and known as Garber county. Later this territory became a part of Custer county.

The election was held on the seventh day of November, 1876, at which time Edward Neilson, J. L. Banker, and D. J. Caswell were judges and W. H. Comstock and James Wagoner were clerks of election.

In all, fourteen votes were cast as follows: Isaac Merchant, New Helena; Edward Neilson, New Helena; Lewis Dowse, Douglas Grove; J. P. Dowse, Douglas Grove; James Lee, Lee Park; J. L. Banker, Douglas Grove; W. H. Comstock, Douglas Grove; D. J. Caswell, Douglas Grove; Frank Ingram, Douglas Grove; Frank Ohme, Lee Park; Samuel Wagoner, Douglas Grove; James Wagoner, Douglas Grove; James Oxford, Douglas Grove; A. A. Higgins, Douglas Grove.

At that time the precinct was overwhelmingly Republican, as out of the fourteen votes cast, only one saw fit to vote the Democratic ticket. Thomas J. Majors, who was then running for congress, received twelve votes. Silas Garber was running for governor, Othman A. Abbott for lieutenant governor, and each received twelve votes. At this election William H. Comstock and Isaac Merchant were elected justices of the peace, each receiving fourteen votes. Lewis Dowse received one vote for constable, I. T. Merchant fourteen, and James Wagoner twelve. W. H. Comstock received one vote for road overseer, and D. J. Caswell fourteen.

In those days Nebraska had only six electoral votes, and this part of the world was known as the forty-fifth representative district, instead of the fifty-sixth, as now. It was entitled to only one representative, instead of two; Daniel D. Grow was running for that office and received the magnificent total of thirteen votes.

HAD SOME "PEP" HOWEVER

With the passing of the first years, the settling up of the country, the coming of leaders from the more politic counties of the east, political lines were more sharply drawn. Three prominent parties have for part of the time held the lime light. These are the Republican, Democratic, and Populist parties.

In the days of the '90s, when the Populists formed a merger with the Democrats and made the Republicans their common foe, there were lively times, and spirited contests were staged for several years. The newspapers during this time were exceedingly partisan and injected a good deal of life into the political campaigns.

IN SCRAPPY DAYS

As an indication of how the papers lambasted each other and lambasted their political enemies, we quote the following from an editorial which appeared in the Custer County Chief, issue of October 14, 1898:

"We are at a loss to know just what is the political faith of our much esteemed contemporary, the Callaway Independent. In the last few issues, C. W. Beal has been roasted to a turn, L. E. Kirkpatrick has been scored regularly, Eastman and Taylor have received side swipes, Holcomb has been touched up, Jim Amsberry has got a clip under the chin and a dip over the ear, the Chief has been given its choice between a political grave or bolt, Hughes Brown has received a few punches, and Judge Shinn, after a breathing spell, has again been poked in the short ribs. It is therefore eminently proper that the Ansley Chronicle and the Broken Bow Republican should compliment the Independent's bold stand and pass bouquets back and forth. Brother Webb is a scrapper from Scrapville and if his pluck holds out he will no doubt be able to scrap the whole state ticket before the campaign closes."

A JOINT DEBATE

In the fall campaign of 1898 Norris Brown was the Republican candidate for congress, while W. L. Greene was the independent or "Populist" candidate. Great interest centered in a joint debate between the candidates. They met in the arena at Broken Bow, and we give below the accounts of the meeting as they appeared in the Chief and the Republican at that time.

The Chief, which championed the Populists, gave the following account:

THE POPULIST VERSION

"It is not only customary, but natural, in discussing the merits and demerits of a joint political debate that each party should stand up for its candidate, and in this connection we have already heard many times about the terrible drubbing Brown gave Greene, and also how Greene mopped the earth with Brown at the joint debate held in this city yesterday between the two candidates for congress in the sixth district. We have no desire to be unfair in mention of this debate and will give the facts as we saw them, and as we believe they were. The meeting was called to order at about 2:30 o'clock and the audience, which was about equally divided between Republicans and Populists, was decidedly small for an event of this kind. However, the people kept dropping in until the crowd reached about 250 to 300 people. James Stockham presided as chairman and Simon Cameron and E. R. Purcell acted as time-keepers. Mr. Brown opened the debate with one hour, Mr. Greene then followed with one hour, Mr. Brown then followed with twenty minutes and Mr. Greene with thirty minutes, and Mr. Brown closed with ten minutes, making the time one hour and a half each. Brown, in his opening, made a very good address and established himself as a good speaker. He attacked Greene's record in congress, charged Greene with false statements in a circular issued to the people of the sixth district two years ago, relative to the price of cereals, and quoted a local paper at Kearney as proof, and attacked his statement regarding the per capita circulation of the country. Had the meeting closed at the conclusion of this speech, the people would have given Mr. Brown credit for a good hour's talk. Mr. Greene then took the platform, and as he warmed up to his subject, the attitude of the audience changed, and in less than ten minutes he had established himself as master of the situation, and his eloquence and good natural arguments carried conviction to the heart of every fair-minded man. He took up the statements and charges of Mr. Brown in their order and literally tore them to pieces. Instead of quoting from local papers, Mr. Greene took the official reports of the government and clinched every argument in the most convincing manner. Mr. Brown, on his second appearance, plainly showed the hot fire he was under, and made but few points that required answering. Mr. Greene then made his closing speech of thirty minutes, and Mr. Brown only occupied about one-third of the ten minutes allotted to him to close. The audience had become restless, and fifty or more people got up to leave when Mr. Brown took the platform for the last time. Norris Brown makes a good address, but as a debater he is not in it with W. L. Greene, and those who heard the debate from beginning to end do not wonder that the Republicans have endeavored to pull him off from the joint meetings. These debates will without question increase Greene's majority in every county in the sixth district."

THROUGH REPUBLICAN GOGGLES

The current issue of the Republican has a report of the same affair, but everything seems to have looked quite different through Republican goggles. Of course, political bias had nothing to do with these different versions. The difference was all due to different styles of literary taste. The "Greene" style appealed to the one party but "Brown" was the favorite color of the other, so we are to presume that the divergent accounts were due to color preference.

"The Greene-Brown debate this afternoon, held in the North Side opera house, was a great disappointment to the 'Pops.' They had not only advertised the debate well in their papers, but had billed the county with large posters to induce the Pop brethren to give Tonsilitis Bill an old-time crowd. After all their efforts, not more than 300 people, men, women, and children, were present. There were not, all told, seventy-five Pop voters present, and one of them, instead of worshipping their idol, at the conclusion of the debate mounted the rostrum and congratulated Norris Brown. Judge Greene made a strong and pathetic appeal, with tears in his eyes, for the Pops to lay aside personal differences and vote for none but Pop nominees. His whole demeanor and speech only impressed his audience more forcibly, that of demagogues he is the chief. He claimed to be the original Pop, and stated he advocated the principles now held by the Populist party when he was a beardless youth. He maintained, with all his force at his command, that times are worse and prices of farm products lower than they were in the worst days of Cleveland's administration. He asserted that if Brown would prove that a single prophecy he made two years ago in his circular, which stated that 'prices of all products would decrease, farmers could not pay their taxes and would lose their homes,' in the event of McKinley's election 'he would withdraw from the ticket.' Brown showed from the quoted prices in the Kearney Era-Standard, a Pop paper, giving the prices in August, 1896, and 1898, that every article there quoted was selling for more in August, 1898, than in 1896. He also read from the World-Herald, showing an increase of exports of twelve per cent. and decrease of imports of twenty-five per cent. the last year, over the year previous. Greene's only reply was to burlesque the reports of local papers and deny the facts."

THE "POPULIST" MOVEMENT IN CUSTER COUNTY

The People's Independent party, by which name it was officially known, or the "Populist" party, by which name it was usually known, was an outgrowth of an organization known in the west as the Farmers' Alliance and in the south as the Farmers' Union. In the fall of 1888, soon after the presidential election of that year, there was much discontent among the farmers on account of the low market prices of all products of the farm and garden. The organization of the Farmers' Alliance, and kindred organizations among farmers, began as a protest against the prevalence of low prices and continued during the ensuing winter with great vigor in Custer county, in many other counties of the state, and in other western and southern states.

The Farmers' Alliance was a secret organization and was composed exclusively of farmers. It had its grips and passwords, and all its discussions of questions of interest to farmers were held behind closed doors. Farmers' Alliance stores and other mercantile enterprises were started and maintained in the cities and towns, efforts to bring producer and consumer more closely together were made, and methods for producing the maximum amount per acre, with the minimum of effort, were discussed in their meetings with profit. But there were many in alliance circles who openly declared that the farmers of the country would never be relieved from oppressive conditions until they entered politics and took care that the farming interests should be properly represented in all legislative bodies.

This was the condition of mind among the farmers of Custer county in the spring of 1889, when the annual meeting of the county alliance met in the city of Broken Bow. There was much talk among the delegates, from the various local alliances, of independent political action, and after electing officers for the ensuing year, a resolution was introduced in favor of putting a full ticket in the field in Custer county. The introduction of this resolution gave rise to much discussion as to the propriety of the action. The opinion quite generally prevailed that such action must come sooner or later, but at that time its expediency was doubtful, owing to the well known prejudice existing against the organization of a new party. But after a full discussion, the resolution was adopted and many who had opposed its adoption, then pledged their support to the ticket.

FIRST COUNTY TICKET

Accordingly, later in the summer of 1889, a delegate convention assembled in Broken Bow, adopted a platform embracing the well known tenets of the Farmers' Alliance and nominated a full ticket, as follows: County judge, H. J. Shinn; sheriff, J. B. Jones; treasurer, D. M. Weimer; county superintendent, W. N. Hendrickson; county clerk, J. G. Painter; county surveyor, E. W. Dodson; representative, W. H. Predmore.

From that time on, the Farmers' Alliance of Custer county assumed and retained the form and substance of a distinctive and separate political party. The campaign which followed was indeed a unique campaign for Custer county. All the men nominated on the alliance ticket were farmers, none of whom had ever given any considerable study to politics or political questions, and they were pitted against a ticket of veteran politicians, nominated, and supported by a party that had never known defeat since the organization of the county.

Although the alliance had developed into a political party, it still maintained its organization throughout the county, and the ticket nominated was called the "Alliance ticket." Meetings were held in all parts of the county, under the auspices of the local alliances, the principles of the order were discussed at schoolhouses and picnics, and the arguments of the opposition, as to why the ticket should be defeated, were answered. The new doctrines, promulgated by the alliance, proved to be very popular and as a result of the campaign the entire ticket was elected, except the candidate for representative, who was defeated by J. D. Haskell, by a small majority.

The successful experience of the alliance movement in Custer county, and in other counties of the state and other western states where similar political action was taken, revealed to farmers some idea of the political power they could wield when united, and the general unrest in farming circles crystallized into a general demand for the formation of a new party, whose purpose should be to promote the welfare of all men and women who get their livelihood by labor. Accordingly, on the 14th day of May, 1891, a convention of delegates favorable to such a movement, met in Cincinnati, Ohio, and in its platform declared for the issuing of all money directly from the federal government to the people, without the intervention of national banks; the government ownership of railroads and other public utilities; and the preservation of the public domain for homes for the people. This convention christened the new party "The People's Independent Party," and arranged for another convention, to be held in St. Louis, on February 22, 1892. The delegates attending this convention from Custer county were O. M. Kem and C. W. Beal.

In accordance with arrangements made at this convention, a delegate convention was held in St. Louis on the date above named. Delegates were in attendance from twenty-three labor organizations, including the Farmers' Alliance. The movement, at this juncture, had aroused much opposition, and there were those present who were there to prevent, if possible, any further organization or amalgamation of the elements represented. Criminations and recriminations were rather freely indulged in, and a number, who were proved to be present from sinister motives, were forcibly ejected from the hall. A platform was adopted, along the lines of the Cincinnati convention, and arrangements were made to hold a nominating convention in Omaha, Nebraska, on the 4th day of July, 1892.

THE CAT CREEK CLUB

Accordingly, the first national nominating convention of the People's Independent Party was held in Omaha on the above-named date. There was a full delegation present from Custer county, and the famous "Cat Creek Glee Club," of Custer county, Nebraska, composed of J. T. Emerick, S. E. and J. H. Brown, and Harry Emerick, was in attendance and regaled the convention with a number of songs that aroused the delegates to a high pitch of enthusiasm. Among the songs were those entitled, "Coming in the Life Boat," "We'll Meet You Bye and Bye," and "Coming for to Carry Me Home." This convention adopted the far-famed Omaha platform, which began with: "We have met in the midst of a nation brought to the verge of moral, material, and financial ruin," and, among other things, declared for reform in finance, land, and transportation. The convention nominated General James B. Weaver for president, and General Field for vice-president. In the campaign that followed, the new party carried six states and secured twenty-two votes in the electoral college. In Custer county, Nebraska, it elected S. M. Dorris, clerk of the district court; Ebenezer Miller, county attorney; D. W. Lanterman, register of deeds, and W. P. Higgins and C. W. Beal, representatives to the lower house of the legislature. O. M. Kem, who lived in Custer county, was elected to congress, and Silas A. Holcomb, also a resident of Custer county, was elected judge of the twelfth judicial district. Mr. Kem served three successive terms in congress and Mr. Holcomb, after serving the state two terms as governor, was elected judge of the supreme court, in which capacity he served six years. He was then elected chief justice of the supreme court, in which office he served six years.

For ten years, beginning in 1889, the Populist party carried Custer county, and throughout the country it had become a power so formidable that leading men in all parties came to understand fully that, unless something were done to curb its growth, it was destined to become one of the leading parties, if not the dominant party, of the country.

LIKE A LAMB TO THE SWALLOWING

As the presidential campaign of 1896 approached, leading members of the new party felt that it held the key to the situation. It was arranged to hold its national convention after the two old parties had held theirs, the idea being that the conventions of both old parties would declare for the gold standard and bid for the vote of special interests. They were not mistaken as to what the Republican party would do, but the Democratic convention adopted a platform which included the principal demands of the Populist party, declaring among other things, for the abolition of the national banking system and the issuance and control of all money directly from the government. This was the beginning of the end of the Populist party in the nation, as it was evident that if the Populist party nominated a separate ticket it meant success for the Republican ticket. So, when the Populist convention was held in St. Louis, on July 22, 1896, after a vigorous canvass of the situation and many stormy scenes, the convention nominated William J. Bryan, the nominee of the Democratic party for president, but aimed to preserve its identity by refusing to nominate Arthur Sewall, the nominee of the Democrats for vice-president, and nominated Thomas E. Watson, of Georgia, for that position.

After the memorable campaign of 1896, the Populist party rapidly disintegrated. The party, however, maintained its identity in the county for many years thereafter, by preserving its separate organization and nominating and supporting tickets made up of Populists, but its numbers gradually decreased until 1915, when the party officially went out of business. Its last central committee chairman was Charles T. Orr and its last secretary was Charles H. Jeffords, who stayed by the ship to the last and with genuine regret saw her sink.

Though the People's Independent Party has passed into history, this generation willingly gives it the full credit which was withheld by the last generation. It was the first political party to declare for the postal-savings banks, the initiative and referendum, the election of United States senators by direct vote, government ownership of public utilities and the issuance of all money without the agency of banks of issue. The majority of these policies have been enacted into law, and the wisdom and beneficence of these laws are universally conceded.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY ORGANIZES

The Republican party was the first organized political party in Custer county. From the records of its first meeting it is evident that political lines were not tightly drawn, and members of other political organizations were freely admitted to its party caucuses and county conventions. The first record of the meeting of a Republican county convention is that of the year 1877. This convention was held at the temporary county seat of Custer county, on the 25th day of July, 1877. Henry Goodyear was elected chairman of this convention and Frank H. Young, secretary.

Custer county had previously been organized and, by an order of Governor Garber, county commissioners had been appointed. This first convention was called to nominate the temporary county officers to hold office until the November election, when the full county ticket would be elected. The minutes of that convention reads as follows:

"Convention came to order by electing Henry Goodyear chairman and Frank H. Young secretary.

"It was moved and carried that the candidates be nominated by acclamation. Louis Wambsgan was nominated for county judge. Frank H. Young was nominated for county clerk. Anton Abel was nominated for county commissioner. William Kilgore was nominated for county commissioner. James Gasmann was nominated for county commissioner. Joshua Wood was nominated for sheriff. S. C. Stuckey and John Myers were put in nomination for county treasurer and, on voting, S. C. Stuckey was nominated. H. C. Morton was nominated for county surveyor. George Sanford was nominated for coroner. J. J. Douglass, L. D. George, and Charles R. Mathews were elected as the county central committee.

"On motion the convention adjourned sine die.

FRANK H. YOUNG, Secretary."

The second convention was held on the 1st day of November, 1877. At this convention a full set of county officers were nominated. The nominees were duly elected, and the ticket thus elected became the first regularly elected set of county officers for Custer county. The most of the officers elected at the election in 1877 served the entire term of the election. Others resigned, and their places were filled by appointment. The minutes of this second Republican county convention read as follows:

"Convention came to order by electing R. Tucker temporary chairman and F. H. Young temporary secretary. James Gasman put in nomination as commissioner for commissioner precinct No. 5. Anton Abel put in nomination as commissioner for commissioner precinct No. 2. William Kilgore put in nomination as commissioner for commissioner precinct No. 1. Wilson Hewitt, county judge; S. C. Stuckey, county treasurer; R. Tucker, county clerk; Josh Wood, sheriff; Al. Wise, coroner; J. W. Benedict, surveyor; Mr. Eubank, superintendent. Central committeemen, Tom Ritche, No. 5; Wilson Hewitt, No. 2; James Paxton, No. 1; W. R. Matthews, No. 5; William Comstock, No. 4.

"Louis Wambsgan, county judge. (Wambsgan, four points, Hewitt, ten points.) Wilson Hewitt nominated for county judge."

The settlement of Custer county is nicely illustrated by the manner in which attendance at the various early county conventions commenced to increase. In 1897 the third Republican county convention was held. It is noticeable that while the old names are retained in the minutes of the early conventions, new names begin to appear and the names of these men, as they appear from time to time in the early records of these conventions, are the men who are largely credited with early settlement and development of the county. The minutes of the convention for 1879 are not full or very complete. They read as follows:

"Meeting called to order by Frank H. Young. V. Allyn, chairman; Frank H. Young, secretary.

"County commissioner, J. D. Haskell, county commissioner, District No. 1. County judge, Millard Miles; county clerk, Frank H. Young; county treasurer, James A. Pike; county sheriff, P. W. Bruin; county coroner, John George; superintendent, J. J. Douglass; surveyor, L. S. Perrin. William Kilgore, George Arnold, and V. Allyn elected county central committee."

On October 8, 1880, the Republican county convention was held at Myers' ranch. A complete record of the proceedings of that convention is disclosed by the minutes and returns as follows:

Republican county convention called to order by N. H. Hopkins, chairman of the county central committee. N. H. Hopkins elected permanent chairman and Frank H. Young elected permanent secretary.

The following committee on credentials was elected: C. C. Kingsbury, precinct No. 2; W. H. Comstock, precinct No. 3; C. R. Mathews, precinct No. 5; J. L. Goodrich, precinct No. 6; C. S. Ellison, precinct No. 9.

Recess of half an hour. After recess the committee on credentials made the following report. Report accepted and committee discharged. Moved and seconded that one delegate be allowed each precinct for each one hundred population or fraction thereof, taking as a basis of the state census of 1880 and adding one-third, so as to approximate the United States census. Carried. Whereupon the convention found that the precincts were entitled to the number of votes set opposite their numbers, to-wit:

Precinct No. 1, no delegates; precinct No. 2, four delegates; precinct No. 3, two delegates; precinct No. 4, none present; precinct No. 5, three delegates; precinct No. 6, five delegates; precinct No. 7, four delegates; precinct No. 8, three delegates; precinct No. 9, three delegates; precinct No. 10, one delegate.

Moved and recorded the delegates present be allowed to cast the full vote of their precinct.

The next business in order being the nomination of county commissioners in District No. 1, the following named gentlemen were unanimously nominated: L. W. F. Cole, from precinct No. 6; C. F. Crawford, precinct No. 7, unanimously nominated county treasurer; C. R. Matthews, of precinct No. 5, unanimously nominated county judge.

The following named gentlemen were elected a county central committee for the ensuing year, to-wit:

Nc George, precinct No. 1; Frank H. Young, precinct No. 2; W. H. Comstock, precinct No. 3; W. H. Henderson, precinct No. 4; L. W. Sherman, precinct No. 5; J. L. Goodrich, precinct No. 6; N. H. Hopkins, precinct No. 7; George Brooks, precinct No. 8; A. J. Snowden, precinct No. 9; J. D. Ream, precinct No. 10; R. C. Talbot, precinct No. 11; Ira Graves, precinct No. 12.

The convention adjourned sine die.

FRANK H. YOUNG, Secretary.

From 1880 to 1884 there is no record obtainable of Republican county conventions in the county. On August 12, 1884, the Republican county convention was held at Broken Bow. A full history of the proceedings of this convention has been retained in the well known handwriting of Frank Young and reads as follows:

J. S. KIRKPATRICK, Chairman.

We, the committee on permanent organization, respectfully recommend that the temporary organization be made permanent.

J. S. SQUIRES, Chairman of Committee.

At that time apparently Custer county had no candidate for any office outside of the boundaries of the county. Custer county was embraced in the legislative district along with the unorganized territory to the west and other counties along the line of the Union Pacific Railroad, but the delegates to this convention, having in mind the needs of the county from a legislative standpoint, adopted the following resolution: "Resolved, That the representative delegation be instructed to use every honorable effort to secure the nomination of a Custer county man."

A county central committee was named by this convention. The precinct nominations had been dropped and the voting precincts were given names. At this time there were thirteen voting precincts in the county. The name of the precinct and the committeemen selected by this convention were as follows: Algernon, C. S. Bedwell; Kilfoil, W. Bidwell; Delight, M. H. Deams; Sargent, George Sherman; Douglas Grove, G. O. Waters; Wood River, T. B. Buckner; Lillian, W. H. Russell; Custer, F. Zimmerer; Myrtle, G. E. Richtmeyer; Broken Bow, J. S. Kirkpatrick; Westerville, F. C. M. Knox;

Moved that the first ballot be informal. Carried. On motion, R. R. Chess, W. W. Thornton, William Osborne, were appointed tellers. Moved that the chairman of each delegation cast the vote of his precinct. Lost.

Nomination for county treasurer, informal ballot — Knight, 16; Brown, 10; Squires, 8; Hemsworth, 2; Schreyer, 2. Total, 38.

First ballot — Knight, 17; Brown, 15; Squires, 10. Total, 42. A. W. Squires' name withdrawn.

Second ballot — Knight, 16; Brown, 26 (elected). Total, 42.

On motion adjourned sine die.

FRANK H. YOUNG, Secretary.

The convention of 1885 was held at Broken Bow on September 30. In the deliberations of this convention, many men participated, whose names have become household words in the development of the county. To illustrate, John S. Kirkpatrick, and Frank H. Young, secretary of the convention. The committee on credentials was composed of S. L. Cannon, Mark Schreninger, J. D. Ream, F. Zimmerer, and S. B. Harris. The committee on permanent organization was composed of John Myers, Arthur Kilgore, Ed. King, Sam High, and John Hall. The committee on resolutions was composed of J. D. Ream, W. W. Thornton, John Hall, L. B. Brisbane, and J. D. Troyer.

Custer county has always been noted for its convention oratory, but at this convention a motion was carried limiting a nominating speech to five minutes and a speech of a candidate to ten minutes. With this brake on the talking power of the candidates, the convention proceeded to nominate the ticket.

From the beginning of party organizations in Custer county down to the year 1889, the nomination of a Republican convention was equivalent to election of the nominee. No person other than the nominee of a Republican convention was elected to any county office during this period. The Democrats maintained an organization and some glorious campaign fights were conducted in the county, in an effort to elect certain Democrats, but when the vote was counted their effort was always found to be futile. The resolutions adopted from time to time by the early Republican conventions expressed the thought of the party in its representative capacity. Some of these resolutions are entitled to a place in history. The following resolution was adopted by the convention of 1884:

Whereas, The circumstances under which the Republican party was organized, demanded that the party be one of progression, and the party owes its successes to its willingness to grapple with the issues of the day;

Therefore, Be it Resolved, That we, as representatives of that party in convention assembled, do demand that the party in the county shall faithfully engage in every question of importance wherein the rights of the many are made subservient to the will of the few.

Early in its party history, the Republican party took a stand against the sale of intoxicating liquors. The following resolution was adopted in 1884, apparently after a bitter fight in the convention and after the resolution, as it had been originally written, was amended to read as follows:

Whereas, the license of the sale of intoxicants in any form, especially as patent medicine, is contrary to morality and the best interests of our county;

Be it Resolved, That the Republican party of Custer county is morally, socially, and politically opposed to the liquor traffic, will not give countenance to the sale of intoxicating beverages in the county and will support only temperance men for state, county, and township officers.

The anti-monopoly proclivities of the Republican party of the county early cropped out in its conventions. Up to and including the convention of 1885, no railroad had crossed the county line and the nearest trading point where railroad facilities could be had was along the line of the Union Pacific to the south, so the convention of 1885 adopted the following resolution concerning railroad regulations:

"Resolved, That the railroad commission of our state is a step in the right direction but, as at present empowered and constituted, is wholly inadequate to meet the required needs and demands of the people."

This anti-monopoly sentiment is expressed also in a resolution which was offered and adopted in the convention of 1885 and which reads as follows:

"Resolved, That the course of C. H. Van Wyck in the national senate has been fearless and honorable in the interest of the whole people, regardless of the abuses of the partisans, politicians, and monied corporations, and meets with our hearty approval. (J. D. REAM, Chairman)."

At the time of the adoption of this resolution, C. H. VanWyck was United States senator from Nebraska. He was regarded as a thorough anti-monopolist, and the resolution offered by Mr. Ream above set out is an indorsement of the very belligerent career of Senator VanWyck in the United States senate. The resolution was offered and adopted by a rising vote.

During the year 1888 and spring of 1889 a Farmers' Alliance organization was completed throughout the county. In 1889 the Farmers' Alliance entered politics. In a county convention of their own, a full county ticket was nominated from their own membership. The Democratic party leaders, having been unsuccessful in their attempt to elect any regular nominee of a Democratic county convention, cast in their lot with the nominees of the Farmers' Alliance and at the November election in 1889 the entire Republican county ticket was defeated and the Farmers' Alliance candidates, by the aid of the Democratic party organization, were all elected. For a period of ten years, from 1889, the Republican organization was submerged, and no nominee of a Republican convention had any more chance of an election than a Democrat had had prior to that year. In time the Alliance party organization was taken over and its management and control passed to the Democratic leaders of the county. The first break that the Republicans were able to make in this water-tight organization came in the year 1897, when, by a split in the party organization of the remnants of the old Farmers' Alliance movement, known at that time as the Populist party, the Republicans succeeded in electing J. A. Armour county judge.

The dismemberment of the Populist party consisted of its alliance with the Democratic party, gradually leading to many of its members returning to Republicans, and in the year 1905, in a straight party fight between the Republican candidates and the Democratic candidates, the Republicans elected their entire county ticket. They continued to elect the nominees of the Republican party until the year 1909, when a set of county officials partly Republican and partly Democratic was elected, and from that day to this there has been a mixed ticket elected at each election.

THE REPUBLICANS SPLIT

During the campaign of 1912, when the national Republican convention split, and the Progressives nominated a second Republican ticket, the Progressive wing of the party waged a strenuous local campaign in the county for the national Progressive ticket. As a result of this campaign, two years later, the Progressives organized for the state and county campaign, and put a Progressive county ticket into the field. Because of the Republican vote being divided, the county offices, with two exceptions, were captured by the Democrats.

Since the establishment of the so-called Australian ballot system, the partisan spirit has to a great extent, subsided, and to-day it is exceedingly hard to maintain a political organization, whether Republican or Democratic.

THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY

To M. C. Warrington who has been one of the wheelhorses of the Democratic party since its inception in Custer county, belongs the credit for the compilation of the following data concerning Democratic activities:

"In giving a history of the activities of the Democratic party in Custer county much data are necessarily omitted, for the reason that no authentic account of many accomplishments of that organization is available.

"During a period of the first several years following the organization of Custer county, party affiliation was not taken seriously into consideration when it came to selecting officials, availability being considered of greater importance than politics. However, a number of the early-day officials of the county were Democrats.

"There seems to have been no Democratic organization within the county at the time of the presidential campaign in 1880. However, there were some Democratic voters in the county at that time. It is related by Robert Farley, one of the pioneer Democratic settlers in the county, that he made on horseback a trip of about twenty miles to the nearest voting place to cast his ballot that year. This being in the days before the Australian voting system had been adopted and when the ballots were furnished by party leaders rather than by the county, as now, Mr. Farley could find no Democratic tickets, and was informed by the election officers that there were none at the polls. Determined to cast his vote for General Hancock for president, Mr. Farley tore a Democratic ticket out of a newspaper, voted that and returned home, conscious of having performed a sacred duty of citizenship.

"A full county ticket was placed in the field in 1884 and met with overwhelming defeat at the polls. That apparently was the first real organization effected by the Democrats in Custer county. During the years from 1880 for a period of ten years there was a heavy influx of settlers to Custer county, being drawn here first by the free-homestead lands and later by the advent of the railroad and the springing up of a number of new towns.

"The Democrats made a very aggressive effort to win the county election in 1887. An enthusiastic county convention was held in Broken Bow in September of that year, every preceinct being represented, and a ticket, made up of the then well known Custer county citizens, was placed in the field as follows: County treasurer, James Holland; county clerk, J. R. Forsythe; sheriff, Michael Conley; clerk district court, Harry E. O'Neill; county judge, E. P. Campbell; county superintendent, F. W. Taylor; coroner, Dr. J. W. Saunders.

"The election of that year, despite the fact that the Democrats made a strenuous effort for success, was won by the Republicans, some of the candidates winning by majorities around a thousand. This crushing defeat was disheartening to the Democrats and was, in a measure, largely responsible for paving the way for the success of the Farmers' Alliance ticket in 1889, when the Republicans in turn were wiped off the political map by large majorities. That year the Democratic organization, manipulated largely by those who saw a chance to work through the farmers' organization and bring defeat to the Republicans, ably assisted and urged by a number of Democrats anxious for political perferment and the spoils of office, withdrew the Democratic ticket from the field and joined their political fortunes with the farmers. The Farmers' Alliance organization, after their national convention in Omaha in 1890, became the People's Independent party, popularly and generally known as the 'Pops,' and they held almost full and complete sway in political affairs in Custer county after their victory in 1889 for twelve years, and partially for a longer period, when the party began to disintegrate and gradually merge with the Democrats.

"Covering the period when the Populists were at the zenith of their power, the Democratic organization was not abandoned, but was held together by a few of the old guard, ever faithful to the trust of party fidelity and loyalty. County conventions were regularly held, delegates to state and district conventions selected, and county tickets nominated, made up generally of men of affairs and prominence who neither sought nor expected political honors. This organization, so honorably and loyally maintained, extended a welcome hand to those who had affiliated with the Populist party when that political bubble burst, and the party of the fathers was soon again to come into popular favor with Custer county voters.

"It would be unfair not to mention in this article some of the stalwart men who were numbered among the Democrats of Custer county during these early days, and who contributed of their time and means to perpetuate the party organization at a time and under circumstances which were, to say the least, discouraging. With everything in a political way to lose and nothing to gain; urged on, only by motives of good citizenship and the righteousness of the principles they stood for, these men unfalteringly met the issues squarely. In connection with this it is to be taken into consideration the fact that the Populist party not only carried everything in Custer county but gained strength enough in Nebraska to elect state and judicial officers, members of congress, and a United States senator, and besides becoming an important political factor in the nation as well. In the days of the Populists' greatest activities, Custer county men were classed among the leaders of the party in both state and nation, and many men who were former Democrats were high in its councils and were elected to positions of trust and honor. When the Populist organization ceased to be a factor in political affairs, many of these men returned to their old party affiliation with the Democrats. There has been no feeling of resentment or any desire on the part of the party leaders to question the motives of any man who worked with the Populists in those days, nor not to fully appreciate the energy and activity of other men who later became residents of the county and cast their fortune with the Democrats.

"Among the men who were always to be depended upon to lend a hand to the cause of Democracy in those politically 'dry' years and trying times were W. B. Eastham, S. B. Thompson, A. J. Robertson, Dr. C. L. Mullins, C. H. Holcomb, C. T. Tierney, E. M. Thompson, the late J. J. Wilson, and J. G. Leonard, all of Broken Bow; B. J. Tierney, John Scott, C. Mackey, A. H. Turpin, of Ansley; W. C. Rusmisell, A. O'Brien, G. F. Frasier, W. N. Hurley, M. C. Warrington, of Mason City; John Moran, the late J. H. Decker, Virgil Allen, Harry E. O'Neill, of Callaway; Thomas and Charles Finlen, Joe. Berry, Diah Woodruff, Judge E. J. Boblits, Dan Buckley, J. T. Bridges, Charles M. Bowers, of the South Loup country; Judge Charles E. Mathews, Harve Andrews, Charley Smith, of Anselmo; Robert J. Kelly, Frank Kelly, M. S. Eddy, of Merna.

"The Democratic press of Custer county has had a great many ups-and-downs. The first real organ of Democracy launched on the troubled sea of journalism in the county was the Statesman, a paper established in Broken Bow early in the year 1886, by Martin & Deilinger. These same men established the Mason City Transcript in June of the same year, and a few months later the Argus at Anselmo. A fight over land-office patronage caused a second Democratic paper to be started in Broken Bow, by George Trefren and Sam Meseraul in 1886, but it did not long survive. Frank W. Conley published the Democratic Headlight at Callaway for some years. Sam Meseraul also published a small, two-page sheet for a few months at Nonpareil postoffice, near where Merna is now located. There was also published a Democratic paper at Ansley in the early days of that town. In 1914 C. E. Sher purchased the Custer County Republican of

D. M. Amsberry and turned it into a Democratic paper. The venture did not prove a business success and Mr. Shea sold the paper to the present owner, who turned it back into a Republican journal.

"Of the different Democratic papers established in Custer county but one weathered the storms of adversity. The Mason City Transcript, owned, published, and edited by M. C. Warrington for more than a quarter of a century, was always uncompromisingly Democratic and for many years was the only paper in the county to espouse the cause of Democracy. The Transcript was sold to the present owner, J. F. Peebles, in 1917, and is still true to the faith.

"During the last ten years political honors in Custer county have been pretty evenly divided, but rather more favorable to the Democrats. All the county officers at this time, with two exceptions, are Democrats. It can be said truthfully that in the long list of officers who have been elected by the Democrats in Custer county they have been men of probity and honor, ever mindful of the trust imposed in them by the voters of the party. The Democrats are justly proud of this record, and look upon the future with complacent hope for further successes."

VERY PROMINENT POLITICALLY

Not only the size and population of the county, but also the progressive spirit and the ability of its citizens, have helped to make the county prominent, and one to be reckoned with in all matters at the state capital. Custer enrolls the names of many men who have been prominent in state circles. In 1891 Omer M. Kem was elected to congress, and he served for two terms, or until 1895. So far Kem is the only congressman the county has produced. It has the honor, however, of having produced several candidates. One candidate, a distinguished citizen of Merna, W. J. Taylor, contested the position of Hon. M. P. Kinkaid, present congressman from the Sixth congressional district in two successive elections.

In 1891, A. R. Humphrey, of Broken

Bow, was appointed commissioner of public lands and buildings, in which capacity he served for four years. Beginning with Mr. Humphrey's term of office on the 1st day of January, 1891, it can be said that since that date there has not been a day in which some Custer county man was not filling a prominent state office.

In 1895 Hon. S. A. Holcomb, of Broken Bow, was elected governor, and he served as chief executive of the state until 1899. In 1900 E. P. Savage, of Sargent, was elected lieutenant governor, and by the resignation of Governor Charles H. Dietrich, who was elected to the United States senate, Mr. Savage succeeded to the executive chair in April, 1901; he served as governor until the end of the term in 1903. This makes two Custer county men who have filled the gubernatorial chair at Lincoln.

In November of 1900 ex-Governor S. A. Holcomb was elected judge of the supreme court, and he served in that capacity with honor to himself and credit to the county until 1906.

In 1909 J. R. Dean was appointed to the supreme bench, to fill a vacancy. In 1916 the judge was elected to the supreme bench for a six-year term, and he is now serving in the second year of the term.

In 1911 Walter A. George, of Broken Bow, was elected state treasurer, and he served four years.

Edward Royce, another Broken Bow man, was appointed secretary of the banking board in 1901 and he served until his death, in 1917.

In 1894 James Holland was made superintendent of the boys' industrial school at Kearney, and he held the office for five years.

In 1901 Charles Penn was made commandant of the soldiers' home at Milford and he filled the office until 1905.

For the last four years W. B. Eastman has been the state insurance commissioner, which position took him and his family from Broken Bow to Lincoln. Mr. Eastman is still in office and is serving under a second administration.

J. J. Tooley, of Anselmo, was appointed secretary of the state banking board in 1917, to fill the vacancy made by the death of the late Edward Royce, and he is still in office.

In the primaries of August 20, 1918, Hon. D. M. Amsberry, for many years receiver of United States land office at Broken Bow, was nominated on the Republican ticket for secretary of state.

THE PRIMARIES OF 1918

During the fall of 1918, political activities were centered in the two parties. Both the Democratic and Republican parties were active. On August 20th the primaries were held and the Democrats placed the following nominees on their county ticket: State senator, W. J. Taylor; representative, Emerson R. Purcell; representative, W. S. Wells; county clerk, R. E. Waters; register of deeds, Perry Foster; county treasurer, Mrs. M. Osbourn; sheriff, Joe Wilson; county attorney, William C. Schaper; surveyor, M. L. Lamb; District No. 1, R. J. Mills; District No. 3, Scott Cooper; District No. 5, J. P. Long; District No. 6, George W. Headley; District No. 7, John Walker.

The Republicans made an extra effort to secure representative men as nominees on their ticket and as a result of their primaries the following men were nominated as candidates on the Republican ticket: State senator, I. A. Reneau; representative, W. J. Rice; representative, Florian Jacobs; county clerk, Harry Knapp; register of deeds, George E. Porter; county treasurer, W. L. McCandless; sheriff, V. C. Talbot; county attorney, H. L. Wilson; county surveyor, A. J. Van Antwerp; District No. 1, Joseph Leui; District No. 3, Ralph Johnson; District No. 5, Harrison Pease; District No. 6, Ira E. Blakeslee.

THE ELECTION OF 1918

The campaign was conducted in a very strenuous way and as days progressed and the time of election approached, considerable excitement prevailed. Especially was this noticeable because it had been prophesied that it would be impossible to arouse any political enthusiasm.

C. S. Tooley was elected chairman of the Democratic county committee and Horace F. Kennedy chairman of the Republican county committee. Both were excellent men and organized their various committeemen in a very creditable manner. The fortunes of the day favored the Republicans. The entire state ticket as nominated by the Republicans was elected, and with this vote nearly all of the Republican candidates for county office were elected. The following is the official roster as it will stand in Custer county after January 1, 1919: State senator, J. W. Taylor, Democrat; representative, Emerson R. Purcell, Democrat; representative, Florian Jacobs, Republican; sheriff, V. C. Talbot, Republican; county clerk, Harry Knapp, Republican; register of deeds, George Porter, Republican; county treasurer, William L. McCandless, Republican; county surveyor, A. J. Van Antwerp, Republican; county attorney, William C. Schaper, Democrat.

On the non-partisan ticket Judge N. Dwight Ford was elected without opposition, to succeed himself. T. C. Grimes, the present incumbent was re-elected superintendent of public instruction for the fourth term, defeating, by a small margin, his opponent, W. A. Rosene, of Callaway.

Custer county is represented on the state ticket by D. M. Amsberry, of Broken Bow, who was elected secretary of state and who will continue the Custer county representation in the state house for the next two years. As his deputy he has appointed W. L. Gaston, of Broken Bow, and this makes at least two representatives from this county in the state capital during the term next ensuing.

LEGAL AND OTHER PROFESSIONS

THE HISTORY OF CUSTER COUNTY'S BAR — FIRST GRAND JURY — A HOG IN THE FIRST CASE — A LAWYER ENGAGED IN USEFUL WORK — TWO CUSTER COUNTY JUDGES — ANOTHER CLASS — THE YOUNGER BLOODS — DIDN'T KNOW ANYTHING — WAS CRIMINAL ENOUGH — NO SPREAD-EAGLE STUFF — HAD TO BE SHOWN — HAD TWO CHANCES TO ESCAPE — SUMMONED THE DEAD MAN — CONFUSED THE WITNESS — ALL LAWYERS ON THE SAME SIDE — TOO OLD FOR THE PEN — TEN WAS A PLenty — TRIALS BY DAY AND NIGHT — A SQUARE LAWYER — CUSTER COUNTY MEDICAL MEN

The people of Custer county are loyal to their own. They are proud of their county and its resources. They are equally proud of their social and professional achievements. Proud of their farms, proud of their farmers, they are proud, too, of their professional men. They possess a wealth of professional men which marks them throughout the state.

No other county of like population has brainier lawyers, more efficient physicians, or more competent dentists. No county has a brighter corps of newspaper men, or more eloquent or fluent clergymen. The professional men and women in the high schools and the grade schools are likewise the peers of any teachers in the land. All these professions are well and strongly represented. Every profession is headed by men who have statewide reputation, and in any professional conclave they play the role of leaders.

Her professional sons have served in congress, and on the supreme bench of the state. In high positions of public trust they have captured the highest honors the state has power to bestow. In educational circles and on the public platform, Custer county has furnished her quota of peers and masters. Her physicians and dentists occupy high places in the annals of their state organizations. Custer county, which began its career over forty years ago, has graduated from the university of actual experience a class of professional men and women who to-day contribute to the county rank and honor throughout the middle west.

A full account of the professional activities of the men of Custer county cannot be given. Data are not procurable. All that can be done is to detail a few brief facts concerning the professions that have organization records.

THE HISTORY OF CUSTER COUNTY'S BAR

Shortly after the organization of Custer county, in 1877, and the opening of the courts, in the early '80s, came an influx of bright and energetic young men to practice as attorneys and establish themselves in law. Several of these early lawyers found Custer county so attractive that they have never left it. They early established themselves as among the most active and influential members of the community and are to-day, with hardly an exception, among the most substantial men in the county.

The early bar of Custer county consisted of John S. Kirkpatrick, J. A. Armour, Silas A. Holcomb, George W. Trefren, A. Kilgore, J. W. Hutchinson, James Ledwich, Homer M. Sullivan, Augustus R. Humphrey, R. E. Brega, Emil Gschwind, Fred G. Waite, E. P. Campbell, and Charles L. Gutterson.

The call for the first terms of district court in Custer county was issued on January 1, 1883, by Judge William Gaslin, to be held on May 10 and October 9 of the same year. The first term was a two-day affair, opened by Jess Gandy, sheriff, with Samuel L. Savage presiding as district judge, J. W. Bixler serving as district attorney, and Wilson Hewitt clerk of the court.

FIRST GRAND JURY

The grand jury which was empaneled, returned true bills indicting a total of twelve persons, — three for setting fire to the prairie, three for unlawfully practicing medicine, two for selling liquor without license, two for shooting with intent to kill, one for felonious assault, and one for stabbing with intent to kill.

At this term J. S. Kirkpatrick, J. A. Armour, and the late Francis G. Hamer were appointed an examining committee to pass on the qualifications for admission to the bar of Florentus M. Hallowell and Thomas Young. They reported favorably and both candidates were admitted to practice law in the courts of the state.

There were eight civil cases and one criminal case on the docket, but no attorney was ready for trial. It is said that the young attorneys had a severe attack of stage fright.

No trial developed. Four cases were dismissed, "as per stipulation on file." The court dismissed three more, on motion. This left but two cases on the docket, on both of which the attorneys were given additional time to plead.

The October term began October 9th, with the same officers, except that Jess Gandy, sheriff, had gone on a deer and elk hunt into the sand-hills, and L. S. Trefren was acting in his stead.

A HOG IN THE FIRST CASE

While more important cases were getting ready for trial, the first case tried in the district court, Custer county, Nebraska, was given to the jury. This was the case of J. A. Perkins, plaintiff, vs. Jackson Dye, defendant. It was an action in replevin for "one black and white hog fourteen months of age."

The jury did not take many days and nights to settle the case, but returned their verdict very promptly, finding that plaintiff was entitled to possession of the hog, that the hog's value was nine dollars, and plaintiff's damages for its wrongful detention by the defendant, one dollar. But let no one suppose the defendant got off by paying any trifling sum. Every witness, both in justice and district court, was served with his "subpoena" and awarded his "mileage." When Mr. Dye came to pay the bill, it was one dollar for the judgment and $161.63 for the "court costs," which made the hog he entertained for a short time, "some hog" after all.

Such was the beginning made in the terms of court holden in Custer county, Nebraska, in the year 1883. The early litigation in the county centered largely around land and cattle. At the time the county was organized, cattle-grazing was its only industry. The various ranchmen had acquired or were acquiring title to the land bordering the rivers and creeks of the county, and all the hills lying back from these water fronts were recognized as the range of the man who owned the water front.

With the coming of the homesteaders, by thousands, in the middle '80s came the shortening and breaking up of all these ranges and ranches. While most of the homesteaders were honest and honorable, some few shady characters filtered into the settlements, who, when they became hungry for beef, found it easier to kill some ranchman's calf, heifer, steer, or cow, than to stalk a deer or elk by following the fast disappearing supply of such wild game into the sand-hills.

Indeed, some of the bolder of these marauders were not satisfied with poaching sufficient beef from the ranchmen to supply their scanty table with the choicest of grass-fatted steaks but, the ranchmen allege, did a regular business of killing ranch cattle, burying or burning the hides and taking the beef by wagon to Kearney and other towns. This, of course, led to all kinds of endeavors on the part of the ranchmen to be rid of these particular offenders, and this, together with the encroachments on their range, created a strong antagonism between the ranchmen and early homesteaders.

In working out these difficulties numerous criminal cases arose, involving almost everything from "claim jumping" and cattle stealing to the first degree of murder. In the prosecution and defense of cases of this kind, H. M. Sinclair, of Kearney, H. M. Sullivan, of Broken Bow, and others, early won their reputations as criminal lawyers.

Custer county has produced rather more than its share of lawyers who have received high political honor. Perhaps the most conspicuous of these is Silas A. Holcomb, heretofore mentioned as one of the pioneer attorneys of the county. Mr. Holcomb first came into political prominence by winning the district judgeship, as a candidate of the Populist and Democratic parties. While still a district judge he received the Populist nomination for governor, was endorsed by the Democrats, and was elected, being the only successful member of his ticket. Judge Holcomb was then re-elected as governor. Following, a few months after his retirement as governor, came his election to a six years' term as judge of the supreme court. At the present time Judge

Holcomb is serving his second term as a member of the state board of control.

When asked to write something for this chapter, Judge Holcomb submitted the following, which gives a good picture of conditions in legal circles in the days of the pioneer:

"I was admitted to the bar in March, 1882, and removed to Broken Bow in the early spring of 1883, about March 1st. The town was then rather small, but the outlook promising. There were two lawyers there. One was George W. Trefren, who was in the land-office business, with Wilson Hewitt, who was county clerk, the two doing a 'land-office' business, sure enough, at the time, as the country was just beginning to settle up rapidly. I also found that my old partner, John S. Kirkpatrick, had 'beat me to it,' he having removed to Broken Bow in the fall of 1882 and located himself and family in a little building, about twelve by twenty-four, on the east side of the square, about the center of the block. After looking around, taking in the town, and getting acquainted I became more interested in my competitors in the law business and began to, as best I could, size up Trefren and 'Kirk' as possible opponents in hard-fought legal battles in which I was to be employed as one of the lawyers.

A LAWYER ENGAGED IN USEFUL WORK

"When I first saw 'Kirk,' and he was then a great, big, fat fellow, he was in his shirt-sleeves, with rubber boots on, and with a spade was digging a trench to let the water run away from his building. Strange as it may seem, there was rainfall enough to make it necessary for him to lead the water away from his building in order to make it more accessible. I concluded, after looking at 'Kirk' for a while, and then introducing myself and having a brief talk with him, that I could hold my own in a lawsuit where he was on the other side, but after a few contests with 'Kirk' in the legal arena, I became convinced that I had underestimated his strength as an adversary in legal proceedings. I soon learned to respect him as a young man of considerable ability and one who was both plausible and convincing in his arguments to both court and jury, and especially was I impressed with the conviction that he won the confidence of the court and jury, who seemed to believe in his earnestness and sincerity as to the right of the matter he was advocating. Later on, Judge Sullivan and Judge Humphrey showed up, and with this accession in numbers and talent we had some real litigation and began to look upon ourselves as a bar of some pretensions, besides which we began to work together, when necessary, to crowd out the lawyers who had been coming to Custer county from Dawson, Buffalo, Sherman, and other counties and doing a good share of the business which we felt belonged to us by right of our residence in the county; in this we succeeded and it was not very long until a large percentage of the legal business in the county was done by the local members of the bar.

"The bar continued to grow in numbers and strength until it was, in a few years, recognized as one of the strong bars of the state. The county settled up rapidly, and, being a large county, with a large population, the law business was all the more important, thus bringing together members of the legal fraternity in larger numbers than would be found in the smaller county-seats.

"In 1891 I was elected district judge of the then twelfth judicial district, since which I have not been permitted to be closely associated with the members of the bar in active practice, except for but a brief period from 1908 to 1912. There are so many incidents, interesting, humorous, ludicrous, and otherwise, in connection with the early years of my practice, that I can hardly select any of them, and as we have a number of old-time lawyers who are good story tellers, I am inclined to leave this phase of the history of the bar to them as being in more capable hands."

Another attorney to rise to the judicial ermine from old Custer is Judge J. R. Dean. Judge Dean was elevated to the Nebraska supreme bench by appointment, but is now serving as a regularly elected member of that judicial body.

TWO CUSTER COUNTY JUDGES

Judge Homer M. Sullivan and Judge Charles L. Gutterson have both served as judges of our district court, the former obtaining the office at a popular election, the latter by appointment. John S. Kirkpatrick, heretofore mentioned as one of the very earliest pioneer attorneys of Custer county, was appointed a member of the supreme-court commission and served several years in that position. He still appears frequently in Custer county courts, as private counsel of the Dierks Lumber & Coal Company, but his office is now in Kansas City, Missouri.

The Custer county bar at the present time, consists of the following attorneys who have seen many years of practice in this location: Judge Homer M. Sullivan, Judge A. R. Humphrey, Judge J. A. Armour, Judge C. L. Gutterson, R. E. Brega, and Alpha Morgan. All of these men were among the early pioneers of Custer county and all are still in active practice, with one exception, maintaining offices at the county seat. It would be hard to find the same number of professional men who represent greater ability or more force of character. They have met all the emergencies of a new and developing county and have rung true in every test. Their competency and integrity would do fine credit to the bar of any community. All of them have accumulated enough to make them comfortable, and are not obliged to lie in wait for clients as in former days.

ANOTHER CLASS

The county bar roster contains the following names of veteran leaders who have been in active practice for many years, yet in point of time stand on the next terrace below the pioneer practitioners: Judge John Reese, Judge C. H. Holcomb, Hon. Charles W. Beal, Nathan T. Gadd, A. P. Johnson, and Edwin E. Squires. These men are just coming to the zenith of their power and already have a reputation throughout the state as able and trustworthy exponents of law. With the exception of one who has retired to his ranch, all have good and lucrative practice, which pays the best possible tribute to their standing and character. Emil Gschwind, heretofore mentioned as a member of Custer county's early bar, has for many years been police judge of Broken Bow.

THE YOUNGER BLOODS

The bar has still another class, of younger members, with a standing of ten years or less at the Custer county bar. All of these are law-school products or college-bred, or both. This class roll contains the names of Judge N. Dwight Ford, Frank Kelley, H. L. Wilson, J. A. Brunt, William C. Schaper, and Edwin F. Myers. These young men are already well established and are gaining rapidly in both experience and clientage. In the realm of law, they are already bridle-wise and harness-broke; they may well be depended upon to maintain the dignity of the Custer county bar, and sustain the reputation of their predecessors of the former generation.

DIDN'T KNOW ANYTHING

Judge Gaslin was a good judge and he was impatient of delay. Sometimes he held court in Custer county. One cold winter night just before adjournment, and it was then about eleven o'clock, the judge announced to the bar that in order to speed up, court would open in the morning promptly at half-past seven o'clock and any lawyers having cases might take notice and be on hand. At the appointed hour, court, counsel, litigants, and witnesses were all there. The thermometer then registered several degrees below zero, which added to the solemnity and inconvenience of the occasion. William Blair, who had been janitor of the court house ever since it was built, was called as the first witness when court opened, and among other things remarked that he "didn't know anything about the case, anyway." The judge remarked: "What's that, Billy? Don't know anything about this case? Then what are you doing on the witness stand? Get out of there and let some witness come to the front who knows something about this case. There are too many people in this case now that don't seem to know very much about it, lawyers included."

WAS CRIMINAL ENOUGH

Judge J. C. Naylor was a pioneer lawyer. When asked why criminal cases were not disposed of before civil cases, as is the usual practice, he replied that the disposal of the farm-mortgage cases was not a departure from the rule, because there seemed to be as much criminality in the prosecution of the foreclosures as there was in the criminal cases.

NO SPREAD-EAGLE STUFF

Judge Naylor was an attorney in a case that originally involved a trifling sum of money, but later on much feeling was engendered, in part because the costs were large and became the main feature. Judge Gaslin presided and, knowing Judge Naylor's proneness to make long and eloquent speeches to the jury on slight provocation, just before the argument he began to admonish the lawyers in this fashion: "Gentlemen, you are limited to ten minutes on each side. I want you to understand that in a case involving only $8.30 you can't go before the jury with a long-winded history of the universe nor a 4th of July speech." But the lawyers on both sides got their views to the jury, in their arguments to the court, on the importance of the case to the public and the profession because of the principles of law involved and to the litigants because of the large amount of costs.

HAD TO BE SHOWN

A lawyer, from another district, in an argument before Judge William L. Greene, read from a Nebraska report, a proposition of law that did not appeal to the judge, and he remarked that if he were shown that our supreme court said it twice he would have more respect for the proposition than he was then able to entertain. On investigation, the judge found the lawyer had read from the brief of counsel that is sometimes inserted in the reported decisions.

HAD TWO CHANCES TO ESCAPE

A lawyer for defendant in a criminal case took earnest exception to the fact that his client had two preliminary examinations. Judge Greene overruled the exception and remarked that he ought not to complain, because his client had been generously treated, in that he was given two chances to escape before the trial, when he was only entitled to one.

SUMMONED THE DEAD MAN

When Judge H. M. Sinclair, of Kearney, was on the bench, a foreclosure case was pending in which the principal defendant died after the case was begun. Apparently the plaintiff was not aware of this, and the usual summons was issued. The return by the special deputy appointed to serve the summons, was the first intimation to any person connected with the case that the defendant was dead. His return recited in substance that: "John Doe is dead. I served this summons on him by leaving a true copy thereof at his last usual place of residence." Upon reading the return, Judge Sinclair remarked: "Custer county has many remarkable and efficient citizens, but here is a man who has surpassed them all. This is the first time in my experience as lawyer and judge that a man has been found who can obtain service of summons on a dead man." The record shows that the Judge continued the case.

CONFUSED THE WITNESS

A lawyer from some remote region was testifying as a witness in his client's case. The attorney for the other party insisted that, in order to keep the record straight, he submit his testimony in the form of questions and answers. All proceeded well until an objection was interposed on the ground that a certain question that the lawyer propounded to himself "tended to confuse the witness." That was too much for Judge H. M. Sullivan, who presided at the trial, and he ruled that the narrative form of submitting testimony be resumed.

ALL LAWYERS ON THE SAME SIDE

Two members of the same family were acquitted of an assault to commit great bodily injury. There were two attorneys for the state and two for defendants. The case was warmly contested for two or three days. There was not a dull moment from the opening to the close. When the verdict of acquittal was returned, one of the defendants took one of the attorneys for the prosecution by the hand, remarking that as they had been friends before he hoped their friendship would continue. The other defendant, a boy of about eighteen, assured the same attorney that he had nothing against him nor his associate "because both of you did as much for us in this trial as our own lawyers did."

TOO OLD FOR THE PEN

Judge Aaron Wall, of Loup City, and a local lawyer successfully defended a client wrongfully accused of taking mortgaged chattels out of the county. The defendant's lawyers argued that if their aged client was convicted he would only hear the prison doors clank when he entered; that he would not hear them when he came out in his casket. A Norwegian juror said after the trial was over: "Das man too alt to send to pan. Send him to poor farm; das better." The prosecutor said the next criminal case he prosecuted, the first fact he would establish after the venue would be the age of the defendant.

TEN WAS A PLenty

Robert E. Moore was a rapid-fire cross-examiner. On the cross-examination of a Swedish witness on character, after having him tell the names of about ten men who had spoken ill of the subject of inquiry, the witness began to run low on names. After being pressed to give just one more name he refused. When asked why he replied: "Well, ay bane over my township and ay live on county line and Gothenburg man bane no good in Custer; anyhow, ten names bane plenty." When order was restored in the crowded court room the witness was excused.

TRIALS BY DAY AND NIGHT

Night came on while a preliminary examination in a criminal case was being conducted before Justice Maze, at Lodi, in 1892. But night had no terrors for the valiant counsel, and when the shades of evening fell and the country-side came out to witness the usual forensic efforts, the justice adjourned court from his residence to a convenient schoolhouse, where the hearing ended a little before day-break, and the lawyers arrived in Callaway just in time for breakfast. The same thing happened in a civil case tried before a justice at Callaway in 1902. After a trial lasting all day and all night the case was finally submitted in time for all parties to get breakfast.

A SQUARE LAWYER

Judge John S. Kirkpatrick was a square lawyer and dependable. A beginner in the practice undertook to get a large sum of damages for the condemnation of land for a railroad switch. The costs began to pile up. "Kirk," who represented the railroad, warned the opposing lawyer to "be careful about making costs, because your client is going to have to pay all of them." And so it turned out. In speaking of the incident afterwards the lawyer whose client "paid the costs" remarked that he often heard that "Kirk" could be depended on, and now he was sure of it.

CUSTER COUNTY MEDICAL MEN

Call the doctor. It doesn't make any difference which one, they are all good. They are all trained school men, educated in the best schools to be found anywhere in the country. They are adepts in the latest methods, they are skillful combatants of all diseases and human ailments. In the quality of her medical men, Custer county ranks with any like portion of the earth. Many of them have made reputations outside of the county and are known throughout the state, and have frequent calls for consultation far from their respective homes.

In the early days the practice of medicine was followed under many difficulties. At that time, the medical science was not so far advanced. Not so many methods of resisting disease encroachments were known. Not so many appliances and commodities were to be obtained. Sanitary conditions could not be so well maintained. Yet, the practitioners of that early day were heroes. They mercifully responded to every call. No night was too dark, no road too long, no storm too fierce. They shielded themselves from no exposure — pay or not pay. It made no difference; their services were rendered for the sake of God and humanity.

One of the old time practitioners, Dr. R. C. Talbot, who is himself well deserving of every encomium recorded in the paragraph above, has contributed the following concerning the medical profession of Custer county:

"The members of the medical profession were pioneers in the early settlement of Custer county, the same as those representing other professions and industries. Those who first came here early, were more often lured by wanderlust for change of environment than for improvement in their professional surroundings. The first man to make a permanent home in the county, who made any pretensions to medical knowledge, was L. T. Burbank, a returned foreign missionary who, prior to his foreign work, had taken a course in medical lectures, to better prepare him for work among the heathen. Dr. Burbank settled on a homestead not far from the present location of Georgetown postoffice, about 1875 or 1876. As he went from one settlement to another, preaching and encouraging the pioneers spiritually, he also administered to their physical needs as well.

"In September, 1889, Dr. R. C. Talbot, a graduate of Miami Medical College, Cincinnati, Ohio, located on a homestead in the valley of the Muddy creek, near where the town of Berwyn is now located. Although desiring to relinquish the practice of medicine, he found it almost an actual necessity to continue to attend the sick among the sparsely settled homesteaders. The hardy pioneers of those days did not call a doctor for every little ache or pain, for to so do it would often necessitate a journey of ten to twenty-five or more miles before a doctor could be found, and the necessary further delay of a return trip threw them on their own resources. Consequently, a doctor was called only when there was something serious or alarming affecting the ailing one.

"In July, 1880, T. N. Waterbury located a homestead north of where the town of Westerville is now situated, and he practiced his profession as an undergraduate until the winter of 1882, when he went to St. Louis, Missouri, and attended the American Medical College. He returned a graduate, in the spring of 1888, and continued in the work of his profession until his final sickness and death, in September, 1884.

"During the early '80s Benjamin L. Brisbane homesteaded near Custer postoffice and he preached the gospel and practiced medicine for several years. He did not make the practice of medicine a business, although he was a graduate of Ohio Medical College, Cincinnati, believing he could be of more benefit to the people in the capacity of a preacher.

"Dr. Wyman Hull located in Broken Bow in the early establishment of the town and practiced medicine part of the time, but devoted most of his time to the management of the famous Marble Top hotel.

"In the fall of 1883, John J. Daum, a graduate of Rush Medical College, Chicago, established an office in Broken Bow, and he practiced his profession until his death, which occurred in the early '90s at Palmer Lake, Colorado, where he had gone in the hope of regaining his health. He had been associated with Dr. R. C. Talbot, in Broken Bow, from 1888 until the time of his death.

"In the year 1883 Dr. Lawrence L. Crawford, a graduate of Cincinnati College of Medicine and Surgery, located in Merna, where he continued in business until in the late '90s, when he located in Colorado.

"In 1884 Clarence W. Mesceran located in Broken Bow, being a graduate of Bennett Medical College, Chicago, Illinois. He continued in business here for several years, being associated part of that time with Rufus K. Langson, who was a graduate of the Chicago Homeopathic Medical College, Chicago, Illinois.

"In 1884 C. H. Morris located in Westerville, taking up the work of Dr. Waterbury. A few years afterward he located in Broken Bow.

"J. W. Miller, of Rush Medical College, Chicago, Illinois, located in Mason City in 1885 and remained there until the late '90s, at which time he went to Gibbon, Nebraska.

"In 1883 J. M. Chaplin, of Dulano Medical College, came to Callaway, and he was there for a few years.

"J. H. Murry, Iowa College of Physicians and Surgeons, Des Moines, Iowa, located in Arnold in 1885, remained there for several years and then moved to Idaho. Thomas E. Stack located at or near Oconto in 1885. Afterward he moved to Broken Bow and in a short time he located at Anselmo. William Robert Renwick, of University City Medical College of New York, located at Sargent in 1883 and remained there for a few years. During the year 1885 F. Vinsonhaler located in Westerville. Dr. Vinsonhaler was a graduate of the College of Physicians and Surgeons, New York city, and remained in Westerville for several years. In 1885 Luther Michael, of the Ohio Medical College, of Cincinnati, Ohio, located in Callaway and remained for a few years.

"In 1886, the year the B. & M. Railroad was built through the county, the following named doctors located in the county: J. J. Pickett, Charles M. Luckey, J. W. Sanders, Franklin Reyner, and James W. Caldwell at Broken Bow; Hiram Chase, Mason City; E. E. Hamilton, Anselmo; Alexander L. Mathews, William H. Charlesworth, at Callaway. Dr. J. J. Pickett was at Broken Bow, except a short time at Greeley Center, up to the time of his death, in 1912. The others remained in Broken Bow only a short time. Of those who located outside of Broken Bow all but A. L. Mathews remained only a short time. Dr. Mathews is still at Callaway, but has retired from active practice. In the years 1887 and 1888 H. H. Wist, Cyrus Pickett, and J. J. Carpenter came to Broken Bow, but none of them is here now. Dr. Wist devoted little of his time to the practice of medicine. In other parts of the county during this time Dr. Wambole came to West Union and Dr. Barton to Wescott.

"From this time on doctors came and went in such numbers that it would take up too much time and space to mention each one. Taking Broken Bow as an instance of the doctors who have located there, Dr. J. J. Pickett is the only one who has died there. The profession of this county has been and still remains quite a factor in the improvement of sanitary conditions, in the way of preventing and controlling infectious and contagious diseases. The Custer County Medical Society has been a large factor through united team work, placing the upbuilding of both the profession and society at the front of its efforts. This society was organized in the late '80s, was reorganized in the early '90s, and during this time its membership list has contained the names of a large percentage of the doctors of the county. The frequent and harmonious meetings have been of mutual benefit, and its influence has been extended until it has reached the profession of the state through the State Medical Society.

"Last, and by no means least, the medical profession stands one hundred per cent. patriotic in the great world-war, as every resident member has voluntarily enlisted his services to the government to be used wherever and when called upon. The county has already furnished more than its quota for active service, represented by the following named: Dr. O. L. Housell, first lieutenant; Dr. R. P. Higgins, captain, of Ansley; Dr. R. D. Bryson, captain, of Callaway; Dr. W. E. Talbot, captain, of Broken Bow; Dr. J. C. Wade, lieutenant, of Oconto; Dr. C. L. Wills, captain, of Anselmo."

In every national emergency Custer county has done its part. It has contributed to the manpower of the national army whenever a call has been made. To every appeal for money made by any department of war work, it has contributed lavishly. In all these matters it has a record in which every citizen can delight.

The county had no population in the days of the Civil war and, consequently, was not called upon for recruits to the federal army. Immediately after the war, vast tracts of the public domain were thrown open to free homestead entry. The liberal policy of the government in allowing the ex-soldier to apply his army time on his homestead time, brought a great influx of northern soldiers into the middle west, and Custer county got its share. Owing to this fact, the Grand Army of the Republic, or the G. A. R. as it was more commonly called, became a very noteworthy organization. In the heyday of its power, nine G. A. R. posts flourished in the county. It was due to these ex-soldiers that the rising generation had instruction in patriotism and was taught allegiance to the flag. In fact, the presence of so many defenders of the republic in every community, engendered an atmosphere of patriotism which, no doubt, had a very salutary effect upon the country.

In 1898, during the Spanish-American war, Custer county furnished her quota, as will be seen in a further perusal of this chapter. In the great war of the world, Custer county has responded to every call. It has contributed to Y. M. C. A. war work, Red Cross work, Knights of Columbus war work, bond subscriptions, savings-stamps subscriptions, and Red Cross war work. The people have made every sacrifice asked of them. They have heartily entered into every proposition of conservation of either food or fuel, more detailed mention of which will follow.

THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC

J. M. Fodge, of Broken Bow, a veteran of the Grand Army of the Republic, has assembled the following data relative to the G. A. R. posts in the county. Much credit is due Mr. Fodge for the painstaking manner in which he has furnished details. Through his kindness we are enabled to present a brief description of each post in the county.

The old soldier is mustering out very rapidly. In a few more years the veteran in blue will be gone, and his place will be taken by his sons of the second generation, who to-day are wearing the khaki and serving in the great army of the United States, either in the home cantonments or in the battle fields of France and Belgium.

BROKEN BOW ORGANIZES A POST

C. C. Washburn Post No. 98, Grand Army of the Republic, was organized August 12, 1882, with fifteen charter members as follows: R. H. Miller, H. C. Reyner, Irving Stocker, Peter Dinger, Mark King, Moses Lewis, Wallace Raymond, C. F. Graves, J. S. Benjamin, Albert Kemp, George Bishop, John West, I. J. Shaul, R. P. McKnight, and Charles P. Fost.

The mustering of and the first meetings of the post were held in a large sod house, situated on the corner now occupied by the Broken Bow State Bank. This sod building was erected by R. H. Miller, and served as his residence. Later it became the home of the Custer County Republican, with Mr. Miller as editor and manager, as well as the meeting place for the post.

Of the above mentioned charter members, so far as we can learn, only Judge J. S. Benjamin survives. He, with his wife, continues to live upon his homestead, adjoining the city upon the north. Although in feeble health, the Judge enjoys the esteem and good will of his many friends, is always more than glad to recall with them the many thrilling and heroic events of the early days, and to fight over again with his old comrades the battles of the '60s.

Because this post has made a number of removals, having no place in which to meet and keep its papers and records, we cannot give the names and terms of the several commanders, accurately. For correctness of names of those that follow, we are indebted to the memories of several comrades consulted, in addition to such records as can be used.

R. H. Miller was the first commander, then J. S. Benjamin, G. W. Frye, John C. Maulick, J. W. Bruce, M. K. Hagadorn, R. E. Glass, M. M. Parkhurst, John Reese, James Whitehead, A. W. Gandy, W. W. Cowles, W. S. Boyce, G. W. Rawson, Ner Hartley, R. R. Bangs, H. W. George, A. W. Drake, W. H. Andrews, J. M. Fodge, J. B. Klump, and Henry H. Myers. Eleven of them are dead.

The roster and descriptive list shows there have been mustered into this post, up to and including August 7, 1918, in all 198 members. Of this great number, only eighteen remain on said roster, as shown by the last official report, on June 30, 1918. There are, however, that many more yet living within easy reach, who from the infirmities of age and other causes do not have membership with the post.

When one remembers that it is more than half a century since the men who compose the Grand Army of the Republic put aside the weapons of war and assumed the duties and responsibilities of the civilian, many of them already shattered in health because of service, exposures and hardships of camp life, then can we find the reason for the thinning ranks, and can only wonder that as many as above reported now live.

It is due to these, and to their posterity, that some recognition, at least, be given to a few of those noble men who so unselfishly sacrificed their time and comfort, that suffering be relieved, that civil laws and authority be established—in short, in leaving as a heritage an enlightened, patriotic, peace-loving, and Christian community in which to live.

Of this great number of men you have known, we can only mention a few that have contributed to this end, as follows: W. D. Hall, John Ingham, R. C. Talbott, W. W. Cowles, Isaac Merchant, Milo Young, James Whitehead, Charles T. Crawford, James L. Oxford, A. W. Gandy, M. H. Deem, who with a host of others, in their various positions, and capacities, contributed so much to the social, economic, and religious condition of our present society.

We cannot refrain from mentioning the ladies of the Woman's Relief Corps, an auxiliary of the Grand Army—the wives, daughters, and other loyal women of the community who have aided so grandly in ministering to the sick and the needy of these comrades and the widows through all the years the post has existed.

BERWYN POST

Berwyn Post, No. 307, was mustered and held its first meeting in the schoolhouse in the village of Berwyn, July 12, 1890, with eight members. John Low was chosen commander, with I. McAllister adjutant, and R. W. Buckner as quartermaster. The date for meeting was the second Saturday.

In point of numbers, this was perhaps the weakest post organized in the county, and yet it was organized at a time when the patriotic fervor in the county was at its highest, because of the district reunions that were being held annually under the management of the Central Nebraska Veteran Association, comprising the counties of Custer, Dawson, Sherman, Valley, Loup, Blaine, and Logan. These reunions lasted two and three days, with tents for camping, sham battles with artillery, cavalry, and infantry, with programs and campfires for the evenings, and conspired to fire the "old war spirit in old soldiers." The last one of these reunions was held at Ansley, in which a novel engagement took place. Others had been held at Broken Bow and at Ord, in Valley county.

Hundreds of the comrades with their families enjoyed these camping and educational gatherings. So it was under such influence this post was instituted and lived. We do not have the date on which they were suspended or surrendered charter, more than they reported in the annual report of December, 1894, and it must necessarily have been later. Department headquarters have no account of it.

POST AT MASON CITY

Stone River Post, No. 339, was mustered

April 20, 1895, with fifteen names on the charter. The first commander was H. J. Davis, with T. S. Crossley, adjutant, and Jacob Cover, quartermaster. The meetings were held the first and third Saturday evening of each month.

We have no authentic account of how many members have been mustered into this post since the primary muster. The last annual report to the department headquarters was made December 31, 1917, and gave at that date seven members still on the roll—John Mulvaney, commander; H. J. Davis, adjutant; and R. K. Miller, quartermaster.

The comrades who have belonged to this post, as in every other Grand Army post in our order throughout the nation, exerted an influence for good upon society, in that the young have been taught patriotism and love of home and native land.

POST AT ANSLEY

Steadman Post, No. 180, located now at Ansley, was originally mustered at Westerville, February 20, 1884. There were 108 names on the charter at organization. The first commander was M. Richtmyer, the name of an adjutant is not given, but M. M. Lamphear was quartermaster.

The last semi-annual report to department headquarters, made June 30, 1918, gave the membership as eleven, with George William as commander, and O. B. Foster, adjutant. The post meets the last Thursday in each month.

The ladies of the Woman's Relief Corps, a patriotic organization that is composed only of the wives and daughters of veterans of the Civil war, and is an auxiliary to the Grand Army of the Republic, have greatly aided in keeping the patriotic spirit that dominates the whole people of the community.

Of the many comrades who have in the past comprised this post, we recall Isaac Clark, M. Johnson, J. F. Sharpless, T. T. Varney, C. S. Ellison, Tip Daniels, Daniel Hagin, S. B. Harris, H. Alberts, T. T. Williams, with others whose names we have not space to mention, but who have by their sterling virtues and patriotic lives, aided so materially in the making of one of the best and most desirable communities in which to live.

The spirit of liberty inculcated, is evidenced by the ready response to the country's call by the many young men who went "over there," or have been in training to aid in the overthrow of autocracy and tyranny.

POST AT ARNOLD

Excelsior Post, No. 196, was organized at Arnold August 25, 1884. The officers reported at organization were: R. C. Callahan, commander; A. H. Needham, adjutant; and M. S. Pasko, quartermaster. We cannot give names or number of members of muster, as the post never filed descriptive list or report at suspension. The post was suspended in 1910, as shown by department records. It was reinstated May 22, 1911, and suspended again November 19, 1913, at which time T. C. Babcock was the commander and A. H. Needham was the adjutant.

There were reported six members at this time, but their names were not returned to the adjutant general at date of suspension.

This post had more ups and downs than fall to the lot of many, perhaps for two reasons — first, because of the long distance from the railroad, which has proven such a factor in the civilization of our great state, and partly, it may be, because the spirit of war that permeated the "boys" in the '60s, was still so strong upon their lives that it was the dominating passion. Whatever the causes for the post's lapses and suspensions, we can say for the members of this post, and the citizens of Arnold and community, that there are no finer citizens and people, or more progressive, than settled upon the homesteads surrounding that village.

We are sure that her citizens of the past and the present can point with a just pride to the lives and example of such men as B. F. Marrow, C. T. Robinson, Thomas Halliday, Comrades Brown, Blowers, H. M. Graham, Needham, and Babcock, and others whose names we do not recall. The fact that no authentic account of the members and the several parts that each played in those days, as officers, and who of them have answered to the last roll call, or those who remain in the vicinity, is due to their not having a permanent meeting place, in which the papers and records could be kept. This reason also applies to many other Grand Army posts in Nebraska.

THE POST AT SARGENT

G. W. Sweet Post, No. 195, Grand Army of the Republic, was chartered and organized, in the village of West Union, on the 27th day of August, 1884, where it met in the schoolhouse for awhile. Later it was removed to the town of Sargent. The charter shows there were eighteen members at the muster of the post. J. H. Russell was the first commander, A. W. Squires the first adjutant, and Louis Sutton the quartermaster.

We are unable to state how many members have joined this post since, or what has become of those that were in the first meeting. However, there are a host of true men and women in and around the splendid little town of Sargent who are the offspring of such men as George and William Sherman, F. S. Morris, I. C. Tobias, L. W. F. Cole, Dr. Wamsley, R. W. Fulton, R. W. Nutter, James L. Twigg, H. C. Orvis, and others, who proved their loyalty by their courage and fidelity to duty, not only as soldiers, when their country was threatened by dissolution, but also when they faced the task of subduing the wild and virgin soil, braving the elements and dangers incident to the early settlement of that part of our great commonwealth, combining with duties and virtues the spirit of morality, Christianity, and good citizenship, thus leaving to their posterity a noble heritage.

December 30, 1917, the annual report of this post to the department showed only four members, with David McGugan as commander, and R. W. Fulton, adjutant. Three of this remnant have recently made the trip to Portland, Oregon, to attend the fifty-second national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, which met August 19, 1918.

POST AT COMSTOCK

Crittenden Post, No. 274, was originally mustered at the village of Wescott, July 19, 1888. Who the charter members or the first officers were, we do not know. However, from the annual report made December 31, 1888, we have W. H. Comstock commander for the year 1889, but no other officers or names of members. The annual report made in 1894 gives fifteen members, with I. M. Beck, commander; F. Shanks, adjutant; and W. H. Comstock, quartermaster. The post met the second Saturday in each month. The post is still in existence, meeting on call, as shown by last report to department headquarters. W. P. Hamond is commander; G. W. Shiphard is adjutant; and only four members are left.

This post was one of the largest in the county. The first place settled in the county was in the neighborhood of Wescott and Comstock. The years 1874-7 saw a colony or, if not exactly a colony, a number, of Wisconsin soldiers come to this section, where they were among the first to make settlement.

The Indian uprising among the Sioux in the Niobrara country caused alarm, and Captain Comstock was among the number to raise a company of these men who had known war, to arm for protection of their families. This part of the history is recorded in another place, however.

Of the many comrades who have helped to make this a community of loyal and progressive people, many have passed on, having answered to the Great Commander at the last roll call. We mention W. H. Comstock, J. L. Peter, E. Bartholomew, Captain Wescott, W. D. Hall, and Mr. Beck, and while others have gone and are missed by families and comrades, their influence is with us yet, as evidenced by the many boys who have donned the "khaki," and offered their lives for freedom and justice, so unselfishly as to astonish the Old World and, by this spirit of freedom, emulate the "Man of Galilee."

POST AT CALLAWAY

William Hayes Post, No. 264, Grand Army of the Republic, was mustered the 31st day of March, 1888. As no descriptive list is on file with the department adjutant in the state house, we cannot give names of charter members or officers installed at that time. The annual report made December 31st of that year shows that J. H. Evans was elected commander for 1889, with J. B. Farrell as adjutant and C. W. H. Lubert as quartermaster. No report of membership. The annual report of December 31, 1890, gave a membership of thirty-four.

In December, 1894, there were twenty-one members, and December 31, 1916, were reported thirty-one members. December 31, 1917, the annual report showed the number to be only six, with W. W. Sallins as commander and J. B. Farrell as adjutant.

This is the only Grand Army post in the county that ever owned a hall of their own. In fact, this hall was the only place for public gathering, and the secret orders of the village for a number of years used the G. A. R. hall. Perhaps the one factor in keeping up the membership, as shown above, was that the post had a place of their own in which to keep their paraphernalia, records, etc. Also they continued to meet twice a month.

However, in recent years we realize that our step is tottering and halt, sight and hearing have failed us, so that many cannot attend these meetings longer. With the many whom kindly hands have lain away in the soldier's last resting place, the ranks have thinned until just a remnant are left. It has been my pleasure to know many of the "boys" of this post, who in the drama of life played such a noble part in preserving and developing for their posterity this great commonwealth.

Among the names that I recall are those of J. D. Thurman, Uncle Joe Dickson, two of the Whipples, John Douglass, Graves, Henry Striers, Dunn, N. M. Morgan, R. R. Dickson, and Jim Webster. Webster, with his old fife, played in a way that made the "old boys" straighten up, and step quicker, until they were dreaming they were again engaged in that great struggle which made America a free nation and developed a spirit that to-day is thrilling the world by the heroic acts of the boys "over there" in "khaki." The greatest number of those volunteering from this county were from the Callaway community.

POST AT MERNA

Samuel Rice Post, No. 256, was organized in the village of Merna, October 22, 1887, the descriptive list showing fourteen names on the charter. From the comrades of the post we have tried to get the names of the first members, but are disappointed. However, they are sure that J. J. Joyner was the commander and A. Sommer the adjutant. December 30, 1917, the annual report to department headquarters gave J. B. Smith, commander; A. Sommer, adjutant, and only seven members. The post meets on call, at the home of some member. It is claimed for Adjutant Sommer that he is the only adjutant the post has had in thirty-one consecutive years. The "boys" are hanging together by the observance of Memorial Day, and by urging that "Old Glory" be kept floating over every schoolhouse, that by this means they may impart to the young the spirit of patriotism and freedom. Following are the names of some that have in the past contributed to the success of the post but who have dropped one by one when the call came for each: J. J. Joyner, S. H. Read, Adam Hannawald, Madison Brown, Wells, N. Jacquot, J. M. Lucas, Lewis and H. H. Myers. Although their lives have been humble, their virtues have left upon the community an impress that stamps loyalty; patriotism that has shown itself in the eagerness of the boys of this day to help to overthrow autocracy, tyranny, and oppression.

The following were the charter members, only four of whom are now living: J. J. Joyner (post commander), Andy Sommer (adjutant), Abner C. Towle (quartermaster), Charles Foote, I. A. Coleman, Nicholas Jacquot, S. H. Read, Charles Fessenden, Madison Brown, J. B. Smith, Francis Graham, Adam Hannawald, Joseph Thomas.

In closing this somewhat lengthy history of our Grand Army, I have taken pains to obtain in all cases, a true and correct account of every statement made, either from the post records, from someone in possession of same, or, failing in that, by writing to persons known to have been connected with them; from personal conversation with those who have belonged; and, last, I have applied to the department adjutant general's records, at the state capitol and to Comrade H. Bross, department adjutant. I am thus greatly indebted for much that is authentic. To the post adjutant and to the other comrades who have aided me in this, I wish to extend my thanks.

IN THE SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR

And now we record the organization of Custer county's first war unit, and the service it rendered.

Company M, First Nebraska National Guard, was organized at Broken Bow, on June 2, 1896, and was called the Holcomb Guards, in honor of the contemporary governor of Nebraska, Hon. Silas A. Holcomb, who was elected from Broken Bow. The company's first officers were: Captain, John G. Painter; first lieutenant, V. Claris Talbot; second lieutenant, S. M. Doris. When the call was made for volunteers on the 25th day of April, 1898, by President McKinley, for the Spanish-

American war, the company was immediately mobilized with the regiment, at Lincoln, Nebraska, and nearly every member volunteered. The company of eighty-two enlisted men and three officers was mustered into the United States service on May 10, 1898, with John G. Painter, V. Claris Talbot, and Charles T. Orr as officers in the order named. On Monday, May 16th, the company, with the regiment, started for California, preparatory to embarkation for Manila, Philippine Islands. The command arrived at San Francisco May 20th, and went into camp on an old race-track, afterward named Camp Merritt, near the Golden Gate Park. At two o'clock on June 14th, the company, with the regiment, the First Nebraska Infantry, went aboard the steamship "Senator," in charge of Lieutenant V. C. Talbot; on account of sickness Captain Painter had previously resigned.

At one o'clock on June 15th the "Senator" steamed out of the harbor, bound for Manila, Philippine Islands, with the Custer county company aboard — every member in fine fettle and all bent upon rendering the country a military service in western style. After approximately a thirty-day voyage, they landed in Manila Bay on July 17, 1898. The next day the work of disembarking commenced, and in connection with the regiment the company established themselves at Camp Dewey, a few miles out of the city of Manila. From this time forth the movements of the company in connection with the regiment are of record in other volumes that have been written and in military reports on file in the war department at Washington, D. C.

While Custer county is proud of her soldiers and the record they made, their activities in the Manila campaign are not germane to the historical task in hand, other than to record their principal achievements. They participated in the capture of Manila and later helped to put down the Filipino insurrection or revolt. They participated in the battles of Calocan, Calumpit, San Fernando, Quingua, Malolos, Santa Mesa, and Novaliches, and many others.

After a campaign consisting of eleven months and two weeks, the company shipped for the home land on the transport, "Hancock," and landed in San Francisco, August 1, 1899. It immediately went into encampment at the Presidio, San Francisco's famous military reserve. The company was mustered out of service, at the Presidio, August 23rd of the same year. After being mustered out of general service the company did not disband but, under the charge of Lieutenant Horace F. Kennedy, was brought to Custer county. When the boys reached Broken Bow, a magnificent reception was tendered them by Broken Bow and Custer county in general. The program consisted of addresses by prominent citizens, band music, all kinds of gala-day stunts, and the genuine Custer county "feed." The company was held together for two or three days, during which time they were entertained in the homes of Broken Bow citizens, and later they were given another reception, by the people of Ansley.

THE MISSING

Two of the boys, Guy C. Livingston and Nat E. Simms, were not with the boys when the company returned. They were killed in battle at Santa Mesa and Novaliches road, respectively. The following were severely wounded: Lieutenant Horace F. Kennedy, Corporal Arden R. Chapman, Corporal Hugh Kenoyer, Corporal Mero C. Shippard, Perle L. Busic, Orson O. Humphreys, Howard L. Kerr, Jack L. Beach, and George L. Sears.

Drs. C. L. Mullins and Willis E. Talbot were with the company and served in a medical capacity, both in the hospital and on the firing line. Both were given commissions as captains in the medical corps.

THE WORLD WAR

We are not at liberty to go beyond the confines of Custer county and attempt to write the history of any other portion of the globe. It is, however, germane to the conditions in Custer county to state that in August, 1914, Germany and Austria-Hungary declared war on Servia and Russia, that almost before the world knew it the German army crossed the Belgian border and, before a twenty-four hour ultimatum to France had expired, their army was headed for Paris. England came to the rescue of Belgium and a world-wide war was precipitated — very far-reaching in its consequences. Complications continually arose involving the neutrality and rights of the United States of America. One event led to another, until April, 1917, when we found ourselves in war with Germany, and on the 6th day of April of the year mentioned, congress declared that a state of war existed between the United States and the central powers of Europe, which at that time had come to embrace Germany, Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey, although literally and technically, war was not declared against Turkey or Bulgaria. They were actually drawn into the embroilment, and conditions of war prevailed, regardless of declaration.

It is here that the war touched Custer county. The raising of an army in the United States presaged the draft bill, and the draft bill levied a quota upon every county in every state of the Union. Up to date, Custer county has been called upon to furnish more than five hundred soldiers, and probably one-half the number are at this date in France.

Throughout the county the response was patriotic and indicative of a spirit of loyalty very commendable to any people. While this chapter is being written, two millions of men, composing the army of the United States of America, are in France and Belgium. Many Custer county boys are among them. Several of them have given their lives, and we regret that at this time there is no public record from which can be ascertained the full number of Custer boys who have made the supreme sacrifice and paid in blood for the redemption of the weaker nations of the world.

Recorded here are the names and the obituary notices that appeared in the local papers of the county at the time the boys of our contingent succumbed to death, either by disease in the camp or on the battle-field of a foreign land. It is known to all that Custer county has given its share of men, life, and blood, and the entire county does homage to those whose names here follow.

CLYDE G. SEIVER

The first Custer county boy to give his life for his country, so far as we are able to learn, is the one named above, concerning whom the Custer County Chief of December 27, 1917, gives the following:

This community was deeply shocked on last Sunday by a dispatch from Fort Worden, Washington, announcing the death of Clyde G. Seiver. Clyde enlisted in his country's service November 10, 1917, and chose the wireless-telegraphy branch. He was sent to Fort Logan, Colorado, and made the trip there with Roy Holcomb and Harold Predmore. Later on, the boys became separated and Clyde was sent to Fort Worden, Washington. His father, Guy Seiver, knew nothing of his serious illness until the death telegram came and the shock was therefore a severe one. Just what was the cause of his death is not definitely known, owing to the fact that mail advices now on the way had not reached Broken Bow up to to-day. But pneumonia is thought to be the cause. Later telegrams announce that the body will arrive here Saturday morning and the funeral will be held on Sunday at 2:30 P. M., at the Methodist church.

Clyde G. Seiver was born December 21, 1895, at Geneva, Nebraska, and was twenty-two years and two days old at the time of his death. He came to Custer county with his parents when he was two years old. His mother died in July, 1902. Clyde grew to manhood in this city. He graduated from the Broken Bow high school in 1913, after which he taught one year and then took a course in shorthand and typewriting, in the high school.

RAYMOND ROSS KILLED

An official report from the adjutant general's headquarters at Washington early Saturday morning announced that Private Raymond L. Ross, son of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Ross, of New Helena, had been killed in action July 21. Private Ross was nearly twenty-four years old. He was purely a Custer county product, having been born at New Helena, October 16, 1894. He was called to service October 5, 1917, and left here, with the second contingent, for Camp Funston, where he was assigned to Company D, Three Hundred and Fifty-fifth Infantry. On February 26, 1918, Private Ross was called for overseas duty, and three weeks later sailed from Camp Stewart, Newport News, Virginia, with Company F, Fourth Infantry.

Private Ross was the only boy in a family of three children, and up to the time of entering the United States service had always remained at home with his parents. Generally liked by all who knew him, the news of his death was received with genuine regret. During last Christmas he was home on furlough, and spent the time with his parents, at New Helena. This was his last visit home, and he left two months later for France. The departed soldier is survived by his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Ross, of New Helena, and two sisters, Mrs. Thelma Sargent, of Walworth, and Miss Leona Ross, who is employed by the Dierks Company in Broken Bow.

Memorial services were held Sunday afternoon of this week at Anselmo, Rev. George P. Trites, of the Broken Bow Methodist church, preaching the sermon. The services were held in the new community building, which was hardly large enough to accommodate the great crowd present. Both the auditorium and balcony were filled to capacity and many had to stand. People from all over the

Later on, the boys became separated and Clyde was sent to Fort Worden, Washington. His father, Guy Seiver, knew nothing of his serious illness until the death telegram came and the shock was therefore a severe one. Just what was the cause of his death is not definitely known, owing to the fact that mail advices now on the way had not reached Broken Bow county were there, and it is estimated that no less than one thousand did honor to the dead boy's memory. A mixed quartette from Broken Bow, comprising Mrs. A. E. Anderson, Mrs. Ralph Thompson, Karl Abbott, and Roy Thompson, with Mrs. E. P. Walter, accompanist, rendered the music for the occasion.

The stage was beautifully decorated with flowers and the national colors, the community service-flag occupying the center position. Editor R. H. Miller, of the Enterprise, made an appropriate introductory talk, in which he extolled the merits of the deceased soldier and feelingly referred to the blue star that had now turned to gold.

JOSEPH ELWOOD PALMER

The first Custer county boy to be killed in battle was Joseph Elwood Palmer, a modest, unassuming youth who possessed all the qualities of heroism and sacrifice. He was in the second quota of the Custer county draft, and with the local contingent entrained at Broken

JOSEPH ELWOOD PALMER

Bow, September 2, 1917. He was born in Custer county October 29, 1891. His parents, at that time, were residing on a homestead in the vicinity of Broken Bow. His home had always been on the homestead, with the exception of four years spent in Broken Bow, while pursuing his studies at the Broken Bow high school. He was a graduate of the class of 1912. He landed overseas in April, 1918, was wounded by shrapnel June 15th, while on a night raid, and died June 16, 1918.

But little data concerning the raid in which he met his death can be obtained. His brother was with him in the same excursion, but it seems that they became separated, and the brother did not know until later that Elwood had been hurt.

PAUL COFFMAN

Paul Coffman lies dead in France. Out on the front line with the American troops in France, Paul Coffman, a Mason City boy, a soldier of America, lost his life in the line of duty.

Paul Coffman was born on his home farm north of Mason City, September 21, 1886, youngest son of H. T. and Beatrice Coffman. He came to his death while on the front battle lines with the American forces in France, on September 8, 1918. His body was tenderly laid away in a village churchyard near where he died, by his comrades in arms, some of whom were Custer county boys.

This paper has never been called upon to chronicle a death where its announcement has caused more expressions of grief than this. When the telegram from the war department brought the sad news to the widowed mother of the death of her son, a feeling of sadness never before experienced by the people of this community swept over it; it was as if each one had met with the loss of a loved member of the family. All felt a personal bereavement. Paul Coffman was born and reared here; everybody knew and liked him. Genial and agreeable among his associates, honorable in his dealings, upright in conduct, a clean lovable young man has gone from us, never to return.

Paul Coffman did not have to go to war. Avenues for refusing to accept service in the army, honorable and legitimate, were open to him. He donned the uniform of the soldier and sought to perform, willingly, gladly, that exalted duty he felt he owed to his country. There was no hesitancy, no holding back on his part; when his country called he was ready. He went with a smile on his face, and there is not the least doubt in the mind of any one who knew this splendid young man but that he performed his duties as a soldier with that same spirit of willingness which characterized his actions in home affairs.

Entombed on a foreign soil, in a far-distant land, it is probable that the eyes of a relative or a friend, other than his comrades in arms, will never see his burial place, but so long as France lives and the deeds of valor of the American soldiers who fought for liberty and freedom on that foreign shore are sung, against the hordes of hell, Paul Coffman's memory will never perish. He made the supreme sacrifice; no man could do more.

To attempt to beguile the widowed mother of this brave soldier son from the poignant grief of such an overwhelming loss, would indeed be vain and futile, did she not have the sweet consolation that may be found in the gratitude of the people of that country he died to save and the plaudits of honor which our grateful people shower on real heroes. She, too, has made a great sacrifice. The widow of an honored soldier of the Civil war for freedom, and the mother of a slain soldier in the great war for freedom and liberty to the crushed people across the seas, the hearts of our people go out to her in the anguish of her bereavement.

LEWIS H. ROBERTSON

Lewis H. Robertson was born at Davey, Lancaster county, Nebraska, January 24, 1888. When he reached the tender age of three years, in the fall of 1891, he came with the family to the Black Hills Basin, Custer county, Nebraska, where he resided until seven years ago, after which he spent part of his time at Hazard, in partnership with his brother, Matt. His father died three years after the family arrived on the Basin, August 5, 1894.

Corporal Robertson's premature departure is mourned by his mother, Mrs. Anna C. Sorensen, and by five brothers and two sisters — Charles E., William C., Fred G., Matt P., Hans A., Mrs. Lydia Stender, and Mrs. Mary C. Arp. He will also be missed by a host of friends and many army comrades.

The following comrades from Hazard who entered the army the same time as Corporal Robertson are: Ray Hennis, Lawrence Larson, Henry Rasmussen, William Rasmussen, Ernest Jacobsen, Chris H. Pierson, Earl Eckley, Joe Horak, Walter Cadwalden, Henry Pillen.

Corporal Robertson entered the army, as an alternate from Hazard, October 5, 1917. He served at Camp Funston in Company K, Three Hundred and Fifty-fifth Infantry, where he distinguished himself as a promising soldier and was transferred to the United States regular army, Company G, Fourth Infantry, at Camp Stewart, Newport News, Virginia. Five weeks later he sailed for France, and he arrived there April 15, 1918. He was well thought of by his officers at Camp Funston — Captain Moore, First Sergeant Melville, McClullen, Schooks, Orchard. He was also prized by his officers in France — Colonel Harvey, Second Lieutenant R. C. Erwin, Sergeant Case, First Lieutenant J. A. Crawford.

The Fourth Infantry, United States Regulars, was in the thick of the recent drive of the allies in which they were crowned with high honors. It was in this conflict that Corporal Lewis H. Robertson died in action, July 26, 1918, at the hopeful age of thirty years, one month and twenty days. More detailed accounts are lacking at this time. All we know is that he slumbers amidst vast armies of fallen heroes on the sacred soil of France. [A portrait of and memorial tribute to Corporal Robertson appear in the biographical department of this volume.]

GUSTAV ROERICK

It is with deep sorrow that we mourn the death of Private Gustav Roerick in this golden-star service. He was born at Amherst, Nebraska, March 9, 1892. When a child he moved with his mother to the present home, on section 26, township 13, range 17, Custer county. His father died years ago; his mother, Mrs. Anna Roerick, remarried and is now known as Mrs. Hartman. His brother Alfred enlisted last March at Broken Bow and entered the Coast artillery, at Camp Nickols, Virginia. When last heard from he was at Camp Upton, New York. A young brother, Arnold, works the farm. He also leaves two sisters to mourn his death, Ida and Anna.

Private Roerick was drafted last September and entered Camp Funston. From there he was transferred to Camp Dick and finally he crossed the ocean to participate in the struggle on French soil, where he was killed during an attack by the enemy June 17, 1918. His company had been subjected to a severe artillery bombardment. Nevertheless he heroically remained at his post, aiding in the protection of the United States machine guns. As a soldier he was respected and genuinely liked by his comrades and highly thought of by his officers. His loss to them is a source of deep sorrow. His natural witticisms made him many friends, both in private and army life. At home he proved himself an obedient and thoughtful son and brother. Those who were akin to him were always uppermost in his life's plans, even to the very end. He gladly sacrificed himself on the sacred altar of his country, at the hopeful age of twenty-six years, three months, and eight days. His remains rest somewhere across the sea, on the blood-drenched soil of our sister republic, France. God comfort and bless the dear ones who willingly gave him to his country. It has become our sorrowful duty to place on our service flag a golden star, the first one in our section of Custer county, to commemorate our fallen hero. A star is a universal symbol of glory. For countless centuries it has stood for the highest achievements and ideals. To the minds of America to-day, that star is the most sacred which represent a soldier boy in khaki on some service flag. That fair, five-pointed emblem proclaims to all who behold it that its living representative fights for the world's freedom. And if that star of blue has changed to one of gold, the observer realizes that he treads on sacred ground which death has visited. It means a life that served faithfully under the true blue, has culminated in the golden act of sacrificing its all. For one to offer his life for the cause of liberty under the Stars and Stripes is a golden deed worthy of commemoration. Thus we change Private Roerick's star of blue into one of gold.

CLARIS A. TUCKER

Private Claris A. Tucker, of the Merna neighborhood, died at Camp Dodge, Iowa, Wednesday, the 9th, of Spanish influenza. Private Tucker has been in the service since July 22, 1918, and was in one of the contingents that left Arnold about that time. He was born in Broken Bow, July 9, 1895, and was raised in this county. He attended school here and later was a student at College View. He was also a member of the Highland Lodge. The body was shipped to Broken Bow Saturday night of that week and taken in charge by W. S. Schneringer. Funeral services were held at the grave Sunday afternoon at four o'clock and conducted by Rev. W. L. Gaston, of the Baptist church. Interment was made in the Broken Bow cemetery. The deceased soldier was a most exemplary young man and had many friends in the county who will mourn his early demise. He is survived by his parents, Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Tucker, one sister, Jennie Louise Tucker, and a brother, Perly Ayers Tucker, all of whom were at the funeral.

ORRIE AMSBERRY

Mr. and Mrs. M. L. Amsberry, of Ansley, received an official communication Thursday, October 10, stating that their son, Sergeant Orrie Amsberry, had died in a hospital in France, September 22, 1918, the cause of death being pneumonia. From previous information received, it was known that Sergeant Amsberry had been gassed some time during the fore part of August and has been confined to the hospital since then. He was in one of the earlier contingents that left here for Camp Funston in September, 1917, and was sent overseas the following June. He was a member of Company D, Three Hundred and Fifty-fifth Infantry, Eighty-ninth Division. Private Amsberry was born in Mason City, in February, 1893, and made that place his home up to the time of joining the colors. He is survived by his parents, three sisters and two brothers. Deceased was one of the popular young men in the community and his death is keenly felt by all who knew him. He was a cousin of Paul Coffman, who was recently killed in France, by the accidental explosion of a shell. Memorial services for the deceased soldier will be held in the near future.

HENRY E. CAIN

Mr. and Mrs. Pierce Cain, of Anselmo, have received an official notification that their son, Private Henry E. Cain, was killed in action September 15. Private Cain was called to the service during last April and left Broken Bow with the contingent that entrained for Camp Funston on the 27th day of that month. His stay at Camp Funston was of short duration and two months from the day he left Custer county he was on French soil. Several letters have been received from him by his family, and the last letter was written one month before he met death on the battlefield. Private Henry E. Cain was born at Litchfield, Nebraska, May 7, 1893. He is survived by his parents, one sister and one brother.

SAM MILLER

Death came to Private Sam Miller at Camp Grant, Rockford, Illinois, from Spanish influenza, on October 5. He was a resident of Grant township in the southern part of the county and was a son of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Miller. The remains were returned to his home for burial and the funeral took place on October 9th, at Platte Grove cemetery, in Dawson county.

ARTHUR BERGMAN

Arthur Bergman, of Arnold, died at the naval training station of marines at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Sunday of last week. The deceased marine was the son of Mr. and Mrs. Sam Bergman, and he enlisted last spring, along with his younger brother, Ralph. He contracted influenza a short time ago and grew steadily worse. His father was notified and hastened to his bedside, but arrived after he had passed away. Deceased was well known among the young people of Broken Bow, he at one time having been a high-school student here. Funeral services and burial were at Arnold, the body being shipped there the latter part of the week.

GLEN BUCKNER

The first of Oconto's boys to give his life in the service of his country is Glen Buckner, who died of influenza, Friday of last week, at Camp Dodge, Iowa. His mother and brother, William, were with him when he died. Deceased was a volunteer and left for Camp Dodge with last summer's contingent. The body was brought back to Oconto for burial and funeral services were held there Tuesday morning of this week, at ten o'clock. Rev. Mr. Dixon, of Callaway, who is in the service and at present located at Camp Dodge, accompanied the remains back home and preached the funeral sermon.

LOYD CLOW

Private Loyd Clow, of Company A, Division B, One Hundred and Sixty-third D. B., is another Custer county boy, who gave up his life in the service of his country. He was a son of Mrs. Belle Clow, of Halsey, and a nephew of Mr. and Mrs. Press Booknau, of this city. He entered the service last June, from Halsey, and was sent to Camp Dodge, at which place he died from Spanish influenza, on October 16, 1918. Burial took place at Westerville, in this county, on last Sunday, services being held at the grave only, conducted by the Methodist minister of Berwyn. The deceased was a former resident of Westerville and moved to Halsey with his parents a number of years ago.

GAGE SAUTER

Word was officially received by relatives at Arnold November 15th, that Private Gage Sauter had died in France, at Base Hospital No. 30, on October 24th, death resulting from a severe attack of pneumonia. He was the first Arnold soldier to make the supreme sacrifice on foreign soil. The deceased was a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and also a beneficiary member of the Modern Woodmen of America, holding his membership in both orders at Arnold. Private Sauter was a member of the contingent that left Broken Bow March 4, 1918, for Fort Riley, Kansas. He arrived overseas June 24, 1918, and died exactly four months later, aged twenty-six years and two days. His last letter sent home was received less than a week before the message came announcing his death and in it he stated that there was no cause for worry, as everything was all right and he never felt better in his life. His death is keenly felt in his home community, as he was of a bright disposition and made friends wherever he went. His mother, Mrs. Lydia Sauter, a brother, W. E. Sauter, and sister, Mrs. S. McCants, who survive him, all reside at Arnold.

ROSCOE RHODES

An official report from the government states that Sergeant Roscoe Rhodes, son of former County Judge J. R. Rhodes, of Ansley, was killed in action October 25. A letter to Judge Rhodes from one of his son's companions at the front says that Roscoe was killed instantly by bursting shrapnel, a piece of the shell piercing his heart. Sergeant Rhodes was called from Custer county April 28th of this year and went from here to Camp Funston. Twenty-two days later he was transferred to Camp Mills, Long Island, and on the 16th day of June he landed in England. He reached the firing line in France exactly a month later. In one of the letters he wrote to his father, Sergeant Rhodes said he had been on the front line for fifty days without having his clothes off. The deceased soldier entered the army as a private, was promoted to corporal and was later made a sergeant. Roscoe Rhodes had a state-wide reputation as a football star. He was a student at the State University and captain-elect of the 1918 Nebraska Cornhuskers. This would have been his senior year. Rhodes entered the university in 1915, playing football on the Cornhusker freshman team. He was guard and end on the varsity team of 1916 and played right end on the 1917 team, which won the Missouri Valley conference championship. Elected to the 1918 captaincy by his teammates, Rhodes was called by the draft last April. In his letters home the sergeant predicted the early termination of the war and mentioned his plans to return home during the winter and of his intention to turn out for spring football practice. Sergeant Rhodes was a member of Sigma Nu fraternity and had the warm, personal friendship of practically the entire student body of the university. He was a member of the Presbyterian church in Lincoln.

JOHN M. RUDGE

J. A. Rudge, of Broken Bow, has received official notice from Washington, D.C., that his youngest son, John M. Rudge, had died of wounds received in action in France, October 26, 1918. Private Rudge was twenty-four years old and a member of the contingent that left Broken Bow for Camp Dodge during the last part of May. He was assigned to the field artillery and sent overseas the latter part of August. He wrote home regularly and the last letter received by his father was dated October 16. Private Rudge was born at Palmyra, October 11, 1894, and came to Custer county with his father in 1902. Two of his brothers, Joseph and James, are now in France with the American army. The dead soldier is survived by his parents, two brothers, and four sisters.

JEFF ANDREWS

Mrs. Al Owen, of Broken Bow, received a telegram November 22d, officially announcing the death of her brother, Jeff Andrews, who was killed in action in France, October 12, 1918. Private Andrews was a former Custer county boy and resided south of Broken Bow until five years ago, when he went to South Dakota to make his home. He enlisted at Lelette, South Dakota, in February, 1918, and was sent to France early in August. His sister had had no word from him until she received the official notice of his death.

CLYDE O. THOMAS

Official notice was received by Charles W. Thomas, of near Ansley, that his son, Private Clyde O. Thomas, had been killed in action October 23, 1918. Private Thomas was with the first contingent of the draft that left here for Camp Funston, September 22, 1917, and he has been at the front in France since last April. He had just passed his twentieth year at the time of his death. A father, two sisters, and four brothers survive.

CHESTER WEBB

Private Chester Webb, son of William Webb, of the East Table, died in France of pneumonia, October 22. He went with one of the contingents from this county to Camp Funston last March and during the following June was sent to France. He was twenty-six years of age. Private Webb was a young man of sterling worth and well thought of in his community. A short time previous to his departure for camp he met with a serious accident in one of the elevators at Merna, and he had barely recovered when called into service.

JAMES N. BURDICK

Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Burdick, of Westerville, have received official notification that their oldest son, Private James N. Burdick, had died at a hospital in France, of lobar pneumonia, October 1, 1918. Private Burdick was twenty-five years old and was born in Custer county. He was with the contingent that left Broken Bow for Camp Funston, September 22, 1917, and he sailed overseas May 18, 1918. He went into action at the crossing of the Marne and was recommended at that battle for citations for coolness under fire. He is survived by his wife and parents, one brother, Arthur Burdick, of Westerville, and two sisters, Mrs. C. C. Milks, of Fairview, Pennsylvania, and Mrs. M. G. Crist, of Kimball, Montana.

ROY IMBODEN

Private Roy Imboden, a former Custer county boy and son of Mr. and Mrs. Cass Imboden, of Gandy, died at Fort Omaha, December 2, 1918, of influenza. The body was taken to Arnold for burial. The funeral was a military one and was under the auspices of the Arnold Home Guards. The deceased soldier left for Camp Dodge last July and was transferred to Fort Crook, thence to Fort Omaha, where he became a member of the Sixty-first balloon company. Mr. and Mrs. Imboden were with their son when he passed away, but were later taken ill themselves with influenza and were unable to attend the funeral. The deceased is survived by his father and mother, four sisters, and two brothers.

HOMER M. YATES

Private Homer M. Yates, of Whitman, was killed in France during the latter days of fighting. Private Yates was a former resident of Broken Bow and a son of Al Yates, who was for a long time connected with the water plant of this city. He has resided at Whitman for a number of years.

HARVEY M. SLOGGETT

The following official telegram was received Tuesday night by Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Sloggett, who live east of town:

"Washington, D.C., Dec. 17, 1918.

"Mr. Alfred Sloggett:—Deeply regret to inform you that Private Harvey M. Sloggett, infantry, previously reported missing in action since October 22, now reported killed in action, October 18.

HARRIS, Adj. Gen."

Private Harvey M. Sloggett, son of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Sloggett, was born June 6, 1893, on the old homestead north of this city. He left Broken Bow with one of the contingents that entrained for Camp Funston during September, 1917. He sailed overseas for France last April and saw considerable service in the front line trenches. The last letter from him received by his parents was dated September 28, and in it he stated he had been in action and over the top, one of the engagements lasting nine days and nights. Private Sloggett was well liked by everyone with whom he came in contact and his death will be mourned by a host of friends. The sympathy of the community goes out to the bereaved parents. The deceased soldier was a member of Company F, Fourth Infantry, Eighty-ninth Division.

RALPH C. LEUI

Lieutenant Ralph C. Leui, son of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Leui, of Comstock, was reported in last week's casualty list as killed in action. The young man's parents, up to the latter part of the week, had received no official notice of their son's death, and it is thought that the notice must have gone to Comstock, South Dakota, as the young man enlisted into the service from that state. Lieutenant Leui enlisted as a first-class private in machine battalion No. 341, and was trained at Camp Funston. He was made corporal before his battalion went to France last May. Further promotions followed until he was finally made a commissioned officer. A letter received from him by his parents dated October 26, stated that he was doing well. This was his last letter.

VANNER A. GUSTUS

Official notice has been received that Private Vanner A. Gustus, of Callaway, is dead in France, after suffering an attack of pneumonia. Private Gustus was an enlisted man and went through the training camp at Ashland, later being transferred to Camp Cody. When he arrived in France he was assigned to Company L of the Fifty-ninth Infantry, Fourth Division. He was in many of the battles that mark the campaigns of last summer and was in continuous active service until a short time before his death. He developed pneumonia and was taken to a base hospital. His death occurred October 5, 1918.

JOSEPH BERNERT

Another of the fine young patriots of Custer county to fall to an heroic death on the battlefields of France was Joseph Bernert, whose death occurred October 6, 1918. He enlisted October 5, 1917, at the age of twenty-six years, and his name and memory shall be held in enduring honor in his home state and nation. He was a son of Felix Bernert, a representative citizen who is individually mentioned in the biographical department of this publication.

As this review of Custer county necrology in the great war has been prepared prior to the close of military service on the part of many of the Custer county boys, it is evident that the list here given is not to be considered complete. The record must needs be supplemented by data to be given in later publications.

CUSTER'S MILITARY RECORD

It has been impossible to secure a list of all who have gone in the service of the country from Custer county. The boys of the county have been exceedingly prompt to respond to the call to the colors, and there has been no way by which the volunteers can be named. We have been able to procure a partial list of the names, but it is known to be incomplete and does not contain the names of all those who have gone. Accordingly the appended list gives the names of only those of whom we have some record, and it is to be regretted that we cannot give the list in full. It must also be borne in mind that this list closed before the last contingents left. In some instances the going of the men has been anticipated and their names recorded:

WORLD WAR ACTIVITIES

Immediately upon the entrance of America into the world war, Custer county organized for practical co-operation, with a determination to meet every demand and to lend the government every possible assistance. The governor appointed Marshal Eddy, of Broken Bow, chairman of the Custer county council of defense, and he proceeded to the organization of a strong body or council, which has been active and aggressive in the prosecution of all war work. Emerson Purcell, editor of Custer County Chief, has been secretary of the council, and aside from helping other war organizations and leading off in patriotic demonstrations, war meetings, etc., the council has looked after the loyalty, or rather the disloyalty, of all parties who were reported as being in any way lax in regard to the support they were rendering the government.

THE EXEMPTION BOARD

The governor of Nebraska appointed Sheriff Joseph F. Wilson, County Clerk Robert G. Waters, and Dr. C. L. Mullins as members of a local exemption board, and they have been charged with the operation of all the draft machinery. Through them the questionnaires were sent out and all registrations conducted. They attended also to the physical examination and made out the first classifications of all registrants. It was a mammoth job, but they have been diligent and tireless. Many citizens volunteered their service and rendered valuable help under the direction of the board. The members of the board should be given much credit for the manner in which they handled the affairs entrusted to them and also for the way they provided every possible comfort for the boys while mobilizing.

BOND DRIVES

Four different bond drives to the present time have been organized and successfully prosecuted in the county. The work of raising the quota of bonds supposed to be sold in Custer county has been largely conducted by the banks, the different bankers organizing for the work and seeing to it that the amount allotted is subscribed. There is no way by which the amount subscribed can be ascertained, and all that can be recorded is that every quota has been met, and that the responsive spirit of the people reduced the work to the minimum.

THE WAR SAVINGS STAMP DRIVE

A governmental arrangement was perfected by which the government sold stamps of twenty-five-cent denominations and in a series by which sixteen stamps and an additional payment of a few cents purchased a five-dollar, interest-bearing government bond. These bonds could be later exchanged for hundred-dollar bonds, and it was arranged that no one could invest in a stamp beyond the sum of one thousand dollars.

Custer county was asked to subscribe for over six hundred thousand dollars' worth of stamp bonds. H. Lomax, president of the Custer State Bank, was appointed county chairman, and organized for the task of raising the money. There was a state arrangement by which the 22d day of March, 1918, was designated as the day for raising the stamp quota. In no county in the state did it work out more perfectly in all the details of the plan than in Custer county. In every school district in the county the director assembled the freeholders, stated the object of the meeting, explained the operation of investment and announced the quota for that respective district. During the afternoon, over $800,000 was subscribed, and Nebraska became the first state in the Union to raise its quota for this drive.

THE YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION

Early in the beginning of the war Custer county was asked for $125 for Y. M. C. A. war work. The amount was so insignificant, and the war work of the Y. M. C. A. then so little known, that little attention was paid to the demand. A few benevolent spirits made small contributions, and altogether $119 was contributed. Six months later, conditions had changed. The Y. M. C. A. again asked Custer county for a contribution, and this time placed the quota at $3,000. Alpha Morgan was made county chairman of an organization charged with raising the amount. It was assigned in different quotas to various localities of the county, and in one afternoon a little over $6,000 was contributed.

PUBLIC MEETINGS AND CELEBRATIONS

All kinds of public meetings to arouse patriotism and unusual observance of all national holidays have been the order throughout the county. The people of every community have assembled in their halls, churches, or school-houses, and the interest manifested by the people in every phase of the war has been very remarkable. In later paragraphs is a description of a celebration of General Pershing's birthday, observed Friday, the 13th day of September, 1918. The day was observed in like and appropriate manner in every town in the county.

THE FOUR MINUTE MEN

Custer was second to no county in the state in the service rendered by her four-minute men. It was the duty of these four-minute men to appear, when appointed, in any public assembly, and make bright, breezy, four-minute talks on some phase of the war situation. This amounted to an education propaganda. N. T. Gadd was appointed chairman of the four-minute men and he organized his speakers and covered the entire county with an army of four-minute men who continually kept current conditions before the people and rendered a great service. Mr. Gadd also had charge of the general speakers' bureau, and through his office speakers were sent to any place, day or night, when demands were made. He himself was in great demand and did an unusual amount of work in this direction.

WAR SAVINGS SOCIETIES

In connection with the stamp drive and in order to continue it throughout the duration of the war, and also for the purpose of forming habits of thrift and economy among the American people, war-savings societies were organized throughout the county, under the direction of N. T. Gadd. To this work Mr. Gadd gave unremitting energy and carried on the organization until at the present time he has over three hundred organizations of war-savings societies in the county. They are in every town and village and almost without exception in every school district in the county.

THE AMERICAN RED CROSS

During the last forty years, the Red Cross organization, known the world over as an organization that has standardized mercy and reduced to science and system the alleviation of suffering by ministering to the sick, caring for the wounded, feeding the hungry, and other like work, received during the present war time an almost incredible impetus. Its organization and operations have been extended throughout the world and it has given true angels of mercy in camps, in hospitals, and on battlefields of the present day.

In common with other counties and communities in the United States, Custer county enlisted in the great work of the Red Cross, just before the declaration of a state of war between the United States and Germany was made. Nobody knew very much about it, and the initiative was taken by the women, as is usual when there are no definite landmarks immediately available to guide a forward movement. As the women were first to undertake the impossible task of embalming the body of the crucified Nazarene, without counting the cost or knowing how or by whom the great stone of difficulty would be moved, so in this great undertaking they were ready and willing to begin a task of the details and magnitude of which they had only small conception. They only knew that the young men of the nation, of the state, of Custer county, of our homes, were about to be put into jeopardy of body and soul and would be in desperate need of the ministrations of womankind. So they took counsel only of their courage and the necessities that had arisen, and launched the beginnings of what is now the Custer County Chapter of the American Red Cross.

On March 22, 1917, a meeting was called at the office of Mr. Alpha Morgan. The following ladies are recorded as present: Mesdames L. D. George, M. S. Eddy, C. H. England, Alpha Morgan, and H. B. Landis. Mrs. Landis was chosen secretary of the meeting. It was agreed that steps should be taken to form in Broken Bow an auxiliary of the American Red Cross, and another meeting was planned for April 7th, to be held at the city hall. A general invitation was extended to the women of Broken Bow and vicinity and they were asked to bring certain materials to be made up for the Red Cross. Mrs. Landis, Mrs. Derr, Mrs. Mevis, and Mrs. Ford were made an executive committee to push the work ad interim.

The meeting of April 7th brought the following ladies together: Mesdames Apple, Mevis, Henry, H. Lomax, G. O. Joyner, Robinson, Clute, Skillman, Adaline Johnson, Joe Wilson, Stapleton, A. Morgan, Thostesen, Stockham, Floyd, and Hickenbottom. Membership lists were opened and the payment of dues made, thus making a definite membership. Weekly meetings were held for such work as was at hand. On May 14th a motion was carried to call a meeting at the court house for the purpose of organizing a chapter with the county as the unit. Committees on publicity, program, and advertising were named. This meeting was held May 22, 1917, and Judge N. Dwight Ford was chosen chairman.

Mrs. Alpha Morgan outlined the plan of work for an organized chapter, and the organization was immediately effected, with the following officers: President, Mr. Jules Hautmont; vice-president, Mrs. Alpha Morgan; secretary, Mrs. H. B. Landis; treasurer, Rev.

George P. Trites. Forty-nine memberships and sixty dollars were received.

At a meeting on May 23d, the officers named the following executive committee: J. M. Kimberling, P. A. Black, W. W. Waters, Mrs. O. H. Mevis, Judge N. Dwight Ford, Dr. C. L. Mullins, Mrs. Derr, Mrs. A. Morgan, Mrs. H. B. Landis, Jules Haumont, Rev. George P. Trites, and M. S. Eddy.

At a later meeting a publicity committee was named, consisting of Judge N. Dwight Ford, Rev. George P. Trites, and Dr. C. L. Mullins, to bring before the people of the county the matter of organizing branches of the chapter. A committee of five—M. S. Eddy (chairman), Mrs. C. H. England, Mrs. H. Lomax, Mrs. L. D. George, Rev. James Hermes—were named to have charge of the membership campaign. To accelerate the movement of extending the work out into the county, a committee on extension was named, as follows: Alpha Morgan, assigned to Sargent and Comstock; H. Lomax, to Oconto; Dr. C. L. Mullins, to Arnold; M. S. Eddy, to Merna; Mac Warrington, to Mason City; Judge N. D. Ford, to Ansley; Mrs. Alpha Morgan, to Anselmo; Rev. George P. Trites, to Berwyn; Jules Haumont, to Westerville. The effect of the committee's vigorous work was immediate—branches sprang up in every part of the county and the membership increased rapidly. The treasurer's receipts from June 23 to June 30 were $780.90. January 1, 1918, the total reached $3,685.75. On October 1st the total receipts from all funds passing through the treasurer's hands amounted to $19,652.75. This does not include the money sent directly to Washington as the major part of the two Red Cross war-fund drives in the county, nor does it include the moneys raised by the several branches for the purchase of materials, with the exception of fifty per cent. of the membership dues in those auxiliaries. The second war-fund drive alone totaled $34,968.07, of which amount $28,655.09 was deposited for the credit of the treasurer of the national society, W. G. McAdoo.

Communities entered into the spirit of the work with marvelous zeal. There was an abandon of giving such had never been seen in this county for any purpose. Donated articles were offered in auction sales in every town and community. Fabulous prices were paid for articles and the buyer would at once donate them again, and separate items often sold again and again. In this way thousands of dollars were put into the hands of the workers to buy goods to be made up for hospitals, soldiers, and refugees. The women met every week to sew and knit, and in many localities three afternoons were willingly given for the service. Competent women were put over the work, generally divided under separate heads, such as surgical dressings, knitted goods, and sewing. Under the parent branch in Broken Bow the knitting work was under the oversight of Mrs. F. W. Henry, and upon her departure Mrs. C. L. Gutterson was appointed. Mrs. Gutterson has been chairman for the county work with the duty of distributing the yarn and censoring the work. Mrs. H. Lomax was given immediate oversight of the Broken Bow workers aside from knitting, with the competent aid of Mrs. C. H. England and Mrs. H. D. Huntington as cutters. Mrs. Joseph Molyneux was made chairman of the county work and censor of sewing. In each of the branches, was made such division of labor as would best further the work and produce the best results. For faithful and sacrificing labors, the names of scores of women would rightly find a place in this list of workers. The following list of materials made and shipped will give something of an idea of the scope of the work accomplished. The figures given cover only the year beginning October 1, 1917, and ending October 1, 1918.

Total number of different articles shipped, 35,305. Some of the principal items are: 7,468 surgical dressings, 1,799 suits of pajamas, 4,225 pillow cases, 906 bed sheets, 5,995 hand towels, 575 bath towels, 1,215 bed shirts, 1,321 sweaters, 2,258 pairs socks.

Shipments of used and new clothing have been gathered by the Red Cross in the county for relief of the suffering Belgian and French people remaining behind the German lines. More than a ton gross weight of this material has been shipped.

In the spring of 1918 the territory around Callaway, in part, was made into a separate chapter, known as Callaway Chapter, with H. H. Andrews chairman. The reports here given do not include that done therein after that chapter was constituted.

Changes in the official corps of the society were made necessary in the late winter of 1918, and W. A. Baldwin was chosen chairman, Mrs. Charles Luce, secretary, and W. L. Gaston, vice-chairman. Mrs. Luce opened an office and sacrificingly gave her time to the increasing duties of the office until June 1st, when the management of the office was placed in the care of the chairman, and John P. Robertson was chosen secretary. A well located office is donated by the Broken Bow Abstract Company, Messrs. Hansen and Luce. Furniture was borrowed, including a fine desk, from F. M. Currie, and the Custer County Red Cross is doing a splendid and creditable work in the great war for humanity. All the varied interests of the organization within the limits of the Custer County Chapter center in the office.

The executive committee at this writing is as here noted: Chairman, W. A. Baldwin; vice-chairman, W. L. Gaston; secretary, John P. Robertson; treasurer, George P. Trites; and M. S. Eddy, P. A. Black, and Dr. C. L. Mullins.

WOMAN'S COUNCIL OF DEFENSE

In war as well as peace, the activity and patriotism of the women have always equalled, if not excelled, those of the men. If the men have had their organizations and prosecuted any special division of work, the women have had their corresponding organizations and have made a like prosecution, only perhaps displaying a little more energy. This is true in the matter of the Woman's Council of Defense.

The woman's committee was organized, at the request of the government, to co-ordinate the activities and the resources of the organized and unorganized women of the country, that their power might be immediately utilized in time of need, and to supply a new and direct channel of communication and co-operation between men and women and governmental departments.

The Custer county branch has not been idle, but has successfully managed the registration of women, the baby registration, three Liberty-bond drives. The branch has raised most of its quota for the state work; has assisted and entertained speakers who came to the county for educational purposes; has helped with the Red Cross work and drives; has furthered Americanization; has sold flag pictures; has, with the assistance of the county superintendent, distributed liberty and patriotic programs to the rural schools; has sent in to Camp Dodge and Camp Funston about thirty-five gallons of wild-grape juice for the convalescent soldiers; has kept "open house" and distributed a vast amount of literature at the county fair; has staged a patriotic pageant in the park during fair week, for two nights; has held community singing in the park for six weeks, until it was turned over to the Four-minute men. The members took up with proper authorities the matter of sending home the body of one of the deceased soldier boys without proper embalming, and had the ones in charge reprimanded. They took charge of a tubercular soldier, saw that he was outfitted properly, and sent to a sanitarium for treatment; took up with the health officers, school board, and physicians, the matter of compulsory medical inspection in our schools, and had it carried through; and are now on a campaign for nurses and for the civilian and army schools — and all done gratuitously, of course. The only money paid out was for necessary postage, for this committee are not allowed any "franking" privileges, such as are accorded the men for their work.

The woman's committee of the Council of Defense for Custer county is composed of the following named members: Chairman, Mrs. Alpha Morgan; vice-chairman, Mrs. C. H. England; secretary, Miss Dorothy Maulick; treasurer, Mrs. Hazel Sidwell; Red Cross and allied relief, Mrs. C. H. England; food conservation, Mrs. Addie Hall; child welfare, Mrs.

Clyde Wilson; Liberty loan, Miss Keo Currie and Mrs. J. G. Leonard; maintenance of existing social agencies, Miss Eva Cadwell; educational propaganda, Miss Nellie Taylor; health and recreation, Miss Dorothy Maulick; Americanization, Mrs. John Reese; publicity, Mrs. J. H. Melville; registration, Mrs. Hazel Sidwell. District chairmen: Mrs. J. H. Kerr, Ansley; Mrs. Rose Dailey, Anselmo; Mrs. Lizzie Morris, Sargent; Mrs. F. M. McGrew, Callaway; Mrs. J. T. Woods, Mason City; Miss Essie Haskell, Arnold.

GENERAL PERSHING'S BIRTHDAY CELEBRATION

On Friday, the 13th of October, 1918, Broken Bow and all surrounding vicinity celebrated General Pershing's birthday. It was no mean occasion, and the celebration was on a par with any other celebration ever before "pulled off" in the town. Nothing elaborate had been planned—everything was to be on a simple scale—yet everything was exceedingly appropriate and fitting. The parade of the school children and citizens was one of the finest street demonstrations ever seen in the city. The enthusiasm of war time, the local patriotism of the people, the allegiance to the leaders of the armies and nation—all gave to the occasion a spontaneity and spirit rarely ever seen before. At two o'clock P. M. the pupils of the North Side grade school and the high school marched from their respective buildings, under the direction of their teachers, to the court-house lawn, where it was arranged that the parade should form. The scholars carried flags and marched in double columns. The boy scouts had a prominent place in the North Side parade. One of the features to attract much attention was the High School Cadets, who made a fine exhibition of the training they had received from Superintendent Hewitt. Professor Hewitt had the cadets in charge and they marched with the erectness and precision of a squad that had had long military training. The North Side pupils lined up on the north side of the square and awaited the coming of the South Side children, who, with their flags and banners, marched in double column and lined up on the south side of the square. The band assembled in front of the court house and played one or two patriotic selections, after which was formed the parade to the park where the speaking was to take place. The high-school flag, carried by the Council of Defense, led off, followed by the Broken Bow band; then came the South Side schools, followed by the fife and drum corps; next the North Side schools, with the cadets in the rear of the school procession. After the cadets came citizens generally. The procession marched down Broadway to Eighth avenue, then north along the east side of the square to Eighth avenue, thence west along the north side of the square to the north side entrance to the park, where they entered the park and marched round and round the band stand until the procession wound itself up into a solid mass of American humanity, gay and resplendent with all the national colors.

The scene was one long to be remembered. Hundreds of flags fluttered in the breeze. The children and older pupils looked the part of young Americans, which role they are playing in the great world-drama of the present time.

At this juncture M. S. Eddy, chairman of the Council of Defense, put in an appearance on the band stand, called the people to order and asked all, old and young, to join in singing "America," which was done with a loyal good will that could not but have been pleasing to General Pershing if he could have seen and heard the enthusiasm with which the national anthem was sung, and his natal day celebrated in Broken Bow. Rev. W. A. Baldwin, pastor of the Christian church, invoked a divine blessing which appealed to the great God for protection of our brave leader and the brave boys who are serving under him. The speaker of the day, Judge Morning, of Lincoln, was introduced and he delighted the people with an eloquent and patriotic address. Judge Morning is a personal friend of General Pershing and out of a full, warm heart he spoke of his acquaintance, of the General's magnificent leadership, and paid the American hero a splendid tribute.

His tribute to the American soldier and sailor, given in rounded periods, was loudly applauded. His denunciation of Prussian tyranny was bitter and withering. Withal, the Judge is a pleasing speaker and the people of Broken Bow were glad to meet him and hear him. The entire celebration did honor to the occasion and reflected credit upon its promoters. The school procession alone was over four blocks long. The music was all that could be desired. The enthusiasm of the people passed all former bounds. It was a fitting celebration in honor of the modest leader of the American forces in France.

With that celebration, its procession radiant with flags and flag colors as a background, the news of the evening dispatches telling of the offensive made by our boys as a birthday celebration in France, in which 12,000 Germans were captured and the St. Mihiel sector squeezed off in such a way as to shorten the battle line twenty miles, made a fitting close to a "perfect day."

THE WAR ENDS

Since the foregoing paragraphs were written, great events have happened. The World War has come to an end. In the eleventh hour of the eleventh day of the eleventh month, hostilities ceased between the allied armies and the armies of the central kingdoms of Europe. Great rejoicing and magnificent demonstrations resulted. Peace bonfires blazed in every town in Custer county. And the people are exceedingly glad to be able to resume pre-war occupations.

A POST-WAR DRIVE

Before the cessation of hostilities a call for $170,000,000 had been made by the following Societies: Young Men's Christian Association, Young Women's Christian Association, Catholic War Board Council, Jewish Welfare Society, Community Camp Service, National Library Association, and Salvation Army. Custer county's proportion of this amount was $36,809. Organization to collect the same was effected and the following were elected as the executive committee: Alpha Morgan, chairman, representing the Young Men's Christian Association; Mrs. V. H. England, Young Women's Christian Association; Father James Hermese, Catholic War Board Council; W. L. Gaston, Community Camp Service; Mrs. J. H. Melville, Library Association; Simon Pizer, Jewish Welfare Board; Judge N. Dwight Ford, Salvation Army; N. T. Gadd, Victory Boys.

The county was subdivided by school districts, and allotments made to each district. The raising of the respective allotments was made the duty of the school directors. With marvelous unanimity, the directors responded, and the districts, with very few exceptions, met their quotas. The amount raised for this work in Custer county amounted to $50,597.50.

Custer county, given over to agricultural and domestic pursuits, is not expected to pose as a producer of literary men and women, yet it may be said that here can be found an intelligence and a literary genius not outranked elsewhere in the middle west.

We may not have produced prodigies but we have produced a corp of literary athletes who are vigorous in style, strong in expression, and in the realm of constructive English might be called trapeze performers on the King's English. We enroll a few, with a product of their pens in either prose or verse, but would not have anyone suppose that this short list exhausts the supply.

The newspapers of Custer county are, and have been, for the most part manned by literary men who have shaped the county's journalism into creditable literary contributions. Some of these editors have been geniuses in the field of their operation and have distinguished themselves among the writers of the state. In this class we might call the names of E. R. Purcell, George B. Mair, D. M. Amsherry, Mac Warrington, and many others. Now follows the story of Custer county journalism.

NEWSPAPERS OF CUSTER COUNTY

There has been no agency employed that is entitled to more credit for the rapid development and advancement of Custer county from its organization than its newspapers. During the first five years of the county's history there was not a newspaper published in the county. The following is a list of the various papers that have been published in the county up to the present time, as far as the writer can procure data from the records at his command. While there may be some mistakes, and possibly a few unimportant omissions, we think it is in the main correct:

WESTERVILLE

In the fall of 1880 James Westervelt established a store on Clear creek, the location being at that time called Elm Bridge. The name was given the place because of a near-by bridge which the settlers had built across the creek and which was constructed of elm logs taken from the canyons. Other business men located there that winter and the following spring, and in honor of the first resident, James Westervelt, the new town was christened Westerville. It was here that Custer county's first newspaper, the Custer County Leader, was born, on June 13, 1881, with George Trefren, publisher, and Samuel G. Beebe, editor. The Leader continued at Westerville until 1883, when Mr. Beebe moved with it to Broken Bow, where the county seat had been located the previous fall. Mr. Beebe continued to edit the Leader until 1888, when he was appointed postmaster of Broken Bow, by President Harrison. The Leader fell into the hands of the Central Nebraska Bank on October 26th of that year. It was for a short time edited by J. H. Inman, then by R. H. Miller, after which the plant was leased to Jake Horn, of Callaway, and W. O. Chapman, of Ansley. Fred Shaffer succeeded Horn and Chapman, as editor. Mr. Shaffer, after a few months' experience, discontinued the publication and moved to Denver, where he continued in the newspaper business. He invested in mining stock that in a few years made him rich. The frequent changes in management went against the Leader and the material was sold to other offices.

BROKEN BOW'S FIRST PAPER

The first newspaper published in Broken Bow was founded, by Robert H. Miller, June 29, 1882. Mr. Miller had been in the newspaper business at Wood River, Hall county, Nebraska. In transferring his plant from Wood River it was freighted across the country, nearly 100 miles, by wagon. The town of Broken Bow had been platted only a few weeks previously. For lack of lumber or railroad facilities, and the great distance from any point that lumber could be procured, the first office building for the Republican was built of sod, on the corner now occupied by the Broken Bow State Bank, northwest of the Public Square. The building was occupied by the editor and his family, as well as by the Republican office.

The Republican continued under the management and control of its founder until March 3, 1887. On that day the plant was purchased by D. M. Amsberry, who at that time was serving his third term as county superintendent of schools of Custer county. The office was continued in the sod building until July of that year, when it was moved to its new quarters in the Custer Block, which was built by Trefren, Talbot, and Amsberry. In later years the Republican, under its new management, was owned by a stock company, and its equipment was enlarged by the purchase of the type and machinery of the Broken Bow Times, a Democrat paper established by George Trefren and Sam Meseraull. The stock company was finally discontinued and the stock taken over by Mr. Amsberry, who continued as editor and publisher of the paper until 1914. It was under his management of the Republican that a campaign against the licensed saloon was inaugurated, in the spring election of 1888, and continued from year to year until the open saloon was voted out of Broken Bow. During the years of the saloon agitation, the Republican was strongly opposed to the saloon business. In 1914 the ownership of the Republican passed into the hands of a young man by the name of Norman Parks, who after a few months turned the plant back to Mr. Amsberry. A few months thereafter the plant was sold to E. C. Shea, who continued its publication until the spring of 1916, when he sold the plant to James K. Hewitt, of Alliance, who is the editor and publisher of the paper at this time. It is now the oldest newspaper in the county.

MORE PAPERS FOR WESTERVILLE

The Westerville Times was started at Westerville in 1883, by C. H. Dalrymple. The paper was of short life and after a few months the plant was moved to Nonpareil, a town in the northwestern part of the state. The third paper, and fourth in Custer county, to be published at Westerville, was the Westerville Echo, which was started in 1884, by a young Englishman named Knox. Mr. Knox soon became tired of journalism, and disposed of the Echo to James Westervelt, who put his son Eugene in charge. In 1886, on the occasion of the building of the B. & M. Railroad up the Muddy valley, the village of Ansley was platted and established by the railroad company, and the Echo was one of the institutions moved to the new town, where Eugene Westervelt had full charge of it.

NOW COMES ANSLEY

In April, 1887, the paper was sold to J. H. and W. O. Chapman, two practical young newspaper men, who came from Cambridge, Illinois. The name of the paper was changed to the Ansley Chronicle, and it was published by the Chapmans until 1895, when it passed into the hands of Tom Wright, a young Scotchman who was then but eighteen years of age. Mr. Wright continued to publish the Chronicle until 1912, when he was appointed postmaster at Ansley, by President Roosevelt. He then disposed of the paper, to A. H. Barks, who consolidated it with the Argosy, which had been founded by C. H. Hargrave.

Later on the Ansley Argosy was purchased from Barks by Harris & Maltman. In a few months Maltman retired from the business, and the publication was continued by N. A. Harris until 1914, when the plant was destroyed by fire. As Tom Wright had established the Ansley Herald about this time, no effort was made to rebuild the Argosy plant, thus leaving the town, as it had been for several years, with but one newspaper. Mr. Wright continued its publication until June, 1918, when he sold the plant to James Wallace, who is editor and publisher of the paper at this writing.

ALGERNON

Upon the advent of the B. & M. Railroad up the Muddy valley, in 1886, the Champion was started at Algernon, by a Mr. Watkins, who, after the village failed to secure a depot, removed the paper to Mason City and changed its name to the Mason City Advocate. He disposed of the plant to J. M. Amsberry, who continued it until 1895, when he suspended it for a year, subsequently, in 1896, resuming its publication at Ansley, under the name of the People's Advocate. In the fall of 1900 Mr. Amsberry disposed of the paper to W. F. Greenlee, an inexperienced young man in the newspaper business, under whose management it was suspended in March, 1901, the type and other equipment being shipped to York, where they are used in a job office by the former owner.

The third paper published in Broken Bow was the Broken Bow Times, established in 1885, by G. W. Trefren and S. I. Meseraull. Financially, the Times was for a short time a great success, as land notices were plentiful, but, owing to some misunderstanding between the proprietors of the Times and Mr. Higgins, register of the land office at Grand Island, where most of the land notices came from, the latter induced R. E. Martin, an ex-Confederate soldier and forcible writer, to establish another Democratic paper at Broken Bow. The paper was launched in March, 1886, by R. E. Martin and J. S. Dellinger, and was christened the Statesman. To it Mr. Higgins transferred his land-office patronage, and the Statesman prospered immensely. It established a branch paper at Mason City, named the Mason City Transcript.

A DAILY PAPER

The Times, not to be outdone, started a daily edition and christened it the Broken Bow Daily Times. Messrs. Martin and Dellinger disposed of the Mason City Transcript to James Whittaker, and two or three weeks later Mr. Whittaker sold it to M. C. Warrington, who continued with the paper until 1917, when he disposed of it to James Pebles, the present owner. Martin and Dellinger dissolved partnership, Martin retained the Statesman, while Dellinger and Walters established the sixth paper for Broken Bow, known as the Broken Bow World. The Daily Times and the Daily World were soon consolidated, Mr. Walters becoming editor-in-chief and the mechanical work being done in the Times office. In 1888 Trefren and Meseraull disposed of the good will of the Times to R. E. Martin, and about the same time the World suspended. R. H. Miller then started the Daily Reporter, and had the mechanical work done at the Republican office. In the course of three months the Reporter suspended and was succeeded by the Daily Republican, published by D. M. Amsberry, in connection with his weekly edition. The Daily Republican was continued until October, 1895, when the plant was leased to J. H. Chapman for one year and the daily edition was discontinued. In the fall of 1888 E. M. Webb and George S. Tappan established the Nebraska Citizen in Broken Bow. The paper continued until the following spring, when its publication was suspended. It was largely due to this paper that the Alliance or People's Independent ticket was elected in the fall of 1889.

POLITICS DIDN'T PAY

A few of the leaders of the Farmers' Alliance resurrected the Citizen and established the Alliance Motor, with A. J. Evans, of Thedford, as editor. The Motor was not a financial success and soon suspended. In April, 1890, the Motor material was gotten together by the stockholders, and the paper was re-established, C. W. Beal, president of the Farmers' Alliance, being elected president and manager. The paper was called the Custer County Beacon. In 1890 E. M. Webb became associated with Mr. Beal in the publication of this paper. The Beacon was soon recognized as the leading Populist paper of central Nebraska. In the course of three years E. L. Beal, of Ansley, was induced to leave his farm and join his brother, C. W. Beal, in promoting the Alliance doctrine. The Beal brothers eventually purchased a majority of the stock of the other members of the company, and assumed full control of the plant. Except during the year 1898, when C. W. Beal served one term in the state senate, the two brothers did all the editorial and mechanical work of the office. During C. W. Beal's absence, F. A. Amsberry, of Mason City, was employed as assistant editor. The Beal brothers continued to publish the Beacon until 1907, when Elgin I. Beal retired to the farm, with his family, and left the entire charge of the paper to his brother, Charles W.

Beal, who later leased the plant to a man from Ord, Nebraska. The publication of the Beacon was soon afterward discontinued and the material sold.

PURCELL STARTS AT MERNA

In November, 1886, Purcell Brothers established the Merna Record, which was edited by E. R. Purcell. Under his management the Record flourished. It subsequently changed ownership and was moved to Callaway, the name being changed to the Custer County Independent. In the latter part of 1891, A. Z. Lazenby started another paper in Merna, which he christened the Merna Reporter, but it had a short life. It was resurrected in 1893, by Captain Gatchell, and continued until the fall of 1894, when he moved it to Sheridan, Wyoming, continuing in the newspaper business there until his appointment as register of the land office in that state. In 1899 Rev. Mr. Clifton commenced the publication of the Merna Sun, which, in the spring of 1900, he sold to Theodore A. Miller, who abandoned the paper in January following, and returned to his home in Omaha. Most of the material was shipped back to York, whence it had been leased. This left Merna without a newspaper for several years—until the Merna Postal Card was started by Claude Hall, who continued its publication until 1916. It was then sold to W. R. Dutton, who rechristened it the Merna Messenger and who is owner and publisher at the present time.

"SUN" SHINES AT ANSELMO

Dale for a short time had a newspaper, which was started by Trefren & Meseraull in 1886, in anticipation of the railroad being built through that valley. But when they failed to realize their anticipation, the plant was moved to Anselmo and named the Anselmo Sun.

The first issue of the Sun was from a tent, and S. I. Meseraull was its editor. J. H. Zehrung, Ben Sanders, and others tried their hands at making the Sun shine, but with indifferent success, until it finally fell into the hands of J. J. Tooley, present secretary of the state banking board, who, in connection with teaching the Anselmo school, succeeded, with the assistance of his wife, in causing the Sun to cast weekly rays of light and glory over the people of the little village. Becoming tired of his double duty, the professor sold his interest in the paper to Al Hummel, of Gandy, in 1890, and it was finally sold to E. R. Purcell, who added it to the outfit of his Merna Record. For several years the people of Anselmo were without a newspaper, but for the past few years they have been able to obtain a good one, the Enterprise, which is published at the present time, by R. H. Miller.

THE CHIEF SHOWS UP AT BROKEN BOW

In April, 1892, the Custer County Chief was established by W. G. and E. R. Purcell, under the firm name of Purcell Brothers, and they published the paper in connection with the job office that had prior to that time been run by W. G. Purcell. The Chief espoused the Populist cause, which at that time was very popular in the county and state. The Chief prospered greatly under the public patronage that was thus afforded. Since the death of the Populist party the Chief has been neutral in politics. Some years ago the newspaper and job departments were separated, and each operated independently of the other. The job department was taken over by W. G. Purcell and the newspaper by E. R. Purcell, who is still sole manager and editor of the Chief. The Chief is recognized by the newspapers of the state as having a larger circulation than any other weekly newspaper in Nebraska.

ARNOLD

The first paper published in Arnold was the Tribune, which was established in the year 1886, by Francis Ainsworth, and which had an existence of about a year. The Bugle Call, state organ of the Independent Order of Good Templars, also was published at Arnold for a time, about 1887, but the mechanical work was not done there. Miss Anna M. Saunders was its editor and publisher. After the suspension of the Tribune, Arnold was without a newspaper until February, 1888, when the News was established there, by S. L. Carlyle, who continued to publish it until 1894, when he moved the plant to Nehawka, Nebraska. Arnold now has a newspaper published by J. B. McCoy, and called the Arnold Sentinel.

CALLAWAY

Callaway's first newspaper was the Standard, which made its first bow to the public August 19, 1886, the town being at that time just seven weeks old. The Standard was a newsy paper, published and edited by C. A. Sherwood. The Standard grew and prospered with the town, and was finally sold by Mr. Sherwood to S. L. Carlyle. Mr. Carlyle continued its publication until 1888, when he moved the plant to Arnold and established the News. In the fall of 1887 J. Woods Smith, head of the Callaway townsite syndicate, purchased a newspaper outfit and, on October 15th of that year, established the Callaway Headlight, with O. H. Barber as editor and F. W. Conly as manager. The paper was named Headlight in anticipation of the early completion of the railroad. The paper was purchased, on February 24, 1888, by H. M. Baley, and on October 20th following, by F. W. Conly, who eventually sold it to the Independent, April 30, 1892. Shortly after the beginning of the People's Independent party movement, the political managers of that organization concluded that they needed a newspaper to spread their gospel at Callaway, and E. M. Webb was sent over from Merna with the old Merna Record outfit. Thus the Custer County Independent was founded, and for several years the Independent enjoyed a good patronage. In the fall of 1896 E. M. Webb was elected a member of the Nebraska legislature, and in 1898 he retired from the newspaper business, being succeeded by W. A. Overman, who conducted the Independent until 1901, when the paper was discontinued. Shortly after selling the Headlight, F. W. Conly established the Weekly Tribune, on July 2, 1892, which he continuously published, with the exception of fifteen months during which it was consolidated with the Independent, until 1908, when it was consolidated with the Loup Valley Queen, which was edited by Ray Barnard.

THE CALLAWAY COURIER

The Callaway Courier, a newspaper that for a number of years was one of the leading papers of Custer county, was established in 1888, and was, as the records show, the outgrowth of a local town-fight between some of the citizens of Callaway and J. Woods Smith. The publication of the Courier was presided over by George B. Mair, who bore the reputation of being one of the best editorial writers in the county. In 1910 Mr. Mair was elected clerk of the district court of the county and disposed of his interests in the Courier, which was later consolidated with the Queen.

While Callaway for a time supported three newspapers, it now has but one, which is owned and published by Professor W. A. Rosene, with J. C. Nailer as editor.

BERWYN

For a few months, in 1890-91, the village of Berkyn sported a newspaper, called the Berwyn Times. It was published by Dr. Nickerson, and died a natural death, after a short and not overly brilliant career.

SARGENT

The Loup Valley Eagle was the first publication to herald the rise and growth of the village of Sargent. It was established by E. P. Savage, owner of the townsite, and was edited by C. D. Kelly. The Eagle was succeeded by the Sargent Times, owned by F. M. Currie and edited by J. E. McCray. The paper was discontinued in 1894, and the material sold to The Grip, of Alliance. From that time until 1897, Sargent was without a newspaper. In the latter year J. C. L. Wisely started the Commoner, afterward changing the name of the paper to the Sargent Era. In 1900 C. S. Osborne established the Sargent Leader. In the course of a few months he sold it to Howard Savage, who shortly afterward sold it to A. H. Barks, who, after a short time disposed of the paper. It has changed ownership several times in the past few years, but is being published at the present writing by Guy Livermore, a native son of the vicinity, and it is fairly prosperous.

WEST UNION

West Union for a number of years enjoyed the luxury of a newspaper, which was known as the West Union Gazette. Among the editors of this paper we recall Ham Kautzman, Jud Woods, and W. H. Predmore. The Gazette was suspended during the drouth period in the '90s and since that time West Union has been newspaperless.

In 1893 W. H. Predmore and E. M. Webb started the Custer County Citizen, which was run during the campaign, in opposition to some of the Populist candidates. After a few weeks Mr. Webb returned to his claim near Callaway, and Mr. Predmore continued the paper for some time. He then leased it to Mrs. Louise Raymond, who ran it for a short time, in connection with the job-printing business. Charles A. Cook succeeded Mrs. Raymond, and continued the paper for some months longer, when it was discontinued, in 1894. For a time Rev. George Bailey, pastor of the Presbyterian church from 1893 to 1899, published a church paper in connection with his work, as also did Rev. Mr. Epley, pastor of the United Brethren church. The Populist, a paper started in opposition to fusion, was published in Broken Bow from September 1, 1900, to February, 1901, by James Stockham and J. G. Painter.

COMSTOCK

One of the later villages established in Custer county has been favored with a newspaper since soon after its birth. The Index was published by Harold Cooley. This paper passed to the ownership of Elmer E. Wimmer, who continued to publish it until the month of July, 1918, when he was called from his labors by death. Mr. Wimmer was one of the honorable and worthy citizens of Custer county, of which he had been a resident for more than thirty years.

OCONTO

Oconto's newspaper career has been somewhat varied, but for several years it has maintained a good weekly paper, called the Register, which is now published by F. M. Bryner.

S. D. BUTCHER, HISTORIAN

Custer county owes to Mr. and Mrs. S. D. Butcher more than it can ever pay. They have been valuable pioneers. With incessant toil they gathered historical data for the last two score years, and they have assembled the large of western history — a history that would treat generally the middle west and especially central Nebraska.

On June 1, 1886, he made the first picture for his book, and by 1892 he had made 1,500 pictures and had written that many biographies. The intention was to reproduce these old sod houses and dugouts with a short biographical sketch under each picture, making a picture album of early days in Custer county,

S. D. BUTCHER AND FAMILY

est aggregation of pictures of Custer county scenes and Custer county pioneers ever compiled, perhaps, by any county. This history of the county is deeply indebted to Mr. Butcher's collection, not only for illustrations but also for much of the historical data it contains. Names, dates, and events have been culled profusely from the Butcher compilation. These names and dates could have been obtained from no other source. Back in the early '80s Mr. Butcher began his work, with the intention, then, of becoming a publisher and an illustrator on the largest scale that had ever been attempted by any county. The drouth period stopped the enterprise for several years. On the morning of March 12, 1899, a fire destroyed Mr. Butcher's home and its contents, including the biographical manuscript of the proposed history, thus making it impossible ever to replace the sketches of the early pioneers, as many had left the country. Fortunately the negatives were stored in boxes, in an out-building, and were saved. In a few weeks after the fire Mr. Butcher commenced taking orders for his Pioneer History of Custer County, with short sketches of early days in Nebraska, and in eighteen months he had completed this work, of 400 pages. He sold one thousand books.

A STATE CONTRIBUTION

A June issue of the Nebraska State Journal in 1916 devotes an entire page to the historical pictures Mr. Butcher had contributed to the historical collection of Nebraska, and from the accompanying context the following is an excerpt:

"A picture gallery of Nebraska frontier life! The old sod houses, dugouts, log cabins, and shacks; the 'family gathering,'—the whole family as we knew it in the frontier days,—father, mother, the babies, the faithful old horses, the little bunch of cattle, the pigs, the poultry, and, not least, the family dog. The familiar farm and ranch operations in the old style—breaking prairie with a yoke of oxen, threshing the first wheat crop with the old horse-power machine, planting sod corn with a one-hand 'Punch' planter. The old frontier gatherings—the 'big feed' at the sod house when the friends from a dozen claims gathered to eat at a long table; where the children romped together, and the 'old folks' (who were generally young) looked out into the future and cheered each other with the prospects. The other neighborhood gatherings—the Sunday school picnic, the frontier wedding, the roundup on the cattle range, the circle hunt, the Farmers' Alliance, and that most tender and never-to-be-forgotten incident of frontier childhood—the 'last day' of district school.

"There are three thousand two hundred of these pictures in one collection. It is called the 'Butcher collection.' It is the work of Mr. and Mrs. Butcher, who settled in Custer county in 1882, and combined homesteading with photography for the next twenty years, traveling part of the time in a photographic wagon over the vast and thinly settled region of northwest Nebraska, taking pictures of the people and places just as they found them. A history of Custer county grew out of these travels and these thousands of negatives, slowly accumulated through the years.

"The legislature of 1913 appropriated $600 for the purchase of the Butcher collection for the Nebraska legislative reference bureau and the Nebraska history work of the state university. During the past winter the collection has been carefully gone over, with the assistance of Mr. Butcher, classified, catalogued, and prints made from a large part of the negatives.

"These pictures tell the story of life in western Nebraska thirty years ago more effectively than any other descriptive matter. The almost infinite variety of sod-house architecture and farm-yard arrangement is in them set forth. The clothing, the furniture, the hopes, the purposes, of these pioneers are eloquently told in the family groups and neighborhood gatherings. The way in which the Nebraska frontier built its houses, planted its crops, dug its wells, gathered its harvest, went to school, received religion, played its games, and gathered for social and civic purposes, finds expression in these negatives, where the sunlight and silver nitrate have fixed for all future time the shadows of the people and the events whose originals are fast fading from sight and memory.

"What would not the American world give to-day for such a collection of New England life from the year 1620? What would not some of the older people of to-day give for the pioneer pictures of New York, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Wisconsin? Long before the end of the present century this collection will be held beyond price and its material used over and over in publications upon western art, literature, and history.

"Most of the negatives are six by eight inches in size, taken with an old-fashioned camera which looked like a six-pounder brass cannon, and required special genius and pains to secure results. Their preservation through all the vicissitudes of frontier life, fires, washouts, movings, cyclones, seems providential.

"Mrs. Butcher, to whose faithful services as a frontier wife, mother, and photographic helper, is due a large part of the honor for preservation of this collection, passed away December 29, 1915. Her husband, after some years of absence, is once more back in Custer county, in the field of local history."

Aside from photography, Mr. Butcher has been a prolific writer of descriptive articles. On a few very rare occasions the poetical streak in his nature has broken out and got beyond control. One such an occasion was when, after proving up on his homestead, he left his old shanty by addressing to it the following sentiment:

FAREWELL, HOMESTEAD SHANTY

(By S. D. Butcher)

Farewell to the homestead shanty;

I have my final proof;

The cattle will hook down the walls,

And someone will haul off the roof.

Farewell to my sheet-iron stove

That stands in the corner, all cold;

The good things all baked in the oven

In language can never be told.

Farewell to the crackerbox cupboard,

With gunny-sack hung for a door;

Farewell to my store of good things

That I shall never want any more.

Farewell to the little pine bedstead,

'Tis on thee I slumbered and slept;

Farewell to the dreams that I dreamt,

While the fleas all over me crept.

Farewell to the down-holstered chair,

With the bottom sagg'd down to the ground;

Farewell to the socks, shirts and breeches

That fill it again to the round.

Farewell to the nice little table,

Under which I have oft put my feet,

Then chose from the bounty of good things

The substantial things to eat.

Farewell to the sour dough pancakes

That none but myself could endure;

If they did not taste good to a stranger

They were sure the dyspepsia to cure.

Farewell to the tea and the crackers;

Farewell to the water and soap;

Farewell to the sorghum and buckwheat;

Farewell to the lallacadope.

ELMER E. DOWSE

Elmer E. Dowse was born in Custer county, a genuine Custer county product, and lives near Comstock, this county, at the present day. This prose article, written by Mr. Dowse, was read at one of the old settlers' picnics several years ago and was awarded a prize for merit and historical value:

"Imagine yourself standing with me, about the middle of July, on one of the bluffs which commands a view for several miles up and down the Middle Loup valley. There is presented to us a panorama of singular and varied beauty. Dark green fields of corn alternate with fields of rapidly ripening wheat and oats. The Middle Loup, winding like a serpent up the valley, until finally hidden by a bend in the hills, its banks lined with willows in a manner so truly artistic as to challenge the possibility of reproduction, and dotted here and there with exquisite little islands, completes an unsurpassable picture of peace and beauty.

"Let us close our eyes and drift backward over a space of time covering thirty-three years. We open our eyes and — O wondrous change! Where are those prosperous farm dwellings, those magnificent fields and that little village resting at the foot of a bluff several miles up the river? The stream flows on with the same majesty, the grandeur of the valley is undiminished, but now all we see is a long, level sea of waving grass. Here and there herds of deer and antelope are feeding and several miles to the north a long line of elk wind their way to the stream of water. Apparently the wild animals and the Indians have full and free possession. But what is that we see at a distance of about two miles? The upward curling smoke which has attracted our attention, indicates that a human habitation is near. We conclude that it cannot be Indians, because of the absence of the typical tepee, although the willow poles scattered about in various places show that the tepee was much in evidence before the last prairie fire. A walk of forty minutes brings us to the place from which the smoke is emanating. It is the abode of Henry Snell, one of Custer county's first settlers, and merits a brief description. It is simply a dugout close to the bank of a swamp, and is about nine feet long, three feet wide, and six feet deep. In one corner is a fireplace and in another a hole in the top of the roof serves as a door. Sumptuous wall decorations and gorgeous carpets are conspicuous only by their absence. The roof is on a level with the ground and all is well arranged to afford concealment from the Indians, who are known to be in large numbers a little farther northwest. Henry Snell, the lord of this castle, is a well proportioned man, six feet in height, with a pleasant, kindly countenance, and about thirty years of age. He has been a school-teacher and possesses intelligence and refinement to an unusual degree.

"The first white settler of Custer county was my father, L. R. Dowse. He came up to Douglas Grove in August of 1873, put up hay and selected a homestead. Returning to Loup City, he came back, bringing his wife and children. They occupied the dwelling place of Henry Snell, which I have just described, until my father, with Henry's help, had time to construct a house of cottonwood slabs. Soon Frank Ohme, B. D. Allen, W. H. Comstock, and others came up with their families, and Douglas Grove began to be a settlement of considerable size.

"At this time Custer county was truly a hunter's paradise. Elk, deer, and antelope could be found in abundance almost anywhere. Grandpa Wagner, one of the first to come to Douglas Grove, might well be called the 'Leather Stocking of the Middle Loup.' He was endowed with a magnificent physique, marvelous physical strength and endurance, a cool head, clear eye, and steady hands. Passionately fond of hunting and trapping, he found here abundant opportunities to exercise his skill. Many men have won fame and renown whose exploits did not equal his.

"During the first few years, when the ravages of the grasshoppers threatened to cause a famine in the little settlement, Grandpa's unerring rifle kept his own family and many other families in meat. Many long winter evenings I have sat for hours and listened to his tales, made doubly entrancing by his quaint, original manner of relating them. When he was unable to bring his game home with him, the empty cartridge placed on the body of the carcasses served to keep away the hungry coyotes. But his stories of long tramps, of being caught in blinding blizzards, and battling home against wind and driving snow — these stories were told me when quite young and my recollection of most of them is rather indistinct. One simple little incident, however, which I remember with considerable distinctness, will serve as an illustration.

"It is an afternoon in February; the patches of bare ground visible in many places give promises of returning spring. Grandpa is sitting at the door of my father's house, which gives an excellent view of deer, led by an immense buck, coming down the eastern hills and toward the river. Waiting until the buck, which is a good distance ahead, has covered about half the distance to the river, he procures his long-barreled rifle and crosses the stream. When he reaches the other side, he perceives that in order to get within range he must keep to the north of the buck, on account of a slight wind which is blowing from the south. By taking advantage of a slight rise in the intervening ground and creeping a couple of hundred yards, then following a little draw southward for a short distance, he can come within easy rifle shot.

"Accustomed as he is to stalking deer, this is for him an easy task. The buck feeds quietly for the most part, waiting for the rest of the herd to come up, and pausing occasionally to raise his lofty antlers and sniff the air for evidences of possible enemy. In a half-hour Grandpa has gained the coveted position. As he raises himself slightly, to draw a careful bead, some intimation of danger seems to strike this king of the prairies, and, raising his noble head, with his sensitive nostrils quivering, he starts to bound away. There's a puff of smoke and a sharp report which seems only to increase the deer's momentum. It seems that for once the old hunter's steady hand has failed him. But the buck covers less than a hundred yards when he stumbles and falls. Another trophy has been added to Grandpa's long list.

"Another time he was not so successful, though through no fault of his. For some reason, instead of using his own trusty rifle, he borrowed a gun of a man named Ross and set out toward the head of a little creek commonly known as Spring creek. Coming up over a large bluff, he saw below him, and in easy range, twenty-four elk feeding on the tender grass near the edge of the creek. What must have been his chagrin when his gun refused to do its work! After snapping it repeatedly he was obliged to return empty-handed, leaving the elk stamping and snorting on the creek below.

"An Irishman living on Victoria creek should be mentioned in connection with hunting in the early days, on account of his unique method of pursuing the game. He had a large, gray horse which was somewhat of a runner and was accustomed to chase the elk in vain attempts to run them down. Once he chased a large herd up into the head of a canyon. Here the elk found it impossible to scale the steep sides and collected in a bunch, stamping and snorting. The Irishman, in great glee, thinking that now he would have the laugh on his neighbors, who had watched his former attempts with so much amusement, dismounted and began to take pot-shots at the elk. When he began his fusillade, the elk began again to make frantic attempts to scale the sides. At every shot it seemed that an elk rolled back. But when this son of Ireland thought that he must have most of them killed, those which had escaped his furious bombardment got together and, making a precipitate rush down the canyon, almost overturned him and his horse. When he went to see the extent of the carnage he had wrought, nothing but torn and beaten earth greeted his astonished gaze. His bullets had all flown wild and the elk which he had seen falling were merely submitting to the laws of gravitation and not to his marksmanship.

"In the summer of 1876 occurred the massacre of Custer and his little band, and a general condition of unrest prevailed among the Indians in Montana and the Black Hills. This state of affairs created much uneasiness among the settlers, because they knew that there was nothing to prevent the warriors from swooping down the Middle Loup, if they should happen to get started in that direction. Indian massacres on the Republican also added to their alarm. As a means of providing against such a possibility, a company, known as the 'Custer County Rangers,' was formed and W. H. Comstock was elected captain. A fort about forty feet square was constructed of sod and logs. But these precautionary measures, although wise enough, were entirely unnecessary, as the Indians never came, and Douglas Grove was never seriously endangered by the red skins.

"One could write almost indefinitely upon the early incidents of this settlement alone. Many quaint and peculiar, as well as good and noble, characters of that time and place, have not been mentioned, but are worthy of a full description and history. But people of Custer county, as you view with pride your excellent educational facilities, the wonderful industrial development of the county, and the general peace and prosperity, remember that it is largely due to the daring and industry of pioneers such as I have mentioned. Let us pause occasionally in the scramble and rush to attend our daily duties and pleasure, to glance back to that period in Custer county's history when all was as it had been for hundreds of years and nothing was in abundance except that provided by the kindly hand of God and nature. Then let us regard with a greater degree of respect and admiration those noble men and women who, dedicating their lives to the county's welfare, in spite of perils and hardships, kept on with unwavering perseverance.

"As I let my thoughts turn backward

Through the misty haze of years,

Filled with joys and fraught with fears;
To those early days so hopeful,

As I think of the hopes and efforts

Of those pioneers so bold,

Of the deer and elk and Indians,

Of strange adventures never told;

Emotions strangely impressive

Come stealing over me,

And my tho'ts I cannot utter,
Nor can I pen such reverie."

MRS. M. B. A. MARTIN

Mrs. M. B. A. Martin was an old-time Custer resident who came to Broken Bow from Creston, Iowa. She was an intelligent, well educated lady, and after the death of her husband she devoted several years to teaching here in the county. She was a talented writer and possessed a keen imagination which readily lent itself to romance and poetry. The most notable of her rhymed productions was an Indian romance and tragedy woven about the "Broken Bow" for which the town is supposed to have been named. It is written in the metre and style of Longfellow's "Hiawatha." As a work of imagination, the story, plot, romance, and descriptions are more remarkable than the language.

THE BROKEN BOW

(By Mrs. M. B. A. Martin)

Slow the moon rose o'er the valley,
The valley of the Big Sioux river,
Shining down upon the wigwams;
They, the red men of the Sioux tribe,
They had camped to hold a council
With the chief of the Dakotas,
Known among them as War Eagle,
For the scalp hung from his girdle;
He had slain among the cañons,
To the southward, to the westward,
He had fought and butchered many;
But his brother, Navasota,
Had been slain among the cañons;
He fell fighting the Paducahs
For the fair lands of Nebraska.

Each tribe claimed the elk and bison,
Claimed the deer among the cedars,
That roamed among the tallest cedars,
Fed upon the grass that grew there.
The Paducahs gained the battle,
Drove the Sioux from off the valley,
Far beyond the Niobrara,
To the valley of the Big Sioux,
Where dwelt the tribe of the Dakotas,
Dwelt the Indian maid, Winneta,
The daughter of brave Navasota.
In the council Eagle Feather
Sat and smoked beside his father,
Sat and smoked the pipe among them,
Listened to the great War Eagle,

As he planned the coming marriage
Of the Indian maid, Winneta,
To his son, the Eagle Feather.

Was not her mother of the Sioux tribe
Rich in wealth of lands and ponies,
When the father of Winneta
Claimed her for his Indian bride?
And the union of the two tribes
Made them richer, made them stronger.
Now the union of Winneta
To my son, the Eagle Feather,
Will more united make the friendship
Of the Sioux and the Dakotas.

Then they called the Indian maiden,
Told her bid the Eagle Feather
To do some daring deed of prowess
To prove his great love for Winneta —
He shall do Winneta's bidding.
With her eyes downcast and thoughtful,
With her voice so clear and mournful,
Spoke she then to Eagle Feather:
"Go to the land of the Nebraskas,
Far beyond the Niobrara,
Where the Sioux and the Dakotas
Hunted, fished, and roamed the prairies,
The deep cañons far beyond them.

To the eastward flows the North Loup,
To the southward flows the South Loup,
Where the foes of my dead father
Dwell and hunt among the cañons,
Kill the buffalo by hundreds,
Kill the dark friends of Winneta,
Killed the brave chief, Navasota,
Will you go and bring a token
From the spot where sleeps my father?
Bring his bow and bring his quiver,
Bring his quiver full of arrows,
That the Paducahs may not use them
To slay more friends of poor Winneta;
Ere another moon grows darkened
You may return and wed Winneta."

Then arose the Eagle Feather,
Cast his eyes upon the maiden,
"I will go and do your bidding."
Seized his tomahawk and scalp-knife,
Fastened them into his girdle,
Fastened then his bow and quiver,
A new quiver full of arrows.
Strode he out into the moonlight,
Mid the war whoop of the red men,
Walked away adown the valley,
Walked he on until the sunrise
Found him hurrying southward, westward,
To the Niobrara valley.

Stopped at night beneath the cedars,
Made a fire of withered branches,
Slept beside the campfire soundly,
Slept until the wild birds called him,

Called him to pursue his journey
 By their sweet songs in the morning,
 Welcoming the pleasant sunrise.
 Southward, westward, Eagle Feather
 Hurried on to do the bidding
 Of the dark-eyed Indian maiden.
 For five days the Eagle Feather
 Journeyed on toward the South Loup,
 Slept at night beside the streamlet;
 Tired, weary, on the last night
 Made his fire beside the Muddy;
 Laid him down to rest and slumber,
 Heeding not the howling coyote
 Warning him of coming danger,
 Warning him his foes were near him;
 Slept and dreamed of home and kindred.

Dreamed he saw the dark-eyed maiden
 Coming down the path to meet him,
 Coming down to greet her lover,
 To receive the bow and quiver;
 Dreamed he on till almost sunrise.
 When the war whoop echoed wildly
 Through the cañons on the prairies,
 Echoed up and down the Muddy.
 Waked he then among their yelling,
 For his foes had found him sleeping.
 Then they scalped the Eagle Feather,
 For they numbered near a hundred;
 Forced him then to tell his errand.
 Then they took his bow and quiver,
 Took his bow and broke it rudely,
 Threw it down to warn the Sioux tribe
 That they'd slain their Eagle Feather.

Then they took their suffering prisoner
 With them far beyond the South Loup,
 Let him die and soon forgot him.
 Many moons grew bright and darkened,
 Yet the Eagle Feather came not,
 Never came to claim his promise,
 Never more returned to meet her.
 "He must be dead," she murmured lowly,
 "Or he would come to poor Winneta.
 Farewell, Eagle Feather, farewell,
 Your Winneta's heart is breaking.
 Breaking for her Indian lover.
 I will go away in sadness
 To the wigwam of my mother,
 Lay me down, and sleep the death sleep.

"In the spirit land I'll meet him,
 Meet him and my brave old father;
 In the hunting grounds of the red men,
 Happy land of the Great Spirit,
 Will commune with Eagle Feather
 In the land beyond the sunset."
 Years have passed and left the traces

Of the Sioux and the Dakotas,
 Westward they have journeyed farther,
 And their tribes are growing smaller,
 Their hunting grounds are now rich corn-fields
 For the white man's plow and reaper;
 And their cabins dot the prairie,
 And they cut away the cedars,
 Frighten all the elk and bison
 From Nebraska's fair prairies.

Years swept by, the pale-faced settlers
 On the prairies of Nebraska,
 On the swiftly flowing South Loup,
 Built their cabins on the North Loup,
 Hunted on the Niobrara.
 Built their cabins on the Muddy.
 Near the place where Eagle Feather,
 The young chief of the Dakotas,
 Met his fate by the Paducahs,
 Came the pale-face, walking slowly,
 Thinking of the growing city
 They were building on the Muddy,
 For many men had come together,
 Brought their wives and children with them,
 To populate fair Custer county.

And the people of the Muddy
 Now must name this fair young city.
 For a new name searched they often,
 Oft rejected, half discouraged,
 While out walking on the Muddy
 Came he where the bow lay broken;
 Pondered he of how it came there,
 All alone beside the Muddy.
 Pondered he, this pale-faced Hewitt,
 As he homeward walked more quickly,
 "I have found a bow that's broken."
 Said he to his fair wife waiting,
 "An Indian bow that has been broken
 Let us name our city for it,

Name our city Broken Bow:
 Sent the name, it was accepted.
 Never was a name just like it,
 Never one half so romantic.
 Full of wonder came each stranger.
 "Such a strange name for a city,"
 Said each stranger when they heard it.
 Broken Bow, in Custer county,
 Built beside the Muddy river,
 Near beside those wondrous cañons
 Where the Indian tribes had waged war,
 Where the coyote warned the red chief,
 While he dreamed of dark Winneta;
 Where he suffered death by torture,

A. J. McARTHUR, M. D.

A. J. McArthur was born in Hocking county, Ohio, May 6, 1862. He was educated in the public schools of Ohio, in the high school at Maryville, Missouri, and in the Northwestern Normal at Stanberry, Missouri. He graduated from the Missouri Medical College, St. Louis, Missouri, in March, 1891. He located first at Maryville, but moved later to Westerville, Nebraska. He practiced there and at Weissert for many years—till bad health forced him to discontinue.

Dr. McArthur came to Broken Bow in August, 1916, in order to put his children in the high school. Aside from the practice of medicine, he has given considerable attention to literature, and he has been a contributor to eastern magazines. A few years ago he was party to a joint debate with a Catholic priest, in the columns of the World-Herald, which attracted state wide attention. For the last few years he has been a regular contributor to the Truth Seeker, of New York.

When the war first began there appeared in that publication a series of articles of unusual literary ability, signed "George Sibel." They were powerfully pro-German, but so skillfully prepared that their object was not at once apparent. As soon as the United States had declared war Dr. McArthur wrote an article for the Truth Seeker calling attention to the character of these articles. This brought a reply, and he finally charged Mr. Sibel openly with not being a loyal citizen, reviewed the articles as they appeared, and quoted his previous work to such purpose, that the articles soon ceased to appear.

The Doctor's Custer county prize article follows:

PRIZE ARTICLE

During the early part of 1906 the Custer County Chief offered a prize for the best Custer county article in which the advantages and resources of the county should be exploited. F. M. Currie, Alpha Morgan, and George Mair were selected as awarding judges, and by their decision the following article, written by Dr. A. J. McArthur, was given first place.

CUSTER COUNTY

"J. Proctor Knott once humorously stated that the city of Duluth is exactly in the center of the universe, and for proof adduced the fact that the horizon came down to meet the earth at exactly the same distance, in all directions. This is equally true of Custer county, but it is further true that Custer county is the center of the most central state in the Union, which, in its turn, is the most central country in the first continent on the globe. To the unsophisticated eastern tenderfoot, who, in a lifetime, never ventures beyond the purlieus of his township, central Nebraska is only a barren, windy waste, scorned by the flocks of cranes and geese as they hasten over, and peopled only by rattlesnakes and skulking coyotes.

"'Happy is the country that has no history,' for it means peace and prosperity. What a sight it would be to one of these men, who every morning of his life has taken his little basket and gone out to feed his dozen shoats, if he could visit an average Custer county farm, to see the farmer hitch a stout team to a big wagon, scoop in fifty bushels of corn and drive into the feed yard with the morning rations of a quarter-acre of hogs. Then to realize that this is only the commencement of the morning chores—that there are more hogs and perhaps hundreds of cattle still to be fed. When he looks at the alfalfa meadow, dotted with scores of stacks, looking in the distance like the tented bivouac of an army, he will remember how, for years, he has carefully fed old Dobbin a little timothy sprinkled with water to guard against the heaves, and pitied 'those who dwelt in desert places.'

"The name of Custer county and the name of her metropolis, Broken Bow, conjure visions of clashing interest and border strife, but the strife has long since ceased. The Indian, in token of defeat, has cast down his broken bow and passed on to the west, and where once roamed the majestic herds of buffalo are now found the matchless herds of fine cattle.

"We have often wondered if the residents of Custer county ever think upon her stupendous possibilities or speculate upon her future. We have an empire within our borders. Custer county contains more than one and one-half millions acres of land. Larger than some of the states, larger than some of the monarchies of antiquity, the history of whose people and their deeds of valor is now taught in our public schools. Indefinitely larger, if measured by the lavish ensemblage of natural resources of this, 'The Great American Desert.'

"Many farmers can remember with what misgivings they first ventured into Custer county, twenty-five years ago! Timidly, tentatively, looking back, but dreading the derision that awaited them there, they found the Eldorado of their dreams: soil which, 'tickled with a hoe, laughed with a bounteous harvest,' and which, after a quarter of a century of cultivation, is the same soil still. Expecting to find man wandering, insane from thirst, they found a water course every ten miles, a climate that gave new life and strength, cool nights that snatched the languor from the most wearied limbs, and — and fleas. Some turned back, of course. Nature would furnish the grist, but Nature would not grind it, so they went back to their wives' folks to gather hickory-nuts and persimmons.

"And now Custer county is about to realize her hopes, to stand free from the calumny of her traducers. When it takes half a train to haul a man's stock to market, he is past the place where you can argue with him about his prosperity or raise the ghost of his long-forgotten doubts as to his country. Long misunderstood and reviled, farmers are coming to understand that Custer county is mighty, but benign, if her moods and peculiarities are respected. She has shown her contempt for long-haired prophets and rain-makers, and has settled down to certain crops, equal to any produced in the Mississippi valley.

"The great activity in real estate and the rapid advance in value of land, shows that farmers are beginning to appreciate the country, but Custer county land is still ridiculously cheap. Eastern men who come here are made suspicious by the mean prices that farmers put on their land. We simply have not the nerve or the sense to ask for it what it is worth. Real-estate men are growing rich buying from the unwary and in a few days selling again, often for nearly double the purchase price. Think how rapidly the country is developing, all because of a better understanding of the climate and soil. Only a few years ago it was commonly believed that winter wheat could not be grown here. Now it is a staple crop and the yield equal to that of the northern wheat belt. How long since every farmer believed that the native grass was the only forage or pasture that would grow here? Now there are numbers of grasses that only need a start to thrive here and outyield the native grass five to one. In annual grasses we have never in any other country seen such profusion of varieties or such rank growth.

"A few years ago farmers were raising little patches of alfalfa in their gardens, indifferent, without confidence, saving a little seed to sow the next year. Now it is the staff of the country, ranking right with corn in all around utility. The yield of alfalfa is almost past belief. One acre will feed twenty hogs through the entire summer, and it defies the frost till late in the fall. If mowed and carefully saved, an acre of alfalfa will make from eight to twelve tons of hay. Brome grass is proving itself to be a close second, with the added advantage that it may be pastured at any time with impunity.

"With the coming of these things is come the honey bee. With ordinary care bees increase very rapidly and produce honey in plenty, and of fine quality. They care nothing for wire fences and will garner from your neighbor's fields as well as from your own — and will go a long way to do it. In a short time this country will outclass all others in bee culture, and the production of honey.

"Nearly all kinds of fruits are now grown here, not only 'successfully,' but with profit. A 'lick and a promise' will not grow corn, nor will it grow fruit trees. Neither do fruit trees, especially when young, make good pastures for cows. But the right varieties, properly planted and properly cared for, will produce fruit of any kind. Who thought of strawberries some years ago? Now farmers raise them by the bushel.

"The whole secret, in Custer county, is in knowing the climate and soil, and a reasonable care of the crop. It would not be fair to omit the most important crop of all—the babies. For no other crop is the soil so productive. Families of ten or a dozen are found on every section, and upon no other crop does the future greatness of this county so much depend.

“Nothing else so completes a man’s satisfaction with Custer county, as a visit to the home of his boyhood. There will come the homesickness—the longing to go back—‘back to Grigsby’s Station, back where we used to be so happy and so pore.’ He will go and come again, entirely disillusioned of the sylvan and elysian memories that he has cherished, and wondering how people there manage to make a living. They don’t. The New England states are dotted with hundreds of deserted farms, so worthless and so numerous that they are becoming a huge problem to be solved by the people of these states.

“Great as Custer county has come to be, she is still in the early morning of her life, a toddling infant just quitting the threshold of her nursery for a life of strenuous endeavor and great achievement. With the accumulated wealth of ages in her soil, a matchless climate, skies as blue as Italy’s, stars as bright as any that ever looked down upon ancient Egypt, peopled by men and women whose restless energy would not brook the sterile parsimony of other lands, she is like the block of fine marble that only awaits the hand of the sculptor to release the angel imprisoned within.”

GEORGE B. MAIR

George B. Mair, descriptive writer, editor, and poet, deserves a prominent place in the literary annals of this western county. He was a resident of long years in the Callaway district, where he made a newspaper record that might well be envied by most any quill pusher. A few years ago he was elected clerk of the district court, and from that time he made his home in the county seat until the fall of 1917, when he removed with his family to Oakland, California, where he now resides.

In his irrational moments George indulged in poetry, and the following song of the river is a rare contribution to Custer literature.

THE SOUTH LOUP RIVER

[By George B. Mair]

In the heart of Niobrara,
Rushing onward like an arrow
Speeding from the bow,
Flows the laughing South Loup river,
While its rippling waters ever
Murmur soft and low.

How I love to sit and ponder
On its bank, just over yonder,
When the setting sun
Throws a sort of dreamy sadness
O’er the stream which danced with gladness,
Ere the day was done.

Then to me it tells the story
Of a long departed glory,
In the days gone by;
Of the valley flower-scented,
Where the painted savage tented
‘Neath the autumn sky;

Of the dusky Indian maiden,
And her lover, coming laden
Homeward from the chase,
Laying at her feet his treasure
While her smile reflects the pleasure
Beaming in her face.

Far adown the sloping valley
I can see the warriors rally,
And the council fire,
Where the wise men of the nation
Meet in solemn consultation,
While the squaws retire.

Then the war whoop of the savage,
As he sallies forth to ravage
The village of his foe;
Followed by the noise of battle
And the ever-changing rattle
Of the twanging bow.

Then I see the braves returning;
And the ruddy camp-fire burning
By the river side,
Lights their wild and savage dancing,
As it flickers in the glancing
Waters of the tide.

Then again the ceaseless chatter
Of the dancing, eddying water,
Ever faint and low,
Strikes my fancy like the rushing,
Rumbling war-tread of the crushing
Herds of buffalo.

And I see their dark brown masses,
 Surging through the canyon passes,
 As I almost dream;
 When they rush with noisy clatter,
 Deep into the cooling water
 Of the grateful stream.

And a thousand fancies hover 'Round the hazy hills, and over
 Every landscape scene,
 And the laughing South Loup river,
 Floweth on and on forever
 Thro' its valleys green.

But I wake from out my dreaming,
 And I find the waters gleaming,
 Ever, as of yore;
 But the council fire has vanished.
 And the savage has been banished
 Hence, forever more.

And the dusky Indian maiden
 From the banks with flowers laden,
 Long ago has gone,
 And upon the far horizon
 I no longer see the bison
 Coming swiftly on.

Gone the wigwams and the dances
 And the olden time romances
 Of the hunting grounds,
 Where the white man's lowing cattle
 And the harvester's fierce rattle
 Make discordant sounds.

Fields of waving corn are growing,
 And the south-land breeze is blowing
 O'er wheat fields of gold;
 But the laughing South Loup river
 Floweth on and on forever
 As it did of old.

HARRY B. ISZARD

Harry B. Iszard is entitled to be styled one of the literary persons of Custer county. He has been a resident of the county for the last fourteen years and during that time has been a very prolific writer. The story and news pages of the Custer County Chief attest the versatility of his pencil and the fascination of his style.

Mr. Iszard began as a newspaper man on the Leadville Democrat-Herald, under the tutorage of the locally famous "Cad" Davis. Later he worked on the Denver papers, where his writings attracted both notice and comment throughout the mountain state. His Denver work was responsible for a staff position on one of the Omaha papers, where he did two or three years' work. Aside from newspaper work he has been a contributor to magazines, and in the field of short stories has distinguished himself to the extent of putting a Custer county name into the list of literary producers. From his desk in the Chief office the local county stories come forth with a pungent flavor that makes them remarkably readable. Harry, as he is familiarly called by his friends, has the faculty of infusing into an otherwise dry article a rich vein of subtle humor. He tells his story differently and contrasts his style in such a way that both are called unique.

A year or so ago he ran in the Chief a series of attractive articles which he styled "Tabulated Knocks" and which attracted the attention of state writers and newspaper men.

TABULATED KNOCKS

In the articles entitled "Tabulated Knocks" he introduces the different members of the "Hammer-Fan Family." Each member of the family figures, in his or her respective comic role, to the hilarity and delight of the reader.

Below is given Mr. Iszard's introduction of "Miss Hammer-Fan," who, with "Bosom Friend," puts in an hour at the picture-show.

Scene: Either of the picture theatres. Time: Any old night between eight and ten o'clock. (Miss Hammer-Fan and Bosom Friend approach the box-office window.)

Miss H. F. (frantically pawing her purse for small coins) — "Wait a minute, Beulah, this is my treat—that is, it will be if I can ever find those two dimes. (Still pawing.) What on earth has become of them? Oh, here they are under this sample of silk. (Produces two dimes and pushes them in at the window. The two girls enter the theatre and block up the aisle while surveying the house.) We've missed the first of this reel and our regular seats are occupied, as usual. It would be an act of common courtesy for them to keep our seats all the time, considering the amount of money we spend in the house every week."

Bosom Friend (indicating seats) — "Let's sit here and maybe we can keep on our hats. (As they seat themselves there is a sharp canine yelp and the bosom friend screams.) Mercy! What was that?"

Miss H. F. (wearily) — "You've only kicked a dog, that's all. They come in here and chase themselves all over the place. It's a wonder the house wouldn't furnish pillows for them to sleep on. (Two school boys enter, drop into seats back of them and commence making comments.) Now we'll have some music."

First boy (in a stage whisper) — "Lamp the head dresses in front, ain't they giddy?"

Second boy (in a squeaky voice) — "Hats off, please."

Miss H. F. (turning half around) — "Mind your own business, you little animals." (Both boys giggle.)

First boy (solemnly) — "What kind of an animal are you, Chink?"

Second boy — "I'm a cat, I am; meow, phist!"

First boy — "Do cats wear hats?"

Bosom Friend (resignedly) — "Oh, we might as well; they'll give us no peace until we do." (Takes her hat off.)

Miss H. F. (viciously) — "I hate to humor the little beasts. (Also removes her hat.) Now you two shut up or I'll have you fired." (Boys giggle and subside.)

Bosom Friend — "What's the name of this reel?"

Miss H. F. — "Dunno, but I'm sure I saw it in Omaha three months ago. We never get anything until late here. Honest to goodness, they ran some stuff this month that I saw in Chicago nearly two years ago. Oh, there's the name: 'The Pink Puppy.' Yep, it's the same thing I saw in Omaha."

Bosom Friend — "That isn't 'Pink Puppy,' it's 'Pink Poppy.'"

Miss H. F. — "Well, it's wrong, anyway; poppies are red, at least so I have always understood. Now watch this hateful old thing what he is doing. He's jealous of the young hotel clerk and in order to put him in bad with the plumber's daughter, he steals an artificial flower from — Bingo! To be sure, the film would have to part just at the critical moment. Now we can sit back and twiddle our thumbs for five or ten minutes while they are gluing it together. That's the trouble up here, everything is so ancient that it drops to pieces almost before they can get it on the machine. Say, kid, you should have seen the 'Tango Tangle'; they had it in Grand Island last week. Kerry Worrigan does the leading part and he's just the sweetest thing —"

Bosom Friend (disdainfully) — "Kerry Worrigan isn't in the same class at all with Marsh Cocopello."

Miss H. F. (with careful sarcasm) — "If he was he would sure be a 'dead one.'"

Bosom Friend (with heat) — "Worrigan is a joke."

Miss H. F. (putting on more pressure) — "And Cocopello is an 'also ran.'"

Bosom Friend (with a sniff) — "Looks like it when the University people have been on their knees for years begging him to come over to them."

Miss H. F. — "Nothing doing. The Linseed outfit would have dropped him long ago if he hadn't been tied to them by an iron-clad contract. (Spitefully) I wish I hadn't paid your way in here."

Bosom Friend (calmly) — "You didn't. That dime was coming to me; it's one you borrowed two weeks ago."

First boy (from behind) — "Sic 'em, Bowser."

Second boy — "I'll bet on the 'catty' one."

Second boy (quoting at random) — "'Tis the friend of my childhood's days."

Miss H. F. (as the photoplay is resumed) — "They've got it fixed — and it's about time. Maybe the chorus back of us will now take a rest. See those two big rummys down there with their heads together. Wonder how they expect us to see anything? Must think we belong to the X-ray family. Look, here is where the hotel clerk pushes him off of the cliff into the water. Zowie, what a splash. I'll bet those people who do the water stunts have colds in their heads all the time. I met a moving picture actor in Denver last year and he told me that the managers made them do all sorts of horrible things and some of the men in his company almost drank themselves to death, in order to keep up their courage. One actor had a bottle of booze behind a rock and when he went to get a drink there was a rattlesnake coiled up. The poor fellow thought he was seeing things and ran screeching to camp and they had to put him in a hospital. (Suddenly stops and sniffs the air.) I smell somebody's feet. (A young man sitting next to the girls turns a painful red and tries to push himself through the wall.) Don't you, Beulah?"

First boy (nudging his friend) — "Put on your shoes, Chink, you're attracting the attention of the nobility. Gee, it's fortunate I took my annual bath this morning."

Second boy — "After this I'm going to carry a piece of cashmere-bouquet soap in my pocket."

Miss H. F. (getting up) — "Oh, come on, let's go to the other side. I'm going to speak to my father and see if this sort of thing can't be stopped." (Both start for the other side of the house.)

First boy (cheerfully) — "Come again, girls; you're always welcome to our little city."

MRS. G. W. DEWEY

Mrs. G. W. Dewey, who with her husband resides in the fertile valley of the Middle Loup, near Gates, is one of Custer county's literary women. Both she and her husband have been pioneers and actively identified with the growth and development of the county.

Mrs. Dewey has been one of the prominent teachers of the county, and probably her teaching extends over a longer period than that of any other person now teaching in Custer county. Public-spirited, she has been in the fore and front of all educational movements and has always been a welcome and interesting contributor to all public-school programs. So prominent has been her participation in county school affairs that her services are still secured for county institutes, summer schools, and educational conventions held in the county.

Her rich imagination, combined with the genius of expression, has enabled her to produce several poems which have received favorable notice and some of which are entitled to be enrolled as classics. Special reference is made to her poem entitled "The Blizzard," which is not only vividly descriptive but also presents a style dramatically weird and fascinating.

THE BLIZZARD

(By Mrs. G. W. Dewey)

There's a threatening calm, and a lowering mist
On the northwest hills, and a thrill of fear
Is running through earth and air and kine,
For the chase of the Great White Bison is near!

No longer the bison shaggy and dark,
Moves like a cloud from mountain to lea,
Gone like his wild bronze master of old,
And only their phantoms we hear and see.

Here they come with thunder of hoofs!
A wild Valkyrie, zenith high,
Their ghostly forms go billowing past,
For the Great White Bison Chase is nigh!

Pressed in the rear by the Arctic wolves
Of the cruel North Wind, past they go,

Stopping for nothing, human or beast,
Bison and wolves are white as snow.

All day they press with flight and moan,
And the settler cowers by his scanty fire,
Or helpless thinks of those in their track,
Or his cowering stock in their wind-lashed byre.

Night falls pallidly, lit by their flight,
Thousands they press and trample by;
Man and beast have surrendered the path,
And the wild White Bison rules earth and sky.

All night long in mad stampede,
Morning dawns and the herd is past,
Feeding in peace in some sky-known mead,
Ghostly fugitives safe at last!

But woe to the living thing that fared Across its path when flight was on;
For the silence of death broods stark and grim
On the hills where the wild, white chase has gone.

COURT HOUSE CORNER STONE

In 1912, when the corner-stone of the present Custer county court house was laid, by a public ceremony held on the court-house lawn, Mrs. Dewey contributed the following poem to the program. The poem is descriptive of the building, the county, and the occasion, and brings into the rhyme and lines every precinct in the county.

CORNER-STONE POEM

(By Mrs. G. W. Dewey)

When Israel's king beneath the orient skies,
Prepared to build a temple to his God,
To Zion's height they brought abundant store
Of costly stones; the Mediterranean's flood
Bore from the land of Hiram, cedars tall
Of Lebanon, and fir on many floats.

"So they prepared timber and stones, the house

Of God to build." The old recorder notes,
Grandly it rose on Mount Moriah's height,
A stately pile without, of costly stone;
Fragrant with cedar carved and o'erlaid with gold,

Within altar and Cherubim in beauty shone,
Yet not in beauty did that temple old
Excel the ancient shrines of Pagan skill,
But in the great truth it shone, avowed,
One God, Jehovah! Israel's message still.
Unity of mankind, oneness of God!

Proclaimed that ancient shrine to every land;

And thus began the upward trend to light,
 Peace, progress, liberty, on every hand.
 To-day we lay upon the blackened site
 Of what was once our pride and honest boast,
 Foundation of the new, that shall proclaim
 Once more our oneness and the gathered host
 From Hayes' to Elk Creek, Sargent clear to Wayne!

Repeat in unison we meet again
 Foundation here to lay of this our house
 Of civic progress, justice, liberty.
 United stands our empire, that this house
 In size and beauty shall show fittingly.
 In wealth and standing, Custer, gracious queen
 Of mid-state counties; may no ruthless hand
 Dissect one member from thy body fair,
 But whole in strength and oneness may we stand.

Zoned by the silver Loups in triple flood, Seamed by green canyons, dark with ash and plum,

Thy tables lay in wide unbroken sweep,
 Thy busy towns with vim and progress hum.
 West Union, Lillian, and Victoria hold
 Upon the north our farthest border line;
 Grant, Loup, Elk Creek, Wood River, Wayne
 Upon our south in constellation shine.
 Hayes, Arnold, Elim, mark our farthest west,
 Douglas Grove, Myrtle, and fair Algernon
 As eastward rolls the planet are the first
 To greet the golden arrows of the sun.
 Cliff, Kilfoil, Triumph, Custer, Broken Bow,
 Lillian, and Garfield, smiling Westerville,
 Delight and Custer, Ansley and Berwyn, too.
 The glorious roll call of our precincts fill.
 And as our fathers on this natal day
 Proclaimed their purpose and confederacy,
 And the foundation laid of unity;
 So in like hope and loyalty may we.
 Long may this edifice, whose corner-stone
 We lay, stand record to our hopes and aim.
 Temple of justice, pride of our commonwealth,
 Unbroken be our boundaries and fame.

A CUSTER COUNTY POET

Tom H. Burlin, or Tommy Burlin, as he was known to the people of Merna, where he spent the last days of his life, was a real Custer county poet. He was the son of Mr. and Mrs. Bradford Burlin. Unfortunately some disease that rendered him helpless fastened itself upon him in early life, so that for years he was not only confined to his room but to his bed as well. Thus he lay, year after year, with ossification of his joints slowly creeping on, so that he had but little use of his limbs.

Without complaint or murmur, he lay upon his couch and communed with the Muses. He was the author of several very popular songs, which received merited recognition and wide sale.

Perhaps the most popular of his songs was the "Little Bohemian Girl," which was published by a St. Louis house and had a very popular run. We also reproduce here a poem written by "Tommy," descriptive of early days in Custer county, which was produced for a special occasion and made a decided hit when read at the old settlers' picnic, at which it was the feature of the program.

LITTLE BOHEMIAN GIRL

Far beyond the deep, blue Danube
 And the castles by the Rhine,
 O'er the snow-clad German mountains,
 Lives that little girl of mine.
 Like its gleam on golden Ophir
 Falls the sunbeam on her hair,
 And her face, like the Madonna,
 Is as pure as it is fair.

CHORUS

Little Bohemian Girl,
 Fair and as bright as a pearl;
 My hope ever lies
 In your smile and your eyes;
 Dear little, sweet little girl,
 Little Bohemian Girl.

From the plains of fair Nebraska,
 In the new land of the west;
 Soon my heart will send its message
 To the one I love the best.
 She will brave the storms of ocean,
 Cross the Danube and the Rhine,
 And will traverse plain and mountain,
 For her heart is bound with mine.

EARLY DAYS IN CUSTER

(Written by Tom H. Burlin, Merna, Nebraska, and read by Mrs. G. O. Joyner at the old settlers' picnic at Broken Bow, August 5, 1903)

Bright shines the sun on Custer's hills,
 Or softly falls the gloaming,
 Where once by all its living rills
 The buffalo herds were roaming.

Still glows the moon, her calcium light
 Falls now on field and meadow;
 The myriad stars are shining bright
 Beside the Queen of Shadow.

But where are all the buffalo now
And where the Texas cattle?
Where fields of grain abundant grow,
Rode cowboys in the saddle.

When ranchers curbed in wild career
Their mustangs' wild vagaries,
And grazed their herds, both far and near
Across the broad prairies.

How changed the face of nature seems,
By field and fences broken;
Almost as if it were in dreams
We hear the old names spoken.

How strange, if now the Seven Bar
Ranged twenty-thousand cattle!
Or Robert Olive's rising star
Waned in a rustler battle!

Or that his blood had been avenged,
The rustlers hanged and burning,
By chance the public mind was changed,
And to the thieves was turning.

Unscared, the elk no longer dwells
Where once he loved to wander
Through brakes and braes and sunny dells;
Its home is here no longer.

No more the deer ungalled lies
The shade of plum brush under.
The antelope no longer flies
Before the mounted hunter.

The canyons deep and silent lie,
But sad indeed their story.
No more the cedars pierce the sky,
That lent them all their glory.

No more the elm tree's spreading shade
Makes glad the weary toiler,
The keen axe at its root has laid,
It fell before the spoiler.

The romance of the former years —
A saddened vein comes o'er us,
And oft as through a mist of tears
The old scenes rise before us.
The spirit of adventure, then,
Spurred all to grand endeavor;
Recurring, thrills our hearts again,
Its memory lasts forever.

SOL. J. COOK

The following poem was written, in Merna, some time in the year 1903, by Sol. J. Cook, who was probably an intimate friend of Tommy Burlin's. No one seems to remember the writer, but his work possesses merit, and we submit it because this especial verse was dedicated to his friend, the late Tommy Burlin, of Merna.

THE POET

(By Sol. J. Cook)

Remote from mercenary throngs,
In childlike faith and love absorb'd,
A spirit wash'd of social wrongs,
And eyes profound with wonder orb'd,

The poet kneels; — his holy shrine,
A Universe. What magic strains
His reverent touch with divine
Skill wakes, descends as summer rains,

On souls that wilt in the world's heat,
Awakening the tender bloom
Of sentiment — that flower sweet,
Which brightens life's else cheerless gloom.

Child of the seeing eye, and hand,
Immers'd in seas of harmonies.
Immensity thy cradle grand,
Thy limits the eternities.

Close-clinging to dear Nature's breast,
Whose lullaby soothes thy repose;
What dreams fold thine enchanted rest?
What mysteries to thee disclose?

Hark! what diffus'd delight doth thrall
Responsive souls! The poet-child,
Midst his sweet dreams, again lets fall
A jewel'd note undefiled,

Of sparkle rare, revealing 'gain
Some hidden mine of Nature's realm,—
A gem for man's eternal gain
Wrought to enrich Love's diadem.

Aye! The world richer grows, when sings
The bard; and tamer grows the beast,
As from his lyre music springs,
All things assume a golden cast.

MRS. MARTHA A. HUNTER

The Blue Book of Nebraska women, edited and compiled by Winona Evans Reeves in 1916, contained the following biographical sketch of Mrs. Martha A. Hunter:

"Martha Angeline Beck Hunter was born on a farm near Walshville, Illinois, in 1858. She is the daughter of Moses and Emily Caroline (Barlow) Beck. Her parents were both of a high type of Christian character. Of Mr. Beck, his pastor said, 'He as fully meets God's description of a good man (Isaiah 33:15-17), as any one I ever knew.' Her mother was the

And ever as you call before the door,
I see thy playmate hasten as of yore;
The golden curls unbonneted, untwined,
The harp strings of the wind.

My arms reach out to gather her again
To their embrace. Hush'd is the melting strain.
I fold them slowly o'er my hungry breast;
Song bird, you know — the rest.

THE GOLDENROD

Hail noble flower! Thy peerless golden glory
Is now emblazoned on Nebraska's crest, —
Fit herald to proclaim her wondrous story,
And like her, monarch of the mighty West.

No mortal hand assisted at thy sowing,
The stars wept tears upon the barren earth;
The dewy clouds knelt down to kiss them,
flowing,
When lo! The travail of thy glorious birth.

And as since, each glowing constellation
Has shared its splendors with thee, Golden Rod,
Has taught thy golden heart, hymns of obla-
tion,
That Heaven's stars breathe to the Triune
God.

In vain, Aeolus and his wind god revel
And scatter devastation through each bower,
The violets wither, roses proud dishevel;
Thy scepter still defies his blighting power,

The pioneer beheld thy pristine beauty,
Where for his dwelling thou bedecked the sod,
Thy very life went out in love and duty
Upon Penates' altar — Golden Rod.

When through old Nature's heart each warm
pulsation
Grows feebler, as the dying year grows old,
Last of all thy race! O'er all the desolation,
Shines out undimmed thy diadem of gold.

Hail, matchless flower! Long may thy golden glory
Blaze out upon Nebraska's giant breast,
Her fair escutcheon glittering with thy story,
And with her, rule fore'er the mighty West.

THE SERVICE FLAG

'Twas twenty centuries ago,
Against the whiteness of the dawn,
There blaz'd a star of meteor glow,
In splendor over Bethlehem's khan.
The service banner of The Lord
In heaven's window was unfurl'd,

And angel hosts awoke the chord
That gave its message to the world.

Then, tyrants trembled for their might,
Then, idols tottered to their doom,
As through the deep of slavery's night
That service flag first pierced the gloom.
The shackles from men's souls were riv'n
Where'er in majesty it shone,
And freedom unto faith was giv'n,
The world's democracy begun.

And proven; when, on Calvary's height,
Where gleamed the wondrous flag outspread,
Was woven round its field of white,
Golgotha's broidery of red.
No greater love than this hath man,
That, for his friend, his life he give,
And in the rear guard, or the van,
He dies; that truth and freedom live.

Down thru the stress of centuries,
Thru conflicts that have mark'd each age.
Thru rise and fall of dynasties,
O'er unknown depths, thru tempest's rage,
Have come these colors consecrate.
The star of hope from out the skies,
The white of faith, commensurate
With red of love's great sacrifice.

The pilgrims brought them o'er the sea;
The patriot wore them in his heart;
And when the arm of tyranny
Was raised to wield the crushing dart,
Old Glory to the world was born;
The red and white, her glist'ning bars,
And blue, from heaven's dome was torn,
To hold forever fixed, her stars.

God! how it pulsates to the breeze!
This flag infused with a soul.
Its song rings over farthest seas,
And echoes back from pole to pole.
It shouts, it calls, it thrills and swells
With tidings of great joy, it gives;
Like pealing of ten thousand bells.
Old Glory! O! it lives! it lives!

For two score and one hundred years,
It waves above a nation free,
And, in its sacred covenant, clears
The way to earth's democracy.
When mad with lust of pride and pow'r,
A tyrant hurls war's ruthless sway,
And nations cry in that dark hour
America! America!

Old Glory answers to her need,
From East and West; from South and North,
Where'er her glitt'ring stars shall lead,
Her loyal sons spring bravely forth.

They kiss the hem of that dear flag,
As kneeling, did of old, each sire;
And vow no despot's hands shall drag
Its honor thru dishonor's mire.

Then from each window, streaming bright,
'Neath lowly eave, and palace grille,
Shines out a banner thru the night,
Like beacon fires upon each hill,
The flag that points the tyrant's shame;
Its white, that scorns the coward's dross,
The holocaustal red, its frame;
Its star, enhallowed by the cross.

O lads, while at the Vesper hour
You mark "attention!" as you stand,
And music throbs, as proud hands low'r
The starry emblem of our land,
With misting eyes, your oath renew
To keep it without spot or stain, —
We raise this service flag to you,
Till you bring victory home again.

Hats off! and lift it to the skies,
This banner of the heart and home;
This pledge of service that our boys
Swear by Old Glory's halidom,
*"That flag shall strive for the oppressed,
Until all peoples shall be free,
Until all nations call her blest."*
Old Glory! God be praised for thee!

MRS. SABINA PENROD

Mrs. Sabina Penrod will be remembered as being a delightful, cultured woman. She and her husband cast their lots in the Yucahill district of western Custer county, shortly after the opening of the country under the Kinkaid Act, and there they lived for several years. She was a writer of unusual ability, and sold many poems to eastern magazines. Some of her most famous ones were "Nature" and "Life's Pathway." We submit here a poem inspired by the beginning of a "Perfect Day" in the Sand Hills.

DAWN IN THE CUSTER COUNTY HILLS

(Copyright 1916)

By Sabina Penrod

Oh! the glories of the morning!
When the day begins to dawn,
When the first faint streaks of sunlight
Lightly fall across the lawn,
From a night of peaceful slumber,
Restful sleep, I gladly rise

And behold with admiration,
Radiant beauties of the skies.

How I wish I were a painter;
I would paint a picture fair,
Of a rare and beauteous landscape,
'Neath a balmy-hazy air;
But I couldn't paint the beauties
Of this life among the hills;
There is something in its freedom
That my soul with rapture fills.

In the days of early summer,
When wild roses are in bloom,
When the calls of grouse and chicken
Echo with a constant boom,
I love to stand at day-break
And look out across the hills,
As the first rays of the sunrise
With their light all nature thrills.

The shadowy hills and valleys
And the smell of dewy grass,
Mingled with the scent of roses,
Leave a joy that will not pass;
And I know where'er I travel,
I these lovely scenes will see,
That, where'er my habitation,
They will always dwell with me.

I will always sense their sweetness,
In my heart these sounds will ring
When the bees begin their humming
And the birds begin to sing;
I will see the shadowy vapors
Floating over vale and hill;
I will see the wild birds bathing,
Hear their early morning trill.

I will see the lowing cattle,
Slowly moving as they graze,
Hear the hoof-beats of the horses
As I see the sun's first rays.
I will see the beauteous colors
Of the flowers and sky and sod,
Feel the joy of ever-living
Close to nature and to God.

GASTON'S RHYMES FOR PADDING

W. L. Gaston, the author of the lines below, in no way poses as a poet. He began his career in the field of journalism and won his first honors over the nom de plume of "Billy Rip-ton." He has done a good deal of commercial writing and a year or so ago engaged in story writing for a journal in the eastern part of the state, over the nom de plume of "Frank French." He is the author of "Cheliel's Messiah," "The Window in Tom," and "California Jubilee History." He has been ten years in Custer county. In the winter of 1915 he removed with his family to Wayne, where he lived for one year. On his return to Custer county he wrote the following poem, entitled "Home in Broken Bow." Several of his rhymes have been set to music and published in several of the modern song-books. One is reproduced here, for padding out the column.

HOME IN BROKEN BOW

I've searched full half the world, or so,
But find no place like Broken Bow.
I've crossed the plains, where some love best,
And climbed the hills to sunset west.
I know the east, the north and south,
From border lakes to river's mouth;
It matters little where I go,
My heart goes back to Broken Bow.

I've stood beneath the domes of state,
On carpets of the rich and great;
I've walked with prophets, sat with kings,
And heard the song the siren sings,
Where zealots pray and sinners sin.
But give me common folks and kin
And let me have, while here below,
A home-like home in Broken Bow.

I know the far-famed mines that hold
The thrice rich hoards of yellow gold.
I've seen the corn, like magic, grow,
In deep soil'd vales where rivers flow.
I've plucked the fruits and sipp'd the wines
Of fine old trees and older vines.
It matters little where I go,
I claim my home in Broken Bow.

I love the dells and hill-land slopes,
Where lazy sunshine lags and mopes;
The alder-shaded homes and lawns,
Where hustle breeds and plenty spawns.
Men sing the songs of war or trade,
Yet only home-like homes are made.
It matters little where I go,
My heart goes back to Broken Bow.

WALKING THE WATERS

(By W. L. Gaston)

Jesus is walking the waters,
Is walking in pow'r and might,
To every boat on sea afloat,
He's walking the waters to-night.

CHORUS:

He's walking the waters to-night,
He's walking in power and might,
Over the waves of dark Galilee,
He's walking the waters to me.

Over the mad waves, deep rolling,
He walks the dark Galilee;
Thro' wind and wave, He comes to save;
He's walking the waters to me.

Thro' sin and doubt's stormy billows
He's bringing both hope and cheer.
By every barque when night is dark,
Master and King is walking near.

Over the dark sea of death
He's walking the waves before,
O'er silent tides, His footstep glides,
Till ev'ry boat shall reach the shore.

No successful pioneer will despise the day of small things. To commence small and to grow, is nature's way. The agricultural and industrial importance of Custer county to-day has been developed from what the easterner would have called "laughing stock" in the days of the '70s. It has been experiment after experiment, many of which were costly and heroic. It has been a struggle with but little to struggle with. Naught but indomitable courage and ceaseless effort could have wrought the miracle. The man who saw Custer county in 1874 and has had his back turned ever since, can look again to-day and his first word would be the one last in the sentence above — a miracle.

YEARS, TWO SCORE AND ONE

Two score and one years have passed since the first settlers started the plow to fashion the field, and the spade and axe to fashion the dwelling. Then it was virgin prairie, altogether fieldless, and for the most part houseless. The first thing to do was to locate — select the homestead. The level land was first selected, river bottoms — farms with river fronts. After the claim was selected then came the house. Something to live in, as well as a place to live on, must be provided. If the settler had a covered wagon, he must live in that until he could build or dig a house. The homestead was the first thing, but the house must be second. If the place is on the river or one of the timbered creeks he will build a log house. If he has a breaking plow and a team to haul a few logs from the timber he will erect a soddy. If he is not rich in these commodities he will rustle a spade, dig a dugout and call it "Home, sweet Home." The dugout of that day was the cheapest, and perhaps the most plebian, of the primitive habitations. The log house, though held down with a sod roof, was the abode of aristocracy. The sod house was middle-class and commonplace, yet many of those sod houses were comfortable and cozy. They were warm in winter and cool in summer, and if the roof were thick enough to keep out the rain they were not half bad. Generally the walls were plastered with hill clay or a native stucco, which smoothed up better than the clay and most nearly resembled plaster. This, with a coat of whitewash, if lime could be had, made both interior finish and decoration. Some of the first houses were without floor, other than the native earth. One settler, in reciting the hardships of the early day, claimed that the soil was so rich that they had to cut the grass off from the floor of the sod house twice every week, so they could find the baby.

In such houses as these the best citizens of Custer county began their married life, and especially in such houses as these did they launch upon their Custer county careers. In this kind of house many of the present generation, now in active life, were born. Just such humble dwellings, located on a quarter-section of unplowed prairie, have since developed into the modern homes and improved farms that are the pride of the county to-day. That fine, white house, with modern light and water equipment; that big red barn; that flock of granaries, sheds, and cribs, together with the hog house, the hen house, the icehouse, and the garage; those productive fields, green in growing time, and gold in harvest time, with acres of waving alfalfa—all have come from that humble beginning.

HORSE AND COW PULL THE PLOW

If the early settler had a team, he was not only fortunate, but also the exception. The most of the settlers were teamless. Some had a yoke of oxen, some were provided with only one horse, and in several instances the horse and cow were harnessed together and made up a sort of complex team. Some men had neither horse nor ox, cow nor plow. With just their two hands, alone and unaided, they commenced the battle of life, and almost a phenomenal success has rewarded their efforts. They began with nothing, and to-day are the possessors of broad acres, equipped with modern houses, and have to their credit in the bank a competency for old age.

There is no country in the world that affords better advantages to the indomitable spirit who possesses youth, strength, and energy; no place will more liberally reward labor than the hills and valleys of old Custer county. Nowhere within its borders can you find a man, who has spent here a score of years, that is not singing the county's praises. In fact, most of the old settlers will very cheerfully get up in the night to brag on the resources of Custer county. It has been, from the earliest day, the poor man's opportunity, the young man's hope, and the old man's haven. Its invigorating climate, its altitude, with its almost exclusive outdoor occupation, have made it a healthful land. There are no native diseases. Good health has always been universal. The old saying that the early settlers had to kill a man to start a grave-yard, might be true of almost every community in Custer county. In the starting days, when everything was new and the people young, doctors were hardly needed, and the first who came to the county would have starved to death if they had depended alone upon poor health and sickness.

The first crop of the first settlers, in which the soil of Custer county had first opportunity to demonstrate its fertility, was sod corn; the second was rye. The settlers of the first year, and they generally came in the spring time, turned over a few acres of sod, planted it to corn, and spent the rest of the time constructing a habitation, and prospecting for water. Some settlers planted beans along with the corn and thus, in the fall, they had demonstrated that the soil was adapted to both corn and beans. In the New Helena country rye was the first fall crop and, nourished by the new, strong soil, made an astonishing yield. We have no record of any oats being sowed until the spring of 1877. From that time forth oats have been one of the standard crops. Spring wheat made its advent about the same time, or perhaps a little before the oat crop. Custer is to-day one of the wheat-producing counties of the state.

The county commenced its wheat industry like most new counties, with spring wheat. The soil was new and rich, and the yield was big. The price, however, prevented rapid accumulation of wealth by the wheat-raisers. Fall wheat came later, when weeds and chinch bugs began to challenge the spring wheat, and fall wheat has made a record during the years, the truth of which is expressed in the closing sentence of the above paragraph.

CORN WEARS THE TASSEL AND IS KING

The great outstanding crop of this county has always been corn. Several years it has led all counties in the state in its production. All varieties will mature in good seasons, but early varieties are most regular in production. The sod corn of the first settlers was a surprise to the men who planted it. If the crop was not eaten up or destroyed by the ranchmen's cattle, the forage was fine fodder and the yield sometimes reached twenty-five bushels an acre. Since the cultivation of land and better methods in farming have come into vogue, Custer has been rated as a corn county. In these days of greater production, every stalk wears a tassel, and every ear is wrapped in silk. When the stalk puts off its summer robes of green and dons the autumn tan, the ears turn to gold and droop modestly at the praise of their own magnificence.

The foregoing sentiment may be rated as stilted praise, but Custer corn deserves all that can be said of it. The real story of the corn, however, is told in a few quotations of figures which go to make up dry statistics. Statistics of any early day are lacking. If records were kept, the state department of agriculture made no reports. The following figures are given only to show what the county has done in the banner years of the past. The years of 1905 and 1906 seem to be the banner corn years of all the forty-three years that are passed. In 1905 Custer ranked second in the state in the production of corn. The total yield that year was 7,681,863 bushels. That was a great corn crop. The average per acre throughout the county was 36.5 bushels an acre. The average in the state that year was 37.65 bushels an acre. It was the great acreage in Custer that boosted it to second place in the state. The next year was an even better year for corn in Custer. The acreage increased and, although the average yield per acre was just one bushel less than in the previous year, the total crop came to the high figure of 8,251,158. This enormous yield put Custer into first place in the state. In this year the average yield per acre in the state was 35.28 bushels per acre, while in Custer the average yield was 35.5 bushels per acre, which put the county above the average in yield.

The last few years have not been so favorable for corn and, like with alfalfa, the acreage has been decreased in favor of wheat. This year's crop (1918) is estimated at 5,000,000 bushels, in round numbers.

The great bulk of the corn crop, and likewise the great bulk of the hay crop, is fed at home, less than five per cent. of the corn raised being shipped out of the county. It is fed to cattle and hogs and thus made to bring an added profit.

A GREAT ALFALFA COUNTY

The importance of alfalfa as a forage crop cannot be overestimated. Alfalfa is one of the standard products, and the one which has done more to bring profit to the farmer than almost any other. The deep-green fields in evidence everywhere, are the gold mines of the county. If the "porker" has been a mortgage-payer, he has had to stuff himself with alfalfa in order to play the role. The dry times reduce the crop, but it is never an entire failure. The prices have been good at all times—in fact, so good that it is safe to say that no crop has been more profitable than Custer county alfalfa. If corn is king, alfalfa is queen, and together they fatten a royal family of beef and pork. Farmers depend on alfalfa, and raise it with less expense than any other forage. The climate and soil of the county have always contributed the natural elements to make it the hay crop of the middle part of the state.

CUSTER STANDS AT THE HEAD, DRESSED IN GREEN

It took the farmers a long time to realize fully the importance of the alfalfa crop. For of inducing several farmers in different parts of the county to seed a few acres to the new crop for which so much was claimed. Judge Lavender was perhaps the first man in the vicinity of Broken Bow to try a small field, for hay and pasture purposes. The production of alfalfa was very limited for years. Seed was hard to obtain and the price was almost prohibitive. Alfalfa, like everything else, had to buck its way up hill against a field of opposition. As the years went by, it made progress and to-day it has its place and fame established. It ranks in importance with corn and is absolutely indispensable to successful stock-raising.

A CUSTER COUNTY ALFALFA FIELD

years it was raised only in small patches, and its value as hog pasture, and as winter hay for calves, milch cows, and stock cattle was hardly known. The first record of alfalfa in the county harks back to 1882, when Virgil Allen, on the South Loup, sent to Sacramento, California, and procured enough seed to experiment with four or five acres. The experiment was successful, and year by year he added to the field until he had in cultivation broad acres of this imported meat and milk producing hay. Very early in the '80s several experiments were tried in the Middle Loup river valley, and these likewise proved successful. In 1886 Robert Hunter began the agitation for more alfalfa and was the means

In the years 1907 and 1908 the acreage was largely increased and in the year 1909 the county came into prominence as an alfalfa producing county. The agricultural reports of this year rated Custer as the second county in the state in the production of alfalfa. In 1910 it again forged ahead and went to the top, with 48,419 acres to its credit. This seems to have been the high year. For the next two years the acreage decreased at the rate of one thousand acres a year. In 1913 the acreage is reported as nearly 5,000 less than in 1910. This year, 1918, the county stands in third place. The hard, freezing winters of later years and the pressure used to increase the wheat production for war purposes, have caused the decrease noted. In spite of decreased production and increases of other crops, the average value of the Custer county alfalfa crop for the last eight years has been over $1,600,000.00.

In the 1918 Nebraska State Fair Custer county alfalfa was awarded eight different premiums.

CUSTER COUNTY HEADS THE LIST

The following extract from a 1917 issue of the Custer County Chief shows how the race for supremacy as a corn producer, with conditions represented by eighty-eight out of a possible one hundred points. Custer county is also in the high rank for oats, with ninety-four points, several counties having the same average. The other counties which are of equal rank in this respect are Red Willow, Buffalo, Hall, and Sherman. Custer county again touches the high mark in the wheat average, it being twenty-seven bushels per acre, with Red Willow county, another wes-county ranks in agricultural products for the year 1917:

"The bureau of labor has, during the past week, completed the work of compiling the crop conditions of Nebraska by counties, and the report presents some surprises. It was only a few years ago when the eastern part of Nebraska was far ahead of other portions of the state, but things have changed, and this year, to see the finest crops in Nebraska the people have to come to Custer county. In speaking of the report of the bureau of labor, the Lincoln News, of July 31st has the following:

"Custer county kicks the high places in the tern county, a close second, with twenty-five bushels per acre."

AN EARLY LIVE-STOCK ASSOCIATION

The first live-stock association of which there is any record was organized in 1878. As the story goes, it was time for the spring roundup of 1878, and a meeting to organize for that purpose was called at Custer, which at that time meant the Young ranch and which was also the county seat, for the purpose of organizing for the roundup and for the added purpose of organizing a live-stock association. There were several large ranches represented, by owners and employees. The meeting had all the characteristics of the early day and western stage. The organization for the roundup was effected by electing Phil Dufrand as captain. With the roundup business out of the way, they proceeded to organize the Custer County Live Stock Association, the object of which was to promote the cattle industry and protect herds from cattle rustlers and those engaged in slaughtering "slow elk." The officers of the organization were: President, I. P. Olive; secretary, Harry Windsor; treasurer, Jacob Boblits; inspector, J. D. Haskell.

Most of the farms are conducted with a view to handling stock. The abundant grasses of the pasture land are strong and nutritious, and cattle in pastures fatten rapidly. The forage crops of the cultivated lands are sufficient to winter all the cattle that the grass lands will summer. This makes Custer county farming very profitable.

The passing of the great herds that roamed over the country in an early day, when everything was ranch and range, has not lessened the number of cattle. If there are no longer

THE PALE-FACE CATTLE HAVE TAKEN CUSTER COUNTY

A committee, consisting of I. P. Olive, S. C. Stuckey, and E. J. Boblits, to draft a set of by-laws and set a constitution, was formed. This was the first cattle or stock association of any kind ever formed in the county. Their roll of membership has not been preserved, nor are minutes of any subsequent meeting obtainable.

LIVE-STOCK RAISING

That much-talked-of, invisible line which divides the grazing from the corn belt runs through Custer county. That makes it incline to both agricultural and grazing pursuits, a combination of farming and stock-raising.

herds of 5,000 head, seventy-five herds of one hundred head each have come to take their place. On the smaller holdings, into which the big ranges have been broken, are better cattle and more to the square mile than in the days when everything was cattle.

CATTLE GRADES IMPROVED

On the small farm, where the herd is smaller, more care is given to stock and great pains is taken in quality selection for breeding purposes. As a result, cattle are of better grade than formerly. The scrub male no longer heads the herd. In its place is found the king of models, bred in the long lineage of purple blood. Fine models of blooded stock are consequently found on every farm.

Virgil Allen claims the distinction of importing the first blood in the cattle line. His fancy early ran to shorthorns. By importing thoroughbreds he set for his neighbors a fine example in herd improvement. The influence of the example has not been lost. Everywhere cattle have been improved until it is safe to say that no better cattle are found anywhere in the state. The county is full of shorthorns and white-faces, while Polled Angus and other varieties of polled cattle are not uncommon.

The dairy interests have become enormous and milking strains of Durhams bred for the purpose, the famous milk-producing Holsteins, and the cream-producing Jerseys have come to stay. These milkers are in the dairies and in the one-cow barns of the town people.

The cattle interests of the county are well developed and profitable.

HOGS, BLACK AND RED

When the early settlers came, some of them brought a few hogs with them. It has been, however, almost impossible to ascertain who brought the first hog into the county. The early hog served his purpose. He had to pioneer and take his chances on short rations, the same as the other stock. The hog was cheap, but the great incentive to raise him spelled lard and bacon.

The first breeder of a pure strain of hogs, of whom there is any record, was J. L. H. Knight, of Lee's Park, who as early as 1885, while only a youngster himself, paid thirty dollars for a pure-blood Poland-China gilt. The offspring of this gilt in after years put good hogs on every farm in the eastern part of the country.

To-day hog raising is one of the great industries of the county. The two and three cents per pound price of the early day has improved as much as the breeds. At the time this page is being written, hogs are worth on the market, in any town in the county, eighteen cents a pound. The stock has developed, by select breeding, from the hazel-splitters of pioneer times to the square-blocked types of Poland-Chinas and Duroc-Jerseys which are found on every farm to-day. These two breeds predominate. They have been found most profitable. They show up best in the pork barrel and in the bank account.

The agricultural reports of the state credit Custer in 1917 with nearly sixty thousand hogs. They constitute one of the greatest assets of the county. The hog crop of 1918 is far in excess of 1917.

THE PORKER PAYS THE MORTGAGE

F. M. Currie wrote the following article over seventeen years ago:

Custer county is in the geographical center of the state of Nebraska. Its elevation is about 2,000 feet above the level of the sea, and the average rainfall is not far from twenty inches per annum. It produces a large variety of nutritious grasses, and is well watered. Although streams are not very abundant, water is to be found everywhere, in inexhaustible quantities, at various depths, ranging from a few feet in the valleys to four hundred feet on the highest table lands. It was the home of countless numbers of buffalo before the advent of the cowboy. With the coming of the cattlemen, the buffalo were driven out, and it became a veritable paradise for the large cattle ranch. After it was opened for settlement, the homesteader claimed its broad and fertile prairies as his right under the law, and the cattle rancher was obliged to vacate. But the number of cattle was increased instead of diminished. In place of a few men owning hundreds and even thousands of head, a large number of men became the owners of small herds, and the total number was increased. Much of the land was broken out, and general agriculture became the occupation of the early settlers. Then it was that a more intensive agriculture became necessary, and the farmers turned their attention to the poor man's friend—the hog. The hog is essentially the friend of the poor farmer, because it requires very little capital with which to make a start. The number of hogs in Custer county has increased very rapidly, until nearly every farmer owns from ten to four or five hundred head. Of course the keeping of hogs necessitates the growing of corn. With the exception of two years—those of 1890 and 1894—Custer county has produced a sufficient quantity of corn to mature most of the hogs raised within her borders. The high altitude, the pure atmosphere, and excellent drainage of Custer county make it exceedingly healthful for both human beings and animals. The animal diseases which are so common in most parts of the United States, are almost unknown in Custer county. In recent years there has been a slight loss from disease known (in the common parlance) as hog cholera, but Custer county has never had an epidemic which carried off whole herds of swine.

The farmer, unlike his predecessor, the cattle man, usually markets his cattle in a finished condition. The cattle man of the olden times gathered his beeves from the plains and shipped them in large numbers to the market in Chicago or Kansas City. Those that were fat enough to kill were sold to the butcher; those that were not finished were sold to the feeders in Iowa, eastern Nebraska, eastern Kansas, and Illinois. The farmer and cattle man of the present day feeds his own cattle and ships them, ready for the block, to the market in Omaha, which is distant about 180 miles. The cost of transportation is about thirty-eight dollars per carload. In preparing his beef, the farmer finds a large saving in the use of the hog. The cattle are put in yards and fed all the grain they will eat; at the same time hogs are put in the yard to follow the cattle, cleaning up the waste. The cattle usually absorb about one-half of the nutritive value of the corn that passes through their stomachs, the other half would be wasted were it not for the hogs which follow the cattle, and the waste is thus transformed into pork. The hog and cattle industry go together and furnish a considerable profit to the farmer. In good seasons, the average farmer on 160 acres of good land is able to turn off a carload of cattle and a carload of hogs each year. The cattle are pastured on the grazing lands of the county. They are fed in winter on the rough feed produced on the farming land, consisting of cornstalks, straw, millet, etc. The hogs are raised usually during the summer season, and in autumn the two are placed together; the farmer thus secures the entire profit accruing to the man who raises the cattle, who raises the hogs and who feeds them. Poland-China is by far the most popular breed of hogs, while Jersey Red, Chester Whites, and Berkshires are very abundant.

In some of the valleys farmers have turned their attention to the raising of alfalfa. They are thus enabled to raise their young swine at a very low cost, and are only put into the yard to be finished. In 1887 Custer county shipped 32,640 hogs from the various stations of the railways within her borders. Allowing for a reasonable number that were shipped from stations outside of Custer county, but contiguous thereto, it is safe to estimate the number of hogs at 50,000. The future of the swine industry of Custer county is very promising, and it will always be one of the most important industries of the county.

THE PURPLE BLOOD OF HIGH BREEDING

The low grade of poorly selected stock with which the early settlers had to begin operations in the county was, of course, a tremendous handicap to stock-breeding operations. But it has been overcome, and the high-grade, pure strain in every department of live-stock breeding marks a commendable progress. Cattle, hogs, horses, sheep, have been bred for the last twenty years on the lines of best selection, and the fine-stock breeders of the county to-day, with their products, constitute one of our proudest assets. The following are some of our breeders who are making Custer county fine stock famous throughout the state:

Over in the Comstock region, Charles Nielhorn is producing Poland-China hogs and red polled cattle. He is making fine progress and has developed both species to high-class types.

J. A. Kellenbarger, west of Merna, has some very fine specimen of Durhams. Joe has been in the business for several years and is, first, a good selector of type, and then, a good feeder, both of which characteristics are necessary in fine stock-raising.

John Dietz, northwest of Broken Bow, is one of the progressive farmers of the community. He is perfecting a fine line of red polled cattle.

Benger & Son, of Callaway, are in the ring with classy white-faces, molded on long-lineage patterns and well marked and classic in color.

Sam Waddington, in Ortello valley, has been breeding white-faced Herefords for the last thirty years, and it would be hard to find a better marked, more evenly molded herd than his to-day.

H. C. Grabert & Son are hog breeders who are attracting attention in the region between Broken Bow and Westerville. They have pens full of the big rangy types of Duroc-Jerseys.

Lon Ash, north of Broken Bow, has already established a reputation as a breeder of Poland-China hogs. He has made a crowning success and has very materially boosted the hog production of Custer county by contributing classy herd-heads to the community in which he is operating.

South of Broken Bow, the Miller Sons, continuing the breeding operations of the late Benjamin Miller, are producing Poland-Chinas of pure strain and acme style.

Teddy Scott, two miles from Broken Bow, is a young, progressive farmer who is making his mark in the Poland-China world. He has scarcely become an extensive breeder, but he has a foundation of fine selects and has already produced some types that might be envied by an older breeder.

John Amsberry, down in the region of Mason City, breeds black Polled-Angus cattle that are blocky types of beef and profitable farm cattle. John and his son are veterans in the cattle business and deserve well the reputation they have established.

Charles Wright, who has a good farm on the Muddy, is in the Jersey cattle business. He breeds the fawn-colored milkers and has some of the finest types of dairy and town Jerseys the country produces.

Bill Tenant and Joe Sittler are two other fine-stock breeders dealing in Jerseys and contributing to the cream and butter supply.

For years Dr. Brenizer has been one of the shorthorn producers and one of the county's most ardent advocates of selected blood. He has contributed as premiums many of the best Durham males ever bred in the west. Custer county owes much to Dr. Brenizer.

Zachary & Sons, substantial and progressive farmers of the West table, have given their attention to the high types of draft horses and are very successful home breeders. They have a line of home-grown Percherons that would be a credit to most any county.

George Stoffer, three miles north of Merna, likewise has given much attention to horse-breeding. Years ago he made purchases of classy Percherons, both stallions and mares, and to-day has produced the most magnificent types.

Cole Brothers, two miles east of Broken Bow, are quite extensive breeders of Shetland and Welch ponies.

Ivan L. Leech, a progressive young farmer in the Westerville country, is turning attention to blooded strains in cattle and hogs, inclining to the Durocs and the Durhams.

Charles Mytton, of Ansley, is an extensive breeder of Duroc-Jerseys and has reached a place where his annual sales attract attention over the central part of the state.

In the Ansley district, B. J. Tierney is a very extensive breeder of shorthorn cattle and has established a reputation second to none in the middle part of the state. His productions head herds all over the county.

K. F. Dietsch is a new-comer who brought with him the best blood to be found in the northeast corner of the state. He has purchased a farm north of Broken Bow and named it Cedar Lawn Stock Farm.

H. E. Pressey, of Oconto, is an established breeder of Duroc-Jersey hogs. He has been long in the business and has made a very creditable showing. He has on his stock farm everything that makes of breeding a profitable occupation.

SHEEP IN THE WILD AND WOOLY COUNTRY

If Custer county was ever "wild and wooly," the wool was not furnished in any great quantities by home-grown sheep. If it was a Custer county Mary who had a little lamb with fleece as white as snow, it was before Mary moved west. There have been a few sheep in the county all of the time since the winter of 1875, but only a few. There are a few good-sized flocks in different parts of the county to-day, but Custer has never been rated as a sheep county. In the days of cattle, conditions were the same here as in all range countries, and more or less antagonism has always existed between sheepmen and cattlemen. The early cattlemen of Custer coun-storms have been natural enemies of the flock, yet natural conditions have not been unfavorable to the mutton industry.

In Butcher's history there is a picture of a splendid flock of sheep, marked "Sheep Industry in Lee's Park, in 1887," which is reproduced here. In 1882 the Haumont brothers, Jules and Ed., wintered sheep on the French table. In 1881 the Finlen brothers, Charles, Mike, and Tom, came from Streator, Illinois, and settled on the South Loup. They brought ty did not encourage the sheepmen. If one slipped into the country there was no reception committees appointed to extend the glad hand and say to him, "Welcome, welcome to our prairies. Turn your sheep loose and let them graze at their own sweet will." This was a social function that the cattlemen, not given to formalities, grossly neglected. They acted as if they never cared whether there were any sheep in the country or not. Sheep came, however, and sheep have stayed, and sheep are here to-day. Sheep-killing dogs, coyotes, and into the country 1,000 sheep. They did not stay in the sheep business very long but merged into the cattle business as soon as possible. Pres Richardson started a sheep industry on his ranch north of Broken Bow and was very successful as long as he stayed on the ranch himself.

In 1910 Custer county had but 3,901 sheep. In the last report, given in 1917, Custer has 2,884, which is a decrease in the last seven years.

Judge John Reese is now and has been for a number of years the prominent sheep man of the county. His ranch is about nine miles southwest of Broken Bow. The Judge has made a success of sheep raising.

A CITY MAN MAKES GOOD

An instance that illustrates how the rich soil of Custer county responds to energy and management, is related by James Pierce, and this is the personal experience and accomplish-good boys and two good girls, all of whom believed, with Benjamin Franklin, that "He who by the plough would thrive, himself must either hold or drive." Improving on this adage, we have both held and driven the most of the time. The house is on the old homestead, and is one of the four frame houses owned by the family. There are also two good sod-houses and one small building owned by an invalid son, who makes his home with us on the old homestead. One son settled in Valley county. The rest are all near Somerford postoffice,

LIVE STOCK ON FARM OF GEORGE CHIPPES, NORTHEAST OF MASON CITY

ment of a man, city-bred and born, who, together with his family, has conquered the Custer prairie and made toil profitable and land productive. He says:

In the spring of 1880 we moved to Custer county, Nebraska, where we have since made our home. Having no experience in farming, except such as was to be obtained on salt water and on the paved streets of a city, I was not very successful at the new business and brought but little to Nebraska in the way of capital. A part of what we did bring was lost in the hard winter of 1880 and 1881. We brought with us, however, a family of six where together we own seven farms, containing in all 1,720 acres. Besides the improvements of all kinds, in the way of barns, hog houses, etc., 480 acres have been bought by earnings of the old homestead. Besides this we have had a comfortable living, without crowding other people.

The farms are all well stocked with horses, cattle, and hogs. Most of the land is fenced and cross-fenced, with yards for different kinds of stock. Roughly estimated, I should say that the family had last year 10,000 bushels of oats, 12,000 bushels of corn, and perhaps enough of other grain to make up 25,000 bushels altogether. One piece of land, bought by a son seven years ago, has never failed to produce enough each year to more than pay the purchasing price. Some years, last year for example, the crop brought more than twice what the land cost.

When we took the land in 1880 there was no wood on it, not enough for a riding switch. Now, if we want a load of fence posts, or several loads, we can cut them. Apple trees have been bearing for many years. All this with our own labor. What man has done, man may do. Stand up for Nebraska! There is room for many more here.

The above statement was written in 1904. The remarkable showing made up until that time has continued since in the same ratio. The writer has since moved to that greater country where all homesteads are river fronts. His sons and daughters are still here and are numbered among our best citizens.

A SAMPLE OF CUSTER COUNTY THRIFT

Anton Smock, with his wife and a three-months-old babe, landed in Custer county in April, 1886, and settled on a quarter-section of land near Oconto. To commence the operation of farming he had a yoke of oxen, a breaking plow, and a stone-boat sled. He had one cow and a calf. The above invoiced all his stock and implements. He had never had hold of a plow-handle in his life. His wife was city-bred. He says they did not make much of a success the first few years. He encountered dry years, hail storms, and all the drawbacks and hindrances that the law allows, so that when he got through the memorable hard year of 1894, he had but little more than the amount with which he started. He says he had learned, however, that milking cows and raising hogs was the most profitable thing he could do, and he made up his mind that he would stick to that.

Ten years later he owned and paid taxes on 1,400 acres of good Custer county land, of which 300 acres were under cultivation and the balance in pasture or hay land, the whole farm fenced and cross-fenced, and equipped with good buildings, ninety head of stock-cattle, twelve head of horses, 100 head of hogs, and thirty milch cows. In addition to stock and improvements, he had fine sheds, filled with all kinds of farming implements. In relating his experience, he says: "My wife and I worked hard, but we did too much work with our hands and not enough with our heads." He loudly praises Custer county and declares that good soil, favorable weather, helped out with a little hustle, is the Custer county way of spelling success.

CUSTER COUNTY AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY

One of the most important organizations in the county is the Custer County Agricultural Society. It has done much toward the development of the county and is an institution to which Custer county people point with no little degree of pride. The large scope of territory from which the annual fair draws, makes it an attraction that brings to Broken Bow an immense concourse of people every fall. It has gained the well earned reputation of being one of the very best fairs in the state.

In the summer of 1881 a little band of homesteaders met at the town of Westerville and organized what was known as the Custer County Agricultural Society. The organizers were C. S. Elison, S. C. Beebe, George O. Waters, A. W. Squires, D. M. Amsberry, R. C. Talbot, J. H. Westervelt, J. L. H. Knight, F. D. Miller, John Welsh, Thomas Blowers, Edgar Varney, Martin Gering, C. T. Crawford, and B. E. Lamphear. The first officers were: C. S. Elison, president; George O. Waters, vice-president; S. C. Beebe, secretary; and C. T. Crawford, treasurer. The first fair was held the latter part of August of the same year, and while it was a primitive one, yet it was a great event for a new county, and the attendance included every homesteader within a radius of a good many miles. The attractions were limited, horse-racing being the main feature, while a pulling match, between Frank Doty, of Lillian, and H. Weakling, of Berwyn, was an important event. The exhibits were, of course, light, but nevertheless the display of corn, wheat, and oats was far better than one would expect in a country that was but sparsely populated. The pumpkin and melon show at this fair was something marvelous.

Another fair was held at Westerville in the fall of 1882. The following year Broken Bow had gained sufficient prominence to become a rival of Westerville, and divided honors with her by the fair being held three days at each place.

The first fair held in Broken Bow occurred about the middle of September, 1883, shortly after the Westerville fair. It was a great event. The grounds were located where the present court house stands, and the race course circled around a couple of blocks, where exciting races took place. It is hardly necessary to add that in those days, with the population made up largely of young men and with the sturdy cowboy element predominating, that favorite horses were backed with plenty of money and plenty of nerve. At both the Westerville and Broken Bow fairs that year a leading attraction was the walking of the tight-rope by Eli Armstrong, who was later sheriff of Custer county. Broncho-riding was a great attraction, and the cowboy who could rope, bridle, saddle, and mount a wild horse, unaided, and ride to a given point first, was sure of a good purse.

In 1884 the fairs were again held at Broken Bow and Westerville, during September and October, under the direction of the same society, which met at Westerville and voted the exclusive rights to a fair at Broken Bow. Shortly after this the society was incorporated under the laws of the state, its official title being the Custer County Agricultural Society and Live Stock Exchange. Forty acres of land were purchased, a mile east of Broken Bow, early in 1885, and permanent quarters were established. Suitable buildings were erected and a splendid half-mile track was made. The fair has been held regularly every year and has been constantly enlarged from its small beginning, with only a few dollars offered as premiums, until its premiums and purses have, during the past few years, reached $3,500, while its crowds come from fifty miles in every direction. Its list of life-members is well up in the hundreds and it is, without doubt, one of the most progressive agricultural societies in Nebraska. Through the efforts of the agricultural society, Custer county captured the gold medal offered by the state fair for the county exhibit which could take three successive first prizes. These prizes were won in 1888, 1889, and 1890, and this medal is prized very highly, as an everlasting monument to the agricultural resources of the great "State of Custer." A county that can win such a prize in three successive contests with nearly one hundred competitors, surely has some merit to its claim as an agricultural county.

Perhaps a word would not be out of place regarding those who have served as officers of this society. The official roster up to 1902 is as follows:

Presidents — C. S. Elison, 1881; George O. Waters, 1882 to 1884, inclusive; F. Zimmerer, 1885; Edmund King, 1886 and 1887; J. D. Ream, 1888 to 1896, inclusive; L. H. Jewett, 1897 to 1899, inclusive; J. O. Taylor, 1900 and 1901. Secretaries — S. C. Beebe, 1881; J. L. H. Knight, 1882 to 1885, inclusive; A. R. Humphrey, 1886; J. L. H. Knight, 1887 to 1890, inclusive; W. H. Cramer, 1891; Cary Kay, 1892; F. H. Young, 1893 and 1894; L. McCandless, 1895; J. M. Fodge, 1896; E. R. Purcell, 1897 to 1901, inclusive. Treasurers — C. T. Crawford, 1880 to 1882, inclusive; D. M. Amsberry, 1883 to 1886, inclusive; O. P. Perley, 1887 to 1893, inclusive; E. F. McClure, 1894 to 1898, inclusive; J. A. Harris, 1899; A. R. Humphrey, 1900; W. D. Blackwell, 1901.

The board of directors consists of nine members, three of whom are elected every year. This board has always been selected from among the very best and most progressive farmers, stock-raisers, and business men of the county. The officers during the year 1901 were: President, J. O. Taylor; vice-president, Thomas Finlen; secretary, E. R. Purcell; assistant secretary, F. W. Hayes; treasurer, W. D. Blackwell; directors, Ed McComas, G. R. Russom, John Finch, A. E. Hanna, W. A. George, H. Lomax, C. H. Miller, E. C. Gibbons, and P. F. Campbell.

Since the foregoing roster of officials rendered service, the following prominent men of the county have served on the official board and have done much to attain the present status of the association: Judge H. M. Sullivan, Alpha Morgan, Emery F. Bush, I. A. Reneau, James Stockham, Tom Finlen, and Judge N. Dwight Ford.

OUT OF DEBT

The organization is in splendid financial condition. The 1917 fair was pronounced a successful event by all who attended, and the Thursday crowd was conceded to be the largest in the history of the fair. All of the stock premiums were paid to the winners on the

Its present officers are: E. R. Purcell, editor Custer County Chief, president; Tom Finlen, retired farmer, vice-president; N. Dwight Ford, county judge, secretary; Alpha Morgan, lawyer and banker, treasurer. Directors—E. C. Gibbons, banker and rancher; C. H. Zachary, rancher and horseman; B. J. Tierney, rancher and stockman; J. O. Taylor, merchant; Charles Wright, rancher and stockman; James Stockham, farm-machine expert; J. J. last day of the fair, and premiums in the other departments were paid in full within one week. After the business of 1917 was closed, all expenses of the fair were paid and all debts and judgments cleaned up, so that the organization stands to-day with a substantial balance to its credit and with every stockholder and 1917 attendant as boosters.

The 1918 management has made a special effort to carry out all of the instructions and requests of our government in regard to the stock and agricultural departments, which will be instructive and educational in every way and of great value to all. It will be Custer county's school of agriculture and stock-raising.

RACES TWENTY YEARS AGO

Just as an exhibit of the old-time fair held in the day when the horse was king and "Fords" unknown, the race program is here given of one of Custer county's fairs, just as it took place twenty years ago.

The program of races was exceptionally good this year and the field of horses large, while the minor sports created the usual amount of interest. The Wild West show was the main attraction and pleased the crowd.

The management of the fair honestly endeavored to give the people some genuine attractions, and advertised nothing that did not take place. Below we give a list of races and winners:

THE LUNDY HYDRO-ELECTRIC POWER PLANT

One of the most promising industrial developments ever inaugurated in the county is the so-called hydro-electric plant which is in course of construction at Doris, Nebraska, by James W. Lundy. Mr. Lundy is enthusiastic over the project and feels confident that he has power enough to transform Custer county, and central Nebraska as well, into a manufacturing center. Mr. Lundy is the owner of 1,600 acres of land abutting both banks of the river for a distance of nearly three miles. All of his land is under irrigation ditches, and this in itself constitutes a valuable asset. Although the average width of the river is 700 feet, Mr. Lundy has narrowed the river-bed through his land until it is confined to a channel 100 feet wide. The Middle Loup river, which is the main fork of the Loup, has an average velocity, at the Lundy point, of about 600-second feet.

The fall of the river generally averages six feet to the mile, but at Doris the fall is eight feet per mile, which makes this one of the best locations on the river to develop water power. The Loup is a very remarkable river, in that its flow is always regular. The average variation in rise and fall, at Doris, in drouth or flood times, is not more than twenty inches. The reason for this is found in the fact that there is no long, clay, valley drainage from surrounding hills leading either into the river or into the streams which feed the river. The volume of water in the river is maintained by springs and sand-seepage from distant lakes.

Lundy has arranged to divert from the river as much water as will be necessary for power purposes at this time, but has it so arranged that a larger volume can be diverted at any time. The construction of his plant is so arranged that the present unit can be added to at any time without disarranging the plant. The power canal which brings power water from the head-gates down to the side-gates and spillway is fifty feet wide and is capable of handling 400-second feet of water, while to operate the plant in its present proportions will require only 200-second feet.

It is arranged, however, so that the spillway will take care of the surplus water. The present plant unit is supposed to develop 225 horse-power, but its power can be easily increased at any time, with but slight alterations.

The dam proper is seventy-three feet wide and nearly fifteen feet high, which gives a twelve-foot working head of water. The foundations, which are necessarily on sand formation, are from sixteen to thirty-four feet below the level of the river and are made of solid cement, reinforced with steel. In the construction of the dam are 400 running feet of Wakefield sheet piling, six inches thick, tongued and grooved. One hundred and five round-piling, twenty-five feet long, help to fasten the dam to its moorings, and to stay the flood tide. Also used in the construction of the dam are 42,000 feet of hard-pine, two-inch lumber; 13,000 pounds of steel reinforcements; 250 loads of gravel; and 1,650 sacks of Portland cement.

The head-gates and ice-control are constructed from 2,800 feet of two-inch, hard-pine lumber, spiked to fifty, twenty-five, and thirty-five foot piling. In the construction of the side-gates and spillway, 35,000 feet of two-inch, hard-pine lumber was used. The side-gates are anchored in their places by cedar piling, ranging from sixty to twenty-five feet in length. More than 12,000 pounds of steel reinforcement is used in the cement part of the side-gate construction. For the cement work of the side-gates were required 175 loads of gravel and more than 500 sacks of cement. In this connection there should be noticed a device which is Mr. Lundy's invention. Heretofore, all river constructions or attempts to harness the river power have been hindered by large deposits of quicksand or silt-sand, which creeps along the bottom of the old channels. The new contrivance automatically separates the silt-sand in the bed of the stream from the volume of flowing water and allows only clarified water to pass through the turbine. It is said that this is the only automatic device of the kind ever constructed. Mr. Lundy assures us that the design is simple and that it never fails to work out the results for which it was intended. It is so constructed and so simple that it requires no attention and is ready at all times to separate the sand. This contrivance means much for the future development of water power, not only along the sandy-bedded Loup river, but also along all quick-sand streams as well. Formerly the sand has been removed or overcome by expensive mechanical devices which have made water power too expensive.

Mr. Lundy will use a fifty-six-inch Leffel turbine wheel which is especially constructed for a low-water head and which develops in the present unit 225 horse-power. The power is transmitted from the turbine to a new Samson cable drive, which is the most effective power harness for turbines yet invented. The turbine is controlled by a Woodard oil governor. The generator is 100 K. W.; 125 K. V. A.; six-cycle, three-phase, generator electric dynamo and switch-board, which will generate 175 K. W., on peak load.

Then new plant now in course of construction, replaces the old plant, which has been used for a flouring mill for over thirty years. It is the opinion of those who have investigated the plant, and also the opinion of the assistant state engineer, that the new ideas used in construction by Mr. Lundy will make this plant a decided success and a remarkable power contribution to all the region of Custer county. It is claimed that the power generated here can be economically distributed for a distance of 400 miles, which radius will cover all central Nebraska. When it is understood that the Loup river is capable of developing 150 to 200 horse-power per mile, it requires no prophet to understand what a valuable asset the river is to the contiguous territory. With the power properly developed, Custer county need not depend upon her agricultural resources entirely. The opportunity to become a manufacturing center is knocking at the door.

In constructing the new power plant Mr. Lundy has done all of his own engineering and constructing work, and has been assisted in the construction work by Harry Gardner, foreman, and John Wykoff, assistant foreman.

CUSTER COUNTY IRRIGATION

Once irrigation was the scheme and dream of all farmers in the county living along the river valleys. The dry year of 1894 brought the project of irrigation to the front, as the cure and prevention of crop failure. Two irrigation districts were formed, one in Lillian precinct and one in Douglas Grove. Both districts bonded themselves in order to construct ditches, flumes, and side-gates, but owing to a series of very favorable years the ditches have lapsed into disuse and are badly out of repair. Recently the Douglas Grove district was in litigation. A suit was brought by some of the water-right holders to compel the officers of the district to repair the ditch and furnish water to complainants. The suit was lost and at the present date the ditch is not used.

The Lillian ditch is practically abandoned, although in the vicinity of Gates a few farmers—George W. Dewey, estate of the late Ed. Bishop, Bert Gates, and others—are using water on their land. These men and J. W. Lundy, of Doris Lake, are the only Custer county farmers using water for irrigation purposes to-day.

Concerning the construction of the Douglas Grove ditch E. C. Gibbon, of Comstock, writes, in 1901, as follows:

"If the terrible drouth of 1894 was responsible for the construction of the Douglas Grove irrigation ditch, it has proved to be a blessing in disguise to the people of the Middle Loup valley, as it was in that year that the ditch was located, surveyed, and active work commenced, and it was by means obtained by working on this ditch that a large number of the people of this township were enabled to live through that memorable winter and to eke out a miserable existence until another crop could be raised. An attempt was made to induce the township to help in the work, as the sum asked to be voted would return to the taxpayers as remuneration for their work on the ditch, and thus help all concerned; but this aid was refused, and those living under the proposed ditch were compelled to organize a company and vote bonds upon themselves to obtain money to carry on and complete the undertaking. I will say nothing about their repeated discouragements and failures, but after one of the most desperate struggles, like Bruce's spider, they overcame all obstacles and the ditch has been finished from the Sargent bridge to Spring creek at Douglas Grove, a distance of thirteen and one-half miles, and covering an area of 7,000 acres of valuable land.

"As this is the only canal in this section of the country that has been successfully completed and is now in successful operation, blessing its builders with its benefactions, it must be stated that its completion is due to the unremitting and untiring efforts of a very few men, who stood by it, through evil report as well as good, until it was an accomplished fact, and the wonderful results obtained from the use of the water it furnishes have compelled those who were hitherto lukewarm supporters to become the most enthusiastic and generous friends of the enterprise. The ditch company at the present time is officered as follows: E. C. Gibbons, president; W. H. Comstock, secretary; Charles Wescott, treasurer."

The topography of the South Loup valley is so unfavorable to irrigation that no extended attempts to use the river water on adjacent land has ever been made. In this valley, hill-headlands project into the valley, coming up to the river banks in high cliffs, thus making the construction of ditches very expensive, if not impossible.

HORTICULTURE IN CUSTER COUNTY

The horticultural products of Custer county are not sufficient to warrant any extravagant claims concerning this being a great fruit country. The overwhelming preponderance of cereal crops causes the fruit industry to be neglected. A great variety of fruits, however, have been produced in the county and some varieties are extremely well adapted to both soil and climate. Cherries seem to be the most prolific bearers and are most regular in the production of a crop. It is, perhaps, owing to the fact that the cherry is a hardy tree and matures early, that it has come into prominence and received more than its share of cultivation.

The early settlers planted small orchards as soon as they were able to procure the trees, and in most of these home orchards the cherry was the leading variety. Some few very large cherry orchards were put out for commercial purposes, but while the cherry is hardy and an early bearer it is likewise a short-lived tree, and the large orchards passed into decay. The owners did not feel that the profits of cherry-raising warranted them in replacing the dead trees and maintaining the orchards intact. But to-day, on almost every farm and on almost every residence lot in the cities and villages, can be found a few choice cherry trees which generally produce well.

Apples rank next to cherries as a Custer county fruit. The hardy varieties do exceptionally well if proper attention is paid to them. But in many instances the small farm-orchards receive little care and attention, and consequently it is not to be expected that they will produce large crops of well developed commercial fruit. Thus far the county has not raised enough apples for home consumption.

In this latitude the peach tree does not stand the hard winter, and very few bushels of peaches have ever been raised in the county. Small fruits and berries do well in the low lands where they have sufficient moisture. Grapes are admirably adapted to the county's climatic and soil conditions and if given more attention could be raised in great abundance and with good profit.

The whole county was full of wild fruit in an early day. An article written by James D. Ream thirty years ago will give an idea of the character and abundance of Custer county wild fruits:

J. D. REAM MAKES A FIND

The history of horticulture in Custer county would cover many pages if it included all the efforts and failures. But a few lines as to the conditions found here at the time of the first settlement of the county may be of interest to some. While camping in the canyons with Wilson Hewitt, in January, 1880, I chanced to leave my gloves lying by the camp-fire in the evening, and when I looked for them in the morning I could not find them. After thorough search about the camp, Mr. Hewitt suggested that if I would tear down a pile of brush and trash that was about three rods from camp and that was three feet high and four or five feet broad, I would probably find my gloves, as it was a wood-rat's nest, and these rats had often carried off such articles for him while he was camped in the canyons. I immediately tore it down, and to my pleasant surprise I found my gloves, and nearly half a bushel of nice wild grapes, dried upon the stems, as clean and bright as when they were taken from the vines in the fall, and beneath these quite a quantity of dried plums. The rats had evidently provided the fruit for winter use, as they had eaten some of the plums, having gnawed the pits open and eaten the kernels out, but had not commenced upon the grapes. Here I obtained my first practical knowledge of the horticultural products of the county. I at once began to inquire regarding them, and to my surprise I heard some wonderful stories as to their variety and quantity. It was with great interest that I looked forward to the fruiting season, and, to my surprise, I found in the canyons, early in June, an unlimited supply of black currants, which, when stewed, with a little sugar added, made a sauce that was quite an addition to the meager fare of the average Custer county homesteader. We did not have very long to wait for the wild gooseberries to get large enough to stew, and of these, like the currants, there was an unlimited supply. Following these came the wild blackcap-raspberries, which, although not scattered all over the county, were very abundant in some of the canyons, and often bore large quantities of luscious fruit, one woman having picked and canned eighty quarts in one season. By the time these were gone, the earliest varieties of plums and choke-cherries were ripening. It would be useless to attempt to estimate the quantity of these two fruits produced that season, as every plum thicket was loaded with plums, the quality of many of the varieties being exceptionally good, while every clump of choke-cherry trees was black with the ripening fruit. I neglected the little wild strawberry that we occasionally find in the canyons. It is small, and not much of a bearer, but the flavor is very fine. The buffalo-berry is a fruit known only in the western part of the state, growing on the sides and near the top of the steep canyons, and often bearing large quantities of very bright red and yellow berries, somewhat smaller than the tame currant. The bush or tree is a slow-grower and very thorny. The fruit is very sour and often hangs on the tree until winter, making a very pretty sight. It makes a fine jelly, and its juice is a valuable aid in making jelly from the more acid fruits. The wild dewberry was found on the Middle Loup river valley, but has not been extensively cultivated. In addition to all this we found some sections of the sand-hill country covered with what are known as sand cherries. The sand cherry is a low-growing bush or shrub, seldom reaching over eighteen inches in height in its native condition, but it is a very prolific bearer, a twig one foot high often bearing almost half a pint of fruit, which very often grew the size of tame cherries. The pits are large, the skin thick, and the flesh not so juicy as the tame cherry. The fruit has a peculiar, pungent taste that is disagreeable to many people, but this characteristic is much less prominent in some varieties than in others. For a long time it was supposed to be the sand-cherry of the east, Prunus Pumila, but Professor Bailey, in a bulletin issued by Cornell University in 1894, denied this, and named it Prunus Besseyi, in honor of Dr. C. E. Bessey, of the Nebraska University, who had made extended experiments with this shrub.

FRUIT RECEIVED TOO LITTLE ATTENTION

With all this array of varieties of fruit, and every bush and vine loaded to its utmost, is it any wonder that we entertained high hopes of the tame-fruit industry in the future? Whenever the pioneer turned the black loamy soil and planted and cultivated with reasonable care, he was richly rewarded with enormous production of grain and vegetables.

But while the farmer pioneer was imbued with the spirit of push and perseverance, while he refuses to give up hope when met by disappointments, he is not a careful observer or a diligent investigator. In this case he did not stop to observe that all these fruits, in every instance, were found growing under peculiar conditions. They were always found where moisture was abundant, and oftentimes where protection was afforded from sun and winds.

In this manner good old Dame Nature was trying to teach a valuable lesson. She had thus written a message in every canyon, on every hillside, and in every valley. She had written it in large, plain letters, telling how and where to grow trees, fruits, berries, vines, and big weeds.

Did we read Nature's handwriting, and interpret her message of instruction? No, our untrained eyes failed to see the handwriting, and our undeveloped reasoning faculties failed to catch the lesson she had tried to teach us. We remembered the luscious fruit that grew in the orchard on the old home farm, in the eastern states where we used to live. We did not stop to question whether or not the varieties that flourished there, would stand this acrid climate, of hot sun, winds, and small rainfall. We planted what we thought we wanted to grow, and planted it where we happened to think we wanted it to grow, regardless of any laws of Nature, or any message that the good old Dame had sent us. We did not recognize that the location, the kind of soils and subsoils, the preparation of the ground, and the after-cultivation, were all basic problems that must be reckoned with.

The ever-present itinerant tree-peddler was on the ground, and, supported by the great variety of wild fruits found growing here, as well as aided by glowing pictures and full description of the wonderful fruits that he said could be grown here, he caused the pioneer's eyes to glisten and his mouth to fairly water, as he imagined he could see himself picking the ripening fruit from his own trees and vines, in the near future. Trees were planted galore, planted hither and yon—all laws of nature were disregarded and, in most cases, all known laws of cultivation and care were unheeded.

Failures, yes, ninety per cent. of the early attempts at fruit-growing here were failures. But sufficient success has been attained to prove that many kinds of the tame fruits can be grown here with reasonable success, when there is given an intelligent compliance with nature's laws. But the splendid fruit-growing sections of the eastern part of the state, where the hardier varieties of all kinds of fruits can be easily grown, and the equally successful sections of the inter-mountain country to the west of us, have supplied us with such great quantities of splendid fruits, at reasonable prices, that the problem of fruit-growing has lost much of its interest and has not received the attention that it would otherwise have received. Another resulting loss is that many of our farm homes lack much of the attractiveness and homelike appearance that a well-cared-for orchard and a few flowers would have given them. The careful investigation and study required in successful fruit-growing under our conditions would have proven of great value to us in helping solve some of the many other dry-climate problems that we have met in our general farm enterprises.

THE MILLING INDUSTRY

Milling has been one of the industries of Custer county that has reached large proportions. In nearly every community a good-sized flour mill has been erected, and in most communities they are doing business at the present time.

The first mill built in the county was at Westerville. In 1885 a man named Grierson located in Westerville and put up a water-power mill on Clear creek. In this mill the first grists of the county were ground. With the building of other towns, at the expense of Westerville's ambitions, the mill ceased operations, and high water destroyed the race and dam. Other mills of the county were built at Milldale, Callaway, Ansley, Mason, Arnold, Comstock, Sargent, Anselmo, and Broken Bow. Some of these mills have been destroyed by fire, but six are in operation to-day—those at Callaway, Arnold, Sargent, Comstock, Mason, and Ansley. Further reference to these mills will be found in chapter IX, under the respective histories of the towns in which the mills are located.

To S. J. Lonergan we are indebted for the following account of the Broken Bow mills:

THE BROKEN BOW ROLLER MILLS

The Broken Bow Roller Mills were erected in 1887. Messrs. Frey and Shoup, of Grand Island, Nebraska, commenced the work of building, and operated the mill for a short time. Owing to the liens filed by those who furnished the machinery—amounting to about $11,000—it was closed. The property at the time it was closed was valued at $20,000.

S. J. Lonergan, who located in Broken Bow in the spring of 1887, was induced to take the mill over on trial for three months, after which he decided to buy the controlling interest in it and made several needed improvements, costing about $9,000. Thereafter he paid all the liens against the property and incorporated the business for $29,000. Within this time George Frey purchased Mr. Shoup's interest in the company, but he later sold to the Central Nebraska National Bank, owned and controlled by John Inman and O. J. Coleman.

After this exchange of interests, the company continued to operate the property for several years at a profit, capital to do this being furnished by the stockholders, who received notes executed by the company, for money advanced. During the '90s the Central Nebraska National Bank failed, but before doing so it sold the milling company and paper to an Omaha bank, also disposing of their stock to some eastern parties. This action threw the property into court, and when it was sold it was bought by the Omaha banker who held the largest claim against it. Later on the Omaha banker sold the property to S. J. Lonergan, who immediately reincorporated the business, under the name of the Broken Bow Roller Milling Company. He proceeded to enlarge the plant, by building an elevator, with a capacity of 30,000 bushels, and also installed several thousand dollars' worth of needed machinery, expending in all for these betterments, $13,000, which made the cost of the milling company's property up to and including that time, $42,000.

S. J. Lonergan continued to run the mill for several years after this time, at a profit—up to the time of the panic of 1897. In fact, the mill was running night and day at the time of the panic, and was doing a profitable business. This panic came like a thief in the night; in the morning every banker in the country had crept into his cyclone cave, but the business man was left, like the private soldier on the firing line, to stop the onrush of this calamity or perish trying. Checks were valueless, money out of sight, property values were withered, and thousands of business men were carried out on the crest of this tide, to find themselves in the status from which they started in bygone years.

In 1912 S. J. Lonergan traded the mill for land. It then became trading property, and it thereafter changed hands one or more times, by lease or sale. While being operated in 1917, by Messrs. Jones and Bahr, it was burned and became a total loss.

MASON CITY FLOURING MILL

ELECTRIC LIGHTS EVERYWHERE

In striking contrast to the lights used in the homes of Custer county forty years ago are the electric lights with which every town and village in the county is lighted. Forty years ago, candles were common and the oil-lamp of small, smoky burner was the major illumination. It was a fortunate farmer that had a lantern with which to do chores in the barn after and before daylight, but to-day things have changed. Not only do the dwellers in the towns have homes lighted by electricity, but many of the farmers have their own electric-lighting plants and thus are enabled to have every modern convenience on the farm, as well as in the city. The first lighting plant in the county was established at Ansley. The second was in Broken Bow. After several attempts, Broken Bow finally secured a splendid plant, put in and operated by the Custer electric corporation of which Charles S. Martin is president and manager. This plant was established in 1909 and is a large, modern plant, well equipped to meet the needs of the community.

In 1915 the city installed a municipal plant and took over the city lighting, besides which it is now doing some commercial and residence lighting. Broken Bow is the only town in the county where two lighting plants are doing business.

TOWNS HAVE GOOD WATER

Over and again it has been mentioned that Custer county has the best water in the world. This is true not only of the country districts where hydraulic wells go down to gravel and tap the under-stratum of sheet water which is always found on the river levels, but it is also true of all the towns and villages in the county. Every town has a water plant of its own, and good, healthful, pure water is pumped out of a deep municipal well and forced into some adequate reservoir, from which it is distributed in mains and laterals all over the town. Because of the abundance of water and the easy and comparatively inexpensive method of putting down deep wells, all of the smaller places have been enabled to procure water plants that might well be envied by the larger cities of the east.

NO MINING INDUSTRY

With all her resources, no deposits of coal, iron, or other minerals have ever been found in the confines of Custer county. Indications of salt, potash, and other lesser productions of the earth have been found, but no investigation of the deep, underlying strata has ever been made. Down on the Charles Humphrey place, some five or six miles west and north of Callaway, oil indications are so prominent that talk of prospecting has been indulged, but to date no determined effort has ever been made to find out what underlies the surface soil.

Buried underneath the surface of Custer county, are, beyond doubt, rich deposits of minerals, oil or gas, which await discovery and the push and pluck to develop and bring to the surface for man's utility. What may be the result of future research and investigation can now be only conjectured.

HAS DEVELOPED WEALTH SLOWLY

The phenomenal wealth described in the last chapter of this volume and attributed to the thrift and energy of Custer county citizens, has been the product of years. Soil has yielded rich reward to every persistent tiller, but the process has been slow — so slow that perhaps it is safe to say that thousands became discouraged and abandoned their attempts long before their labors could possibly be rewarded by nature, who weaves her pattern slowly and awaits her time for rewarding labor.

In 1878, one year after the organization of the county, the first tax-roll was made up and, notwithstanding the fact that a great many cattle still were in the county, located on extensive cattle ranches, the taxable property amounted to only $136,054.50. This, of course, was the tax valuation of the property and in reality only one-fifth of the cash value of the property at the time of its assessment, but even at the actual value the property was far short of one million dollars — about one-seventy-fifth of the actual amount of property in Custer county to-day. It took seven years for the county to pass the million-dollar mark in property valuation, which it reached in 1886, when the taxable property was valued at $1,131,507.20. The next year was a prosperous year, and more than a half-million dollars was added to the public assets. Two years from the time they crossed the million-dollar line, or in 1888, they crossed the two-million-dollar line, with an assessed valuation of $2,256,281.00. Then for seven years little progress was made in the accumulation of property. Then came the memorable year of 1894, which found them with only $100,000 more than they possessed in 1888. But the notable change comes the next year, 1895, when, owing to removals and depreciation of values, there was a decrease instead of an increase. The years 1894 and 1895 are the only two years in the history of the county in which a decrease in taxable property is disclosed. In all other years small progress was made and some addition noted. In 1895 values depreciated below the two-million-dollar mark and stood for that year at $1,970,300.95. The next year, however, they again passed the two-million-dollar line, and held the two million and a little more for nine years. Then, in 1904, they crossed the three-million-dollar-line, and the next year, 1905, crossed the four-million-dollar line. For two years more they stayed below the four-million-dollar line, and then, in 1908, a wave of prosperity seemed to strike them, or else increased valuations brought the holdings up to $7,114,658.52. They stayed below or close to the seven-million line for seven years, or until 1916, when the assessed valuation of $8,060,249.00 put them into their present place, above the eight-million-dollar line. In 1917 they added more than a half-million to the county prosperity, and from this time forth increases, on a larger scale than in the past, may be expected. The last report of the state auditor, for 1917, gives the Custer valuation at $8,594,451, which, multiplied by five, would give us the actual valuation of property at $47,972,255, which is many millions below a conservative estimate of property if it should be appraised at present high valuations.

HAPPY AND PROSPEROUS NOW

Forty years of trials, hardships, and experiments are over. The farms are developed, homes established, the towns are located and permanent, the railroads are in vigorous operation and prosperous years have come to the Custer county people. The working over debts unpaid and mortgages that threaten to take the homesteads, are in the main part things of the past, and the feeling now of the old settlers is well described in R. F. Green's poetical lines in the Wall Street Journal:

SINCE WE PAID THE MORTGAGE

We've done a lot of scrimpin' an' livin' hand-to-mouth,
We've dreaded, too, wet weather an' we've worried over drouth,
For the thing kept drawin' int'rest, whether crops were good or bad,
An' raisin' much or little, seemed it swallowed all we had.
The women folks were savin' an' there ain't a bit of doubt
But that things they really needed lots of times they done without.
So we're breathin' somewhat easy, an' we're feelin' less afraid
Of Providence's workin's, since we got the mortgage paid.
I wish I'd kept a record of the things that mortgage ate
In principal and interest from beginnin' down to date!—
A hundred dozen chickens, likely fowls with yellow legs;
A thousand pounds of butter, and twelve hundred dozen eggs;
Some four or five good wheat crops and at least one crop of corn,
An' oats an' rye—it it swallowed in its life-time, as sure's you're born.
Besides the work an' worry, ere its appetite was stayed!
So we're more contented since we got the mortgage paid.
We've reached the point, I reckon, where we've got a right to rest,
An' loaf aroun' an' visit, wear our go-to-meetin' best—
Neglectin' nothin' urgent, understand, about the place,
But simply slowin' down by bits an' restin' in the race!
In time I'll get the windmill I've been wantin', I suppose;
The girls can have their organ, an' we'll all wear better clothes,
For we've always pulled together, while we've saved and scrimped and prayed,
An' it seems there's more to work for since we got the mortgage paid.

THE FIRST SETTLER TELLS THE STORY OF THE YEARS

In 1915 Lewis R. Dowse, one of Custer county's first settlers, visited the home of his childhood, Sherborn, Massachusetts, and while there was entertained by a historical society before which he paraded the experiences of a pioneer in Custer county. The Yankee State Daily contains the following:

An interesting paper was read at the October meeting of the Sherborn Historical Society by Lewis R. Dowse, of Comstock, Nebraska, in which he said:

"After five years in Iowa we pulled out for Nebraska. We went in a regular prairie schooner. Some put the motto 'Nebraska or bust' on their wagons. I put up no sign, but have been bursting out there in Nebraska for forty-two years. I finally located in what is now Custer county, in the middle Loup valley. As we were the first and only settlers in the valley, we had our choice of some fine lands along the river. The soil there is very rich, but very different from that in Iowa. Those were days of real pioneer hardship. We had to go seventy miles to railroad and I had to make that trip to get provisions. That first winter the nearest white settler was twenty-five miles away. There were no roads, and elk, buffalo, and other wild animals were very numerous. We had some visits from friendly Indians, and once four startled my wife, coming to our camp when she was alone with the children. All they wanted was plenty to eat, and of course they got it.

"As soon as I could, after selecting my land, I rolled over the sod and got in a little corn. Then the grasshoppers came and ate it all up, and we were out for that year. The next year we raised a little, but the following year the grasshoppers again kindly harvested our crops. From that time on we gained a little, got more land under cultivation and widened our circle.

"Then came our Indian scare, some time the last of the '70s, when General Custer and his men were massacred. Fearing that Indian war parties might wander into the valley of the Loup, the few settlers organized a company called the Rangers, and received arms from the government. They built a sod fort, with embrasures at the corners, so arranged that riflemen could gather there and sweep the sides of the fort with their volleys, and thus prevent storming parties from scaling the walls. Many of the settlers fled to the states farther east, but the dreaded redmen did not come to attack us. At last the Indians were overpowered and the scare was over. Our county was named in honor of General Custer.

"Years of prosperity followed. All through the '80s we had good crops and, with the exception of the drouth of 1894, things have been growing better and better. Then came the railroad, and now we are very comfortably situated. Where once was a free range, is now cultivated land. Where once I saw only wild animals, I now see the railroad train. The automobile goes over the old trail. Comstock has more people, more stores, more business than Sherborn. Such are the changes of forty years. My daughter Alice was the first white child born in Custer county.

"I am glad to revisit my old home and see the few now living who were here fifty years ago. I wish I could have with me my seven children and thirteen grandchildren. We will soon make Nebraska the real 'Dowse's Corner.'"

CHAPTER XVIII

PRESENT DAY WEALTH AND RESOURCES

A BRIGHT-RED CONTRAST — THEY GO FASTER NOW — THEY HAVE TRADED PLOWS — NO TELEPHONE GOSSIP — NO MORE FREIGHT HAULING — CUSTER COUNTY RESOURCES — PERSONAL PROPERTY — LIVE STOCK AND CROPS OF THE PRESENT YEAR — THE AUTOMOBILES HONK — BANKS AND BANKING — FIGURES IN RECAPITULATION — ANOTHER STATEMENT

A complete manifest of Custer county's present wealth and resources cannot be made. Statistics are too lame. Data cannot be obtained. The best that can be done is to give general statements and approximate figures. It is safe, however, to say that Custer is the peer of any county in the state — a ranking county on almost every proposition. It has a population of from thirty-two to thirty-three thousand people and in point of population ranks fourth in the state. Its people have good homes, well improved farms, with all the accessories of comfort and luxury. The people are happy, prosperous, and industrious. They have the progressive spirit, and latest methods are employed in every vocation and profession. Schools and churches constitute an asset in which the people have pardonable pride.

A BRIGHT-RED CONTRAST

Custer county is practically forty years of age, and between the sparsely settled, unplowed prairies of forty years ago and the high culture and splendid improvements of the present day there is a bright-red contrast — a contrast that can neither be pictured nor described.

Then there were about 200 people. To-day that number has been increased more than a hundred and fifty times. Then there were few roads. People traveled across country unmindful of trails or lines, and cared only for directions. They forded streams and wound their way along the canyons or through the hills. To-day there are splendid roads, bridges, and culverts wherever they are needed. Every stream has been conquered, every hill subdued, and every place made accessible. Well marked automobile roads traverse the length and breadth of the county and bring the travel of other counties and of the state over the Custer highways. The central Nebraska automobile route runs through the county east and west, touching Westerville, Broken Bow, Merna, and Arnold. The potash road runs from the southeast to the northwest through the county, practically following the main line of the Burlington Railroad. The White Star line, from Lexington to Ainsworth, crosses the county north and south, passing through Lomax, Oconto, Broken Bow, Lillian, and Milburn. The Holdrege Black Hills trail crosses the county north and south in the eastern part, and connects the Black Hills and Loup river highway, at Burwell, with the Lincoln Highway at Elm Creek and the Burlington Highway at Holdrege. Another splendid automobile road runs through the southwest corner of the county and connects the central Nebraska route, at Arnold, with the Lincoln Highway at Kearney. This road follows the Union Pacific Railroad and traverses the South Loup and Wood river valleys.

THEY GO FASTER NOW

Forty years ago there were no automobiles, steam cars, bicycles, or motorcycles, and only a very few buggies in the county. Travel was mostly on horseback. Some few had spring wagons, but if the family wanted to go any place and there were not enough saddle horses — and nine times out of ten there were not — they took the lumber wagon. Sometimes the wagon was drawn by a yoke of slow-paced oxen. In any event, traveling accommodations were very meagre, and speed regulations were not required. One old settler declares that common consent, if not law, prohibited the driving of a yoke of oxen faster than ten miles an hour. To-day all this is changed.

Top buggies came to take the place of lumber wagons and spring wagons and in them youth and age rode everywhere, in local territory. Phaetons and family carriages added a touch of aristocracy to this family of vehicles. Then came the bicycle, which brought a mode of mobilization that developed leg muscle and appealed to the young bloods. As a family conveyance, however, the bicycle was never in high favor. To-day, the buggy and carriage are out of date, and motor cars frisk the population over the highways from farm to town and from town to farm, across county or across state.

THEY HAVE TRADED PLOWS

Forty years ago the breaking plow was the king of implements. Custer county husbandry began with the old "grasshopper" plow. It was a prairie breaker, with a square share running at almost right angles with the beam. A few curved rods guided the cut sod into its place bordering the furrow, where it was supposed to rest bottom-side up. The second plowing was done with small, walking stirring-plows, and later corn was cultivated with the one-horse, double-shovel corn-plows, or small one-row cultivators of the primitive type then in vogue. There were no riding plows of any description.

The old-fashioned mowing machine came in for its share of work. Hay was the principal forage, and as grass grew abundantly everywhere, a mowing machine, a couple of bronchos and a little energy insured enough roughness for cattle and horses. The first grain crops were cut with the mowing machine, although one or two instances are recorded in which the grain was cut with the old-time cradle. With the Custer county people, the cradle was more popular in the house than in the field. Later came the McCormick reaper, the Buckeye reaper, and then a little later the Marsh and Deering harvesters.

To-day the machinery is much improved and up-to-date. Gang plows, drawn by large, well fed draft horses or tractor engines, stir the same fields in which the old-time implements began the work. Planters, drills, seeders, harvesters or binders, listers, double-rowed cultivators, riding harrows, six-foot mowers, rakes, sweeps, stackers, threshers, and every other implement that has name or place in modern-day implement husbandry, are now in use in Custer county fields or on Custer county farms.

NO TELEPHONE GOSSIP

To the generation which has fallen heir to modern-day improvements it seems strange that people could have lived and transacted business without the telephone, but forty years ago there were no telephone lines. The housewife could not call up the other women of the neighborhood for an hour's visit whenever she felt so disposed. The farmer could not take down the receiver and inquire all over the neighborhood for a stray cow. If a message had to be sent to a neighbor a mile away or ten miles away, it had to be carried.

NO MORE FREIGHT HAULING

The early settlers had no railroads. All kinds of supplies had to be hauled from railroad points east or south. It required days to make these trips. Almost indescribable hardships were endured by the men who made them. Teams were small and generally underfed, because grain was scarce. Wagons were old and often in poor repair. All this meant small loads, break-downs, tired-out horses, and innumerable other difficulties in transport-

FARM HOME OF JOHN CHERRY, ON THE SOUTH LOUP

There was no other way in those days. A message required a messenger. They could neither talk across the farm nor the county.

Now the wires run everywhere. Rural lines connect almost every farm not only with the business houses of the towns and villages, but also with every other farm house in the county. A great part of business is to-day transacted over the telephone lines. Neighbors visit, call the doctor, order from the stores, advertise meetings, hunt stray stock, sell their produce, and get weather reports over the telephone. All this has been the development of two score years.

ing freight from a railroad terminal to Custer county. It meant, too, a scarcity of supplies. It meant that only the bare necessities could be procured, and that no luxuries could be considered, but with the coming of the railroad all this has changed. The people of Custer are as well served by modern transportation as any part of the middle west. They have access to the markets of the world. They sell their grain at home, and buy their merchandise within thirty minutes' ride of their homes, no matter where they are located. Their live-stock rides out of the county in flat-sided Pullmans. There are no more long drives, with heavy shrinkage, in getting stock to market. The pioneers have lived their day, have weathered their storms, and have given to the present Custerites a heritage rich in convenience and almost voluptuous with luxuries and comforts.

CUSTER COUNTY RESOURCES

In round numbers, Custer county has 1,658,880 acres of land. That comprises the sum total of her area. If it all belonged to one man he would have its intrinsic value carefully figured. He would know how much it was worth in dollars and cents. Every acre has a commercial value. It is worth more as a community holding than it would be as an individual holding. Therefore, it is proper to figure out its land value, for in no other way can the full resources or combined wealth of the county be ascertained. Figure one-third of Custer county land at twenty dollars an acre, which would make a valuation of $11,059,200; then figure another third at thirty dollars an acre, and that will add $16,588,800; the last third will comprise all the choice land of the county—land that ranges in price all the way from fifty to 150 dollars per acre. It will, therefore, be very conservative to value this portion of the county at sixty dollars an acre, which amounts to $33,177,600, making a grand total of $38,919,040, which amount would stand out in fine comparison with the valuation that might have been placed upon the county land forty years ago.

Next comes the question of town lots. A part of Custer county's land is divided into small city lots. In the towns and villages of Custer county there are 10,204 which have an average value of $100 per lot, over and above the acreage value referred to above, which adds another $1,020,400 to the grand total of land values.

PERSONAL PROPERTY

The last available records for 1917 accredit Custer county with 115.58 miles of railroads, valued at $1,485,340. In addition to this the terminal properties of the Burlington and Union Pacific Railroads amount to $419,430. Before the live stock is listed, let it be noted that Custer county has 680 shares of mining and oil stock, and other industrial enterprises, that the owners are willing to acknowledge. They have 1,381 pianos, 757 organs, and 1,400 victrolas. Under the head of steamboats and other water craft in a state report, Custer county comes in for two. There are 321 gasoline or steam tractors, 154 threshing machines, 2,093 cream separators, and agricultural tools and implements to the value of $175,220. Next come seven typesetting machines, valued at $28,000; seventy-three cash-registers, valued at $10,950; and 260 stands of bees, every stand filled with a fine grade of alfalfa honey. It might just as well be observed here as anywhere else that Custer is credited with 1,266 dogs, which an expert values at thirty cents. Whether the expert means to value the dogs at thirty cents each or the whole bunch at thirty cents, is not clear.

LIVE STOCK AND CROPS OF THE PRESENT YEAR

In 1917 Custer county had 32,710 head of horses and 2,903 mules; total valuation of horses and mules, $2,228,880. It had 103,613 head of cattle, worth $5,180,650; 59,722 head of hogs, worth $1,194,440; and 2,884 sheep, worth $43,260.

Forty-five hundred acres of spring wheat that will average fifteen bushels per acre, making a total valuation of $135,000, starts off the crop valuation. Next comes the winter-wheat crop, which will add $1,800,000, or approximately $2,000,000 to Custer county wealth. This is followed with 5,000,000 bushels of corn, which, valued at one dollar a bushel, makes bushels and dollars even figures. Now add 600,000 bushels of oats, 10,000 bushels of barley, 140,000 bushels of rye, 100,000 tons of alfalfa, 60,000 tons of prairie hay, 10,000 tons of millet and sorghum hay, 200,000 bushels of potatoes, 13,561 dozen chickens, 500,000 pounds of butter, 300,000 gallons of cream—and one begins to get some idea of the almost fabulous wealth and mammoth resources of Custer county.

THE AUTOMOBILES HONK

One of the assets of Custer county is a parade of automobiles. Statistics show that in proportion to population Nebraska has more automobiles than any other state in the Union, and Custer county stands well at the head of Nebraska counties in the possession of motor cars. There is operated in the county one car for every eight persons. The county treasurer's books show in round numbers that 4,000 automobiles are owned and operated in the county. This includes motor trucks as well as motor cars. Counting the population at 32,000, it makes one car for every eight persons. If these cars should all turn out some day and form a procession on a good Custer county road, allowing 100 feet for each car, which is as close as they could run in safety, cars would cover seventy-six miles of road, or make a procession seventy-six miles long. Running at fifteen miles an hour, it would take five hours for the procession to pass a given point.

Of the four thousand cars for which state licenses have been granted, 2,376 are Fords, 197 are Dodges, 145 are Overlands, 219 are Maxwells, 138 are Buicks, 122 are Chevrolets, 62 are Studebakers, 47 are Oaklands. The remaining 604 range to big cars of expensive models, such as Hudsons, Chalmers, Willys-Knights, Moline-Knights, and Cadillacs. Many expensive Sedan tops are in the list.

BANKS AND BANKING

Forty years ago Custer county had no banks, no credit, and no money. To-day, located and doing business in the county, there are a full two dozen financial institutions, all chartered as state banks and all financially sound.

The following is a report of the financial condition and total resources of the Custer county banks, as per call report, under date of May 10, 1918, for which this volume is indebted to J. J. Tooley, secretary of the state banking board:

Anselmo State Bank, Anselmo...	$ 264,681.11

FIGURES IN RECAPITULATION

Perhaps it will be easier to understand the vast resources of this oversized and progressive county if some of the figures set forth in the foregoing paragraphs are here repeated and tabulated, so they can be more easily comprehended:

Present land value.....	$38,919,040.00
Value of town lots.....	1,020,400.00
Value railroad lines.....	1,485,340.00
Value railroad terminals.....	419,430.00
Tractors and threshing machines	175,220.00
Typesetting machines.....	28,000.00
Horses and mules.....	2,228,880.00
Cattle	5,180,650.00
Hogs	1,194,440.00
Sheep	43,260.00
Spring wheat.....	135,000.00
Winter wheat.....	2,000,000.00
Corn	5,000,000.00
Rye, oats, barley.....	500,000.00
Alfalfa, prairie, and millet hay.	1,500,000.00
Bank deposits and securities...	7,853,019.00
Automobiles	2,000,000.00
Stocks of merchandise.....	1,200,000.00
Schools, churches, public buildings	2,000,000.00
Mills, light and water plants...	320,000.00
United States bonds and stamps	1,300,000.00

Grand total.....$74,492,710.00

While the foregoing figures are very careful estimates, they are very conservative, and are given only to enable the reader to determine approximately something of the present-day wealth.

ANOTHER STATEMENT

To illustrate the resources of Custer county, it might be stated something like this. We have a record, nearly 4,000 years old, concerning the children of Israel, who found themselves swamped, down in Egypt, and planned to emigrate to another country. They picked up bag and baggage and struck out in the middle of the night. They took their children and live stock with them, but the record declares they had to walk; they had no money to pay railroad fares and freight bills.

If the people of Custer county should decide to hunt another location, unlike the Israelites, they would not have to walk. They have the money to pay both passage and freight. It would take, however, something like the following equipment to load them up and haul them out of the country.

They would probably go over the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, which has fifty-four miles of road in one line running diagonally through the county. So run the engines down to the county line east of Mason City and let the box cars extend west to where the road crosses the county on the north. Then we will begin to load. Now fill 2,524 cars with machinery and farming implements, 7,000 cars with furniture and household goods, including merchandise from the stores. Then load 1,781 cars with horses and mules, 5,181 cars with cattle, 1,000 cars with small grain, 10,000 cars with corn, 1,700 cars with hay, 300 cars with potatoes, 500 cars with poultry and dairy produce. It will take 1,000 cars to haul the automobiles.

When all these worldly possessions are loaded, it will make 35,417 car-loads, and, allowing fifty cars to an engine, it will take eight miles of engines to pull this freight. Switch them out on the main line and run them in trains of one-half mile length with only a half-mile between the sections, and it will require 694 miles of road to line them up ready for starting. When the head engine is ready to whistle for Litchfield, the last caboose would be seven miles beyond Billings.

Now the people themselves have money to buy tickets, and have small disposition to walk. They will ride in sleepers and all will want lower berths. So, using lower berths, by putting them two in a bed, it will require 1,000 Pullmans to accommodate our thirty-two thousand people. It will require 250 baggage-cars to accommodate the trunks, valises, and surplus baggage of the passengers.

Divide them into trains of twenty cars each, then the Custerites will ride in sixty-one special trains, which, running only a half-mile apart, will cover thirty miles of track, and, as lined up behind the freight, would extend the Custer county caravans thirty-seven miles beyond Billings. Open the line, give them right of way, and start them out at twenty miles an hour, and it will take them thirty-six hours to pass a given point, or after they have been traveling thirty-six hours the last passenger coach will just get down to where the first engine started, but when it reaches that point the first engine will be thirty-five miles east of Chicago.

This is as far as it is profitable to trace them, for they would probably roll over the different lines of the country and, not finding a better location would return and unload in Custer county, where they would start over again, under very different conditions than those under which they made their first start.

In the compilation of any circumscribed history — such as that of a city or county — it is evident that its chief feature of interest will be found to be of a personal, family, or community nature; and by the personal standard is the true value of all history to be judged. The highest critics of historical work have justly held that any production that lacks personal or human interest is of little lasting value. In the preparation of this history of Custer county the projectors and authors have kept this invaluable quality in mind, the while they have been alive also to the further necessity of carefully and strongly depicting the relations borne by this integral division of Nebraska to the state and nation. Both in the early times and the later periods it has been shown that general as well as specific causes have contributed to the local and county development.

While thus combining the general with the specific and personal, there has been an insistent care in avoiding the mistake of overburdening the narrative with extraneous matter. The general history serves as an effective background for the bringing out, or proper revelation, of strictly home or county matters, and the work thus proves a fitting complement to and adjunct of the volume in which is outlined the history of the state.

Thus it is that the following chapter, or division, needs no voucher for its consistency or its expediency. In the perpetuating of genealogical and personal records concerning those who have wrought well in connection with the development of the great county of Custer, this publication offers still further material of enduring and cumulative historical value, and it is believed that in every instance the individual recognition that is accorded is eminently due. Those who have suffered the vicissitudes and hardships of the pioneer days merit more than passing honor, and the same is accorded in the following pages. Those who have devoted themselves with equal loyalty and constructive energy to carrying forward the work initiated by the pioneers and founders, likewise deserve the recognition that is here tendered, and it is believed that the final division of this history rounds out most effectively the more generic history which closes with these paragraphs.

The history of our country has ever been the history of the frontier. The spirit that has presided over our destinies since the day-dawn of freedom has ever been the spirit of the pioneer. The creative, formative forces that marked the nation's miraculous birth; the achievements of a century distancing those of a cycle of the nations of old; the spirit that has preserved our honor unscathed amid the shock of battle and the riot of war; the progress and prosperity which, unparalleled in the history of the race, have differentiated us from the people of all other climes—all had their inspiration, their birth, and their fruitage in the rugged lives of our pioneers, as they swung the ax in the primeval forest or turned the virgin glebe in the untamed valleys and prairies of the west. "To such "scouts of progress" Custer county must ever pay a tribute of highest honor, for within the confines of this county have been wrought works that measure up to the highest standard attained by the true American pioneer. Thus in a direct way, as well as by inference, the various personal sketches and family reviews that constitute the closing department of this publication shall offer much to those who "read between the lines," both at the present and in future years.

A. R. Humphrey.

CHAPTER XIX

FOUNDERS AND BUILDERS

PERSONAL MENTION OF MANY OF THOSE WHO HAVE BEEN EXPONENTS OF CIVIC AND MATERIAL DEVELOPMENT AND PROGRESS IN CUSTER COUNTY

AUGUSTIN R. HUMPHREY. — There is no man more widely known and no man who has been more closely concerned with public affairs and county developments than the man whose name is announced by this title line. In a wide circle of the county he is known to everybody as "Judge Humphrey," but in the near circle of closer friends the title is omitted, and the name abbreviated to "Gus." For the purpose of this review, however, we shall refer to him as Judge, a title honorably won and richly deserved.

Judge Humphrey was born in Madison, Indiana, in February, 1859, and is a son of Augustin R. Humphrey, Sr., and Hanna (Hicks) Humphrey. The father descended from a fine old Kentucky family, and the date of his birth is recorded as July 12, 1816. The mother was born in Wales, and in her veins coursed the blood of that staunch, patriotic people who have made always a valuable contribution to the world, and who have furnished some of the best citizens America has ever possessed. She came to this country with her parents when a mere child, and here received her training and lived her life. The Judge's parents were married in the county of his nativity, March 26, 1846, and both lived until the last week in August, 1904, at which time, by a striking and appropriate coincidence, both died in the same week.

The Judge ran the gamut of the common schools in Iowa, to which state his father's family emigrated when the Judge was but five years old. It was in the public schools that the Judge imbibed the principles of Ray's Third Part Arithmetic, and committed to memory McGuffey's Reader and Speller, together with most of the principles of Pinneo's Grammar. At the close of this public-school career he could repeat the contents of these schoolbooks verbatim, and in all probability he can come nearer repeating the contents of these volumes to-day than any other Custer county man or woman in whose school curriculum they had place. He quit the common school at the age of fifteen, and entered the Normal College at Bloomfield, Iowa, in the fall of 1878. There he continued the studies until 1881. He taught school in the winter to get money to go to school the rest of the year. From this institution he was graduated in 1881, and he then went to the Iowa State University, where he took his law course, graduating from the law department in June, 1882. This makes up the educational equipment of this useful citizen, whose life record it is a pleasure to relate.

His domestic life began June 28, 1883, when he led to the altar Miss Nellie N. Nightingale, as the result of a college romance — owing to the fact that the bride was a member of the same class in college and graduated in the same class with her husband. In the fall of the same year the young couple turned their faces toward the west, following the star of empire until they reached Nebraska, where the Judge began by teaching school at Unadilla. There they remained almost one year. In the fall of 1884 they came to Broken Bow and selected this place for their future home; and as soon as possible established a residence which has been the Humphrey home ever since. Here he commenced the practice of law; here he won his first legal victories; here he shied for the first time his castor into the political ring, and received his first public recognition. Here he first won his successes, and here he has reached to-day the years of his retirement from the hard and strenuous duties of active practice.

Into the family circle, as the years went by, three sons were born, all of whom are grown to manhood, a credit to the father and mother and entered upon what will undoubtedly be successful careers. Paul N. is now living at Pawhuska, Oklahoma; Donald R. operates a farm owned by the Judge on the South Loup;

Fred A. is a medical student in the State University. The two former are married and have established homes of their own. In the home of Donald is to be found the only grandchild, a bright boy who occupies a large place in the grandsire's affections.

The shadow fell across the Humphrey household on May 30, 1914, when the wife and mother passed from life into that unknown and mysterious realm to which the great majority of mankind has journeyed. Her death occurred in the Bailey Sanitarium at Lincoln, to which place she had gone in the brave struggle to regain health. Mrs. Humphrey was an excellent, cultured lady, prominent in many lodges and social circles, loved and respected by friends and neighbors.

Concerning the political career of the Judge, and it has been an enviable one, it is to be recorded that in 1889 he attended the state convention as a delegate. The convention was looking for a man from the middle part of the state to fill an important post on the ticket, and accordingly the Judge was drafted. He says there was no reason—it was purely accidental that he should be nominated at that time for commissioner of public lands and buildings, but he received the nomination, was elected in the fall of 1890, and filled the office with credit. He was re-elected in the fall of 1892 and served until the end of that second term, at which time he returned to Broken Bow and resumed the practice of law. He was elected county attorney in the fall of 1902, and elected county judge in the fall of 1905, being re-elected in 1907. In the spring of 1916, over his earnest protest, the citizens of Broken Bow made him mayor, which position he filled one year, and then absolutely refused to be a candidate for re-election. The Judge has always taken a keen interest in educational affairs. The public school was a favorite realm for his activities. From the spring of 1890 until the end of the school year of 1914, he was a member of the board of education of his home city, and for the most of the time was chairman of the board. It can be truthfully said that he made more president addresses to graduating classes than any other man in Custer county, and it is quite likely that this is true of the entire state.

The Judge has ceased the active practice of law, and spends a great deal of his time at his country home, where he delights in the quiet hour and the healthful exercises of gardening and other productive recreation. No man in Custer county has responded more liberally to all calls of the public; no man has contributed more cheerfully to the promotion of every public enterprise, or has lent a greater service to the development of Custer county.

These lines are written by a personal friend who has known him long and intimately, and who delights to pay the homage he feels is due to such a character as the judge has been.

W. L. GASTON.

MACK C. WARRINGTON.—When he located at Broken Bow, in May, 1916, to assume the duties of register of the United States Land Office, Mack C. Warrington left behind him at Mason City, this county, numerous business interests and a reputation for honorable dealing as a business man, integrity in public office, and probity in private life. In his new community and in his new official capacity, he has not only maintained the reputation noted, but has also extended and strengthened it, so that there are few men in public life in Custer county to-day who stand higher in public favor, esteem, and confidence.

Mr. Warrington was born at Guthrie Center, the county seat of Guthrie county, Iowa, October 29, 1864, and is a son of William and Julia (Cooper) Warrington. His father was born in England, in 1820, and was a young man when he came to the United States. He was a blacksmith by trade. In 1854 he located in Illinois, where he began to work at his trade, and shortly thereafter he met and married Julia Cooper, who was born in Ireland and who had come to the United States in 1848 and located in Illinois. Not long after their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Warrington removed to Guthrie Center, Iowa, where, in 1856, the father founded a blacksmith shop that is still in existence and is being conducted by one of his sons. He became one of the highly esteemed men of his community, was an influential Democrat and a Mason, and died in 1905, aged eighty-five years, in the faith of the Baptist church, of which Mrs. Warrington, who died in 1901, also was a member. They became the parents of six children, of whom four are living—Mrs. J. F. Holster, a widow, residing at Guthrie Center, Iowa; Mack C., of this notice; Mrs. T. J. Campbell, the wife of a ranchman of Palisades, Colorado; and Bert, of Guthrie Center, who conducts the blacksmith business which was founded by his father sixty-two years ago.

After attending the public schools of Guthrie Center, Iowa, Mack C. Warrington completed a course at Cornell College, Mount Vernon, that state, and began his career as a printer, a vocation which he learned in his home community. He was variously employed until August, 1886, when he came to Nebraska, and, locating at Mason City, secured a position on the local newspaper, the Transcript, of which he became proprietor through purchase in the following year. During the thirty years that followed he continued to act as publisher and editor of this paper, which he developed into one of the strong and influential journals of the Democratic party in this part of the state, and which had a large following and a subscription list which extended over several counties adjoining Custer. In addition, he built up a large and profitable job-printing business and had interests in several other directions, being accounted one of the substantial men of Mason City.

For a number of years Mr. Warrington has been prominent and influential in Democratic politics in Custer county, both personally and through his newspaper ownership, and while a resident of Mason City he served in a number of capacities, including that of member of the school board, justice of the peace, and postmaster, of which last named office he was the incumbent for five years. In May, 1916, he received the appointment, from President Wilson, as register of the United States land office at Broken Bow, and moved to this city to take charge of his duties, which embrace the responsibilities for a district that covers twenty-four counties. He disposed of his newspaper interests in 1917 and has devoted his entire attention to his office, in which he has already established an excellent record for capable, expeditious, and conscientious service. Mr. Warrington was a charter member of Mason City Lodge, No. 170, Ancient, Free & Accepted Masons, of which he is a past master, and he still belongs to the Masons and to the Modern Woodmen of America.

In 1893 Mr. Warrington married Miss Mena Mengel, who was born in Illinois, a daughter of Frederick Mengel. Mrs. Warrington is a member of the Catholic church.

CHARLES H. HOLCOMB.—A resident of Custer county since 1883, when he came to this locality as a homesteader, Charles H. Holcomb has been engaged in the practice of law at Broken Bow for a period of thirty-two years, within which time he has risen to a position of eminence among the attorneys of central Nebraska. Judge Holcomb is a native of Gibson county, Indiana, born January 21, 1856, and is a son of John C. and Rebecca (Skelton) Holcomb.

The paternal grandfather of Judge Holcomb was a minister of the "Hard-Shell" Baptist church, who came from the south at an early date and settled in Gibson county, where, in 1821, was born John C. Holcomb. The latter passed the greater part of his life in farming, although he was also prominent in Democratic politics and at various times held official positions, being for eight years deputy county auditor, and serving also as county auditor for a number of years. His death occurred in 1879, and his first wife, also a native of Gibson county, passed away in 1856. They were members of the Baptist church and were the parents of three children, of whom two are living: J. B., who is a ranchman of Broken Bow; and Charles H. After the death of his first wife, Mr. Holcomb married her sister, Lucinda Skelton, and they became the parents of seven children, of whom three are living: S. A., of Lincoln, is at present a member of the board of control, he being a former governor of Nebraska and former member of the supreme court of the state; S. H. is engaged in farming in Gibson county, Indiana; and Estella is the wife of L. E. Kirkpatrick, of Seattle, Washington, a former attorney of Broken Bow.

The early education of Charles H. Holcomb was secured in the public school at Fort Branch, Indiana, and, having decided upon a professional career, he started the study of law in the office of an attorney at that place. He practiced in Indiana until 1881, when he came to Nebraska and first settled in Hamilton county, which was his place of residence for two years. In 1883 he changed his center of activity to Custer county, locating on a homestead, but after three years he moved to Broken Bow, which has since been his home. Here he established himself in practice, subsequently becoming associated with the law firm of Kirkpatrick & Holcomb, an alliance which lasted until 1891. In that year he formed a partnership with his younger brother, W. W. Holcomb, and the firm of Holcomb—until the death of the younger member. He then continued alone until 1909, when he was elected judge of the county. Holcomb Brothers continued in existence for eight years, and he remained on the bench for five years, during which time he established a record for dignity, for judicial bearing, and for the wisdom and fairness of decisions that won him uniform commendation. When he retired from the bench, Judge Holcomb formed a partnership with Judge Humphrey, and this now forms one of the strongest law firms in central Nebraska. Judge Holcomb is one of the men who have risen from the ranks, and his entire career has been one of steady and constant advancement, marked by the utmost integrity, sincerity, and fidelity to duty.

Judge Holcomb was married in 1879, in Gibson county, Indiana, to Miss Alice Finch, who was born in that county, and to this union there have been born five children: A. Wilbur, engaged in the automobile business at Hastings, Nebraska; Vessa, the wife of C. O. O'Banion, a cigar manufacturer of Aurora, Nebraska; Mabel, formerly her father's deputy and always his assistant in his office work, now the wife of William Darnell, a contractor of Broken Bow; Edna, the wife of S. S. Parkison, a railroad man; and Roy, a member of the United States Coast Artillery, is in service in France at the time of this writing. Mrs. Holcomb is a member of the Christian church. The Judge is a Democrat in his political allegiance, and is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in which fraternity he has passed all the official chairs.

HARVARD LOMAX. — Two occupations, ranching and banking, have attracted the interests and energies of Harvard Lomax, and in both fields of endeavor he has won standing and prosperity, being at this time the owner of much valuable land in Custer county and president of the Custer State Bank, of Broken Bow. Also he has been a prominent figure in public life and in several positions of marked responsibility has demonstrated his worthiness for such honors and his capacity for discharging the duties of his high position.

Mr. Lomax was born at Stockport, England, September 15, 1859, a son of James and Mary (Hobson) Lomax, natives of England, who passed their entire lives there, the father dying in 1905, aged eighty-three years, and the mother in 1900, aged seventy-eight. James Lomax was a wholesale paper merchant and was a successful business man. He and his wife were members respectively of the Church of England and the Wesleyan Methodist church. They were the parents of seven children, of whom five are living: Henry Hobson, in the British government service at West Kirby, England; Harvard, of this review; Mrs. Robert Hamilton, a widow who lives in England; Maude, of New Quay, Cornwall, England; and Sarah Lloyd, of the same place.

Harvard Lomax was given excellent educational advantages in his youth and completed his studies when he was graduated in Wesley College, Sheffield, England, in 1878. He then spent one year as a fruit farmer on the Isle of Jersey, but in 1880 he immigrated to the United States and in March of that year located in Custer county. He pre-empted a tract in the South Loup valley and held it for three years, but subsequently he removed to Wood river, where he homesteaded and in addition bought railroad land. For a time he was associated with his brother, Henry H., but the latter went back to England. Mr. Lomax eventually became one of the well-to-do men of his locality and won general public confidence by his straightforward handling of business matters. He interested himself in public matters and in 1890 was elected to the state legislature, in which body he served one term, making a good record for constructive work. For several years thereafter he served as county supervisor, and in 1895 he was elected county treasurer, an office which he retained four years. In 1901 Mr. Lomax assisted in the organization of the Custer National Bank, of which institution he was the first cashier, remaining as such until 1917, when he was made president. This institution, now the Custer State Bank, is sound and conservative, with an excellent reputation in banking circles, and it has a capital of $35,000, with surplus and undivided profits of $5,000, and average deposits of $415,000. Mr. Lomax still retains his holdings in farm property and gives some attention to the operation of the same, but the major portion of his time is taken up with banking affairs. In politics Mr. Lomax is a Democrat, with independent inclinations. He is a Mason in high standing, a Knight Templar and a member of the Mystic Shrine and has served his Blue Lodge as master. He is a member also of the Woodmen and the Highlanders. With his family, he belongs to the Methodist Episcopal church.

In February, 1884, Mr. Lomax was united in marriage to Miss Laura White, who was born at Clifton, Illinois, a daughter of Thomas and Mary White, early settlers of that state. The parents of Mrs. Lomax came to Nebraska in 1882, and Mr. White purchased a section of land near Lexington, where he followed farming until his death. Mr. and Mrs. Lomax are the parents of six children: Edith is the wife of H. A. Stephenson, M. D., a graduate in medicine at Johns Hopkins Hospital, Baltimore, Maryland, where Miss Lomax was a trained nurse, and Dr. Stephenson is now in the United States service as a surgeon at Fort Riley; James is cashier of the Custer State Bank at Broken Bow; Clifford, the manager of a cattle ranch in Cherry county, is a soldier in France at the time of this writing; Marian is a graduate of the Broken Bow high school, class of 1918; and Leslie and Frances are attending school.

JOHN M. KIMBERLING.—Among the prominent citizens of Broken Bow, one who affords an encouraging example of success gained through the proper use of every-day abilities and opportunities, is John M. Kimberling, president of the Broken Bow State Bank. His life work has been a response both to his early teaching and the needs of his environment, and he has laboriously climbed every round in the financial ladder, having risen to the presidency from the humble position of bookkeeper. He was born in Marion county, Iowa, March 25, 1859, and is a son of Rev. Lawrence and Elizabeth (Reynolds) Kimberling.

The paternal grandfather of Mr. Kimberling was Elijah Kimberling, a native of West Virginia, who spent his entire career in that state, which was also the birthplace of the maternal grandfather, John Reynolds, who moved to Iowa in 1852 and passed the rest of his life there, engaged in farming. Rev. Lawrence Kimberling was born in West Virginia, and as a young man moved to Marion county, Iowa, in 1852, being there married to Miss Reynolds, who also was born in West Virginia. They settled down to an agricultural life in their new community and there spent the remainder of their days. Mr. Kimberling was an ordained minister of the Baptist church and for many years labored faithfully in the service of his Master, filling numerous pulpits in the country surrounding his home. He was a self-made man in all that the term implies, and was greatly esteemed in his community. His political belief made him a Republican. There were five children in the family, of whom four are living: Frank, who is proprietor of a meat market at Franklin, Nebraska; John M., who is the subject of this review; C. V., who is engaged in the laundry business at Des Moines, Iowa; and Minnie, who is the wife of J. Dickey, a printer at Franklin.

The district schools of Marion county, Iowa, furnished John M. Kimberling with his early education, and this he supplemented with a course in a commercial college at Des Moines. His first vocation was farming, but this did not prove congenial, and for a time he was occupied in teaching school. Two years as an instructor convinced him that such an occupation was not his forte, and in 1887 he came to Broken Bow, Nebraska, where he entered upon his real career, obtaining a position as bookkeeper in the Broken Bow State Bank. His advance with this institution was steady and continuous, for he rose consecutively to cashier and then to vice-president, and in 1917 was made president of this institution, which is accounted one of the strong and stable banking houses of the county, with a capital of $30,000, surplus and profits of $10,900, and average deposits of $600,000. Mr. Kimberling is known as a man of rare sagacity and judgment, keen foresight, and inherent ability as a banker, with a proper blend of progressiveness and conservatism. He is held in the greatest confidence not only by his associates but also by the general public, and his fellow citizens have demonstrated their faith in him by making him city treasurer for nineteen years and a member of the city council for a like period. He is a Republican. Fraternally, he is affiliated with the blue lodge and chapter of York Rite Masonry and was formerly secretary of the lodge, and he and Mrs. Kimberling are members of the Baptist church.

In 1890 Mr. Kimberling married Miss Cora Reyner, who was born in Iowa, and who died in 1894, leaving one child: Florence, who is now the wife of Edward Scott, a farmer near Broken Bow. In 1898 Mr. Kimberling was again married, being united with Miss Rosa Hemphill, also a native of Iowa, and to this union there have been born two children: Thelma and Rodgers, both attending the Broken Bow public schools.

WILLIAM A. HOUSEL, D. M. D.—As in medicine and surgery, the science of dentistry is constantly developing new phases of usefulness, and in order to insure success, the dentist of to-day must keep fully abreast of the achievements of his profession. He must add skill to thorough research and combine close application to his task with the ability gained through experience. Such a practitioner is William A. Housel, D. M. D., who has been engaged in the practice of his profession at Ansley since 1905, with constantly increasing success.

Doctor Housel was born at Stockham, Hamilton county, Nebraska, July 15, 1875, a son of Gardner and Jennie (Cook) Housel. His father, who was born in New Jersey, in 1848, was four years of age when he was taken by his parents to Madison, Wisconsin, where he grew to manhood and was educated in the public schools. In Wisconsin he was engaged in farming for a short time, but in 1870 he came to Nebraska and settled on a homestead in the vicinity of Stockham, Hamilton county, and in that community he married Miss Jennie Cook, who was born in New York city, in 1854, and who was brought to Nebraska as a child. They continued to live in that community until 1879, when they settled on a tree claim in Custer county. This claim Mr. Housel duly developed and improved, and to the same he has since added, by various purchases, until he now has 800 acres of valuable land. A man of splendid energy and business ability, he has been very prosperous in his undertaking, and is now justly accounted one of the well-to-do, as well as prominent, men of his locality. He is a Democrat in politics, a leader in civic movements and enterprises and a consistent member of the Christian church, to which Mrs. Housel also belongs. They are the parents of four children, as follows: Frank, engaged in farming near Ansley; Dr. William A., of this notice; Dr. C. L., a specialist in diseases of the eye, ear, nose, and throat, and now in the service of the United States Army, at Austin, Texas; and Margaret, the wife of Ben Sheldon, who is carrying on agricultural operations on his father's farm.

Dr. William A. Housel attended the public schools of Ansley, and after his graduation in the high school he spent three years at Cotner University, in Lincoln. He then pursued his professional studies at the Lincoln Dental school, from which he was duly graduated with the class of 1905, and he at once began practice at Ansley, where he has maintained his office ever since. A courteous and genial manner, splendid skill in his vocation, and a natural love for his calling, have combined to attract to Doctor Housel a large and representative practice, and as the holder of the largest clientele in this part of the county he has been compelled to employ an assistant. He devotes his entire time to his professional business and has had little leisure for outside matters, but he is a stanch Democrat and gives his support to good civic movements.

In 1900 Dr. Housel married Miss Florence L. Ford, who was born at Blue Hill, Nebraska, and who is a daughter of Fred Ford, a successful carpenter contractor at Bethany, Nebraska. Of this union have been born five children, namely: Alice, Robert, Dorothy, Lucille, and Raymond F. Dr. and Mrs. Housel are members of the Christian church.

JAMES K. HEWETT.—The proprietor and editor of a newspaper occupies a vantage ground from which he may make or mar a reputation, or build up or tear down a cause worthy of public support. Not only the city of Broken Bow but Custer county at large has reason for congratulation that the Custer County Republican is in such safe, sagacious and thoroughly clean hands. It is considered one of the best general newspapers published in the county, as well as an outspoken, fair-play exponent of the best element of the Republican party; in fact it is in all respects well worthy of the care and sound judgment displayed in its columns, and reflects credit on both the editor and publisher, James K. Hewett.

Mr. Hewett was born at Bloomington, Franklin county, Nebraska, January 9, 1890, a son of James H. H. Hewett and Maude (Kelly) Hewett. His paternal grandfather, Obediah B. Hewett, a prominent and leading attorney, came to Nebraska in 1857 and assisted in laying out the city of Beatrice. In 1859 he married Miss Mary Turner. He fought as captain of Company M, Second Nebraska Cavalry, during the Civil war. At the close of the war he settled in Brownville, where he remained until 1876, when he moved on to a farm near that city. In 1880 he went to Hastings, and he practiced law there until 1892, when he went to California and practiced law at Riverside, California, later moving to Chino, California, where he died in 1898. The maternal grandfather, of Mr. Hewett was James E. Kelly, who was born at Latrobe, Pennsylvania. At the age of nineteen years he enlisted in the Thirty-fourth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers and rose to the rank of captain. Returning to Indiana, he was married, December 31, 1863, to Margaret J. Lawrence, who accompanied him to Texas, where he saw six months' service on the border, during the days immediately following the struggle between the north and south. When honorably discharged he and his wife went to Roanoke, Indiana, where Mr. Kelly engaged in the mercantile business. Later they moved to South Carolina, engaging in cotton raising. They then moved to Fond du Lac, where again Mr. Kelly engaged in the mercantile business. In 1879 he came to Nebraska as a pioneer, taking a homestead in Harlan county. In 1880 he moved to Bloomington, engaging in the mercantile business until appointed receiver of the United States land office at Bloomington, under President Harrison.

James H. H. Hewett was born in Brownville, Nebraska, and received excellent educational advantages, being graduated from the Peru State Normal, class of 1883, and having the distinction of being the first graduate of Hastings College, class of 1885. He studied law with his father and, after being admitted to the bar, entered the land office at Bloomington, Nebraska, and later at McCook, Nebraska. He was married to Miss Maude L. Kelly, in 1888, at Bloomington, Nebraska. They then moved to Box Butte county, Nebraska, where Mr. Hewett engaged in the practice of law, at Hemingford and Alliance, for a number of years.

Mr. Hewett has always been prominent in Republican politics and for two terms was county judge of Box Butte county. He is now connected with the United States land office at Alliance, Nebraska. Mr. Hewett is prominent in Masonic circles, having been master of the Alliance blue lodge for seven years and eminent commander of the Knights Templars. Mr. and Mrs. Hewett have been the parents of three children, two of whom are living—James K. Hewett and Helen Bernice Hewett, who is a senior at the University of Nebraska.

James K. Hewett was graduated from the Alliance high school in 1908, following which he entered the Nebraska State University, and, after pursuing an extended course in electrical engineering, was graduated with his degree of Bachelor of Science, in 1913. Going to Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, he took a special course of two years with the Westinghouse Company, and in 1914 returned to Nebraska. As a young man he had learned the trade of printing, more as a recreation than with the thought of using it as a business. However, there is the saying that once a man's blood be tainted with printer's ink he is never able to disassociate himself from it. This may have been true in Mr. Hewett's case, for when he came back to Nebraska in 1914 he joined the force of the Alliance Times. Two years of experience there bound him firmly to newspaper work, and in 1916 he came to Broken Bow and purchased the Custer County Republican, of which he has since been the editor and publisher. At the present time he has a circulation extending through Custer county and is producing a well printed, well edited sheet, with clean, live, authentic news, timely editorials and interesting locals. His efforts to give the people a good, readable newspaper have evidently been appreciated, and he is well supported in an advertising way by the merchants and professional men of Broken Bow. In connection with his newspaper, Mr. Hewett has a well equipped job department, and turns out all manner of high-class job printing.

Mr. Hewett was married at Lincoln, on November 20, 1916, to Miss Anna Margaret Veith, who was born at Lincoln, Nebraska, September 8, 1890. Mrs. Hewett is the youngest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Veith, of Lincoln, Nebraska. Mr. Veith was born at Ober-Ramstadt, Germany, in 1846. His father, Conrad Veith, was librarian of the court documents at Schloss Lichtenberg while preparing himself for office in the probate courts of that city. Henry Veith left Germany when a young man, going first to London, where he lived a year before coming to the United States. In the '60s he decided to make Lincoln, Nebraska, his home and soon after took out his naturalization papers. He was married to Catherine Goetz, of Darmstadt, Germany, on February 24, 1872, at Lincoln, Nebraska. During all these years he has been successfully engaged in the mercantile business.

Mrs. Hewett graduated from the Lincoln high school in 1909. In 1913 she received her Bachelor of Arts degree from the Arts and Science College of the University of Nebraska, and her diploma from the Teacher's College of that institution. She taught in the Grand Island high school for three years, spending the summers taking post-graduate work at the Universities of Wisconsin and Nebraska. She is now engaged as the social editor of the Custer County Republican. She is a member of the Woman's Public Service Club, The Woman's Club, and the Browning Club. Mrs. Hewett is a member of the Presbyterian church of Broken Bow.

Mr. Hewett is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America and the Public Service Club, of Broken Bow.

Mr. and Mrs. Hewett are the parents of one daughter, Helen Easley, born December 28, 1917.

REV. JAMES H. HERMES, the esteemed pastor of the Broken Bow Catholic church, is filling his second pastorate, having come to this city from Douglas, Wyoming, in 1917. While he is thus, more or less comparatively, a newcomer, he has already found a place in the affection and confidence of the people here, into whose lives and daily activities he has brought a moral influence that is contributing to their spiritual and material welfare. Father Hermes was born at Louisville, Kentucky, April 14, 1887, and is a son of Frederick August and Regina (Lubbers) Hermes.

The parents of Father Hermes, natives of the dukedom of Oldenburg, immigrated to the United States in 1882 and were married at Louisville, Kentucky, where they still reside and where the father is engaged successfully in the grocery business and in farming. There were thirteen children in the family, of whom nine are still living, but Father James H. Hermes is the only one located in the west.

Rev. James H. Hermes received his early education in the parochial schools of Louisville, and completed a collegiate course at St. Francis College, Trenton, New Jersey. He then went to Rome, Italy, to pursue his theological studies and he was ordained September 19, 1909, immediately following which he returned to the United States. His first charge was at Douglas, Wyoming, where he remained from 1910 until 1916, and in October, 1917, he came to Broken Bow, where he now has thirty-eight families in his congregation. Both in a material and spiritual sense the work of Father Hermes has been very successful. Since he commenced his ministerial labors at Broken Bow he has done much to improve the church and add to the welfare of the parish. He is a genial and warm-hearted man and not only commands the respect and confidence of his own parishioners but also enjoys the cordial esteem of a large circle of Protestant friends. He extends hearty hospitality to all guests who visit his church or home, and greets all with a pleasant word and a cheery smile. He invariably exerts his great influence on the side of right, and lends liberal aid to all movements tending to promote the public welfare. All who listen to his pulpit utterances are impressed by his strong intellectual resources and the energy which characterizes his work. The life of Father Hermes has been a beneficent one, and its results have been abundantly manifest wherever he has labored.

Father Hermes joined Casper Council, Knights of Columbus, at Casper, Wyoming, and has now reached the fourth degree in that well known fraternal order, having the distinction of being the only man in the state who has taken the four degrees within the period of as many months.

MILO F. YOUNG, pioneer, frontiersman, miner, scout, Indian fighter, freighter and early settler, is probably the oldest man now living within the confines of Custer county, having passed his ninety-second year. His career has been one in which he has had varied and interesting experiences, from hunting buffalo on the western plains to the civilized existence of modern days, and few men, even of twenty less years, bear so few of the scars of life. Mr. Young was born June 18, 1826, at St. Johnsbury, Caledonia county, Vermont, a son of Benjamin and Mary (Jackson) Young. His paternal grandfather, Rev. Winthrop Young, was a minister of the Baptist church, and his maternal grandfather, Samuel Jackson, was a Revolutionary soldier who fought in the battle of Bunker Hill. Benjamin Young, who was born in New Hampshire, moved in young manhood to Vermont, where he passed the rest of his life in farming. He and his wife had thirteen children, of whom Milo F. is the only survivor, the others being: Deborah, Loren, Obediah, Elijah and Abigail (twins), Mary, Benjamin, Harrison, Winthrop, Jackson, John and Maria.

Milo F. Young was educated in the public schools and as a youth worked for his father, his first twenty-five cents being earned by spreading hay for a neighbor, Captain Miles. He remained at home until his marriage, at the age of twenty-five years, and then purchased his father's farm, which he conducted for one year. The quiet pursuits of agriculture, however, did not appeal to Mr. Young's nature, and he accordingly went to the city of Calais, Maine, where for four years he was engaged in the butcher business and for three years conducted a livery. Selling his interests in New England, he went to St. Anthony, Minnesota, where he farmed for three years, and then, after a visit to his old home, he came to St. Louis, Missouri, and up the Missouri river, arriving at Omaha in 1858. At that time he took a claim twenty-four miles northwest of Omaha, in Washington county, but after three years he sold out and went to Pike's Peak, where he was engaged in mining one year. Mr. Young next became a freighter from Omaha to Cherry Creek and Denver, the latter then known as Aurora, and from Denver he carried the first printing press, for John Gibson, forty miles northwest to Blackhawk, better known as Central City. About twenty-four days were required to make his trips in the winter months, when, at night, he would scrape the snow off the ground under his wagon in order to make his bed. His family at this time were living at Central City, but in 1860 they went out to join Mr. Young, with whom they remained two years, then going to Elkhorn City, in Douglas county. During this period Mr. Young frequently killed buffalo and freighted the meat and robes to Omaha, where he found a ready market. His experiences with the Indians were numerous, and when the red men went out on the Platte river to hunt, he would pass through their villages. One of the incidents of his life at this time, which is illustrative of the early days, had to do with the desire of Colonel Bent, government agent and Indian trader, to trade with a large party of Sioux, Cheyennes and Arapahoes. The Colonel had seven large loads of Indian goods and sent out a call for the Indians to come and trade, but the latter encountered a band of wild horses and forgot all about the errand upon which they were despatched. Mr. Young was camping on the river, when he was approached by one of the big chiefs of the Sioux, who rode up on a fat little Indian pony with its tail dragging the ground and motioned Mr. Young and his three companions, Henry Benjamin, Rube Hyatt and George Benjamin, to come to the Indian camp, where there were about 2,000 redskins. The plainsmen were informed by the chief: "Much buzz-buzz," evidently meaning that where they were camped were too many mosquitoes. Producing a long-stemmed pipe and some killikinick from a mink-skin pouch, the chief lined the men up on a wagon-tongue, lighted the pipe, took a few whiffs, and then passed it to the others, who followed suit, the chief then finishing the ceremony by gravely puffing once or twice. He then said: "White man safe, no steal here," and true to his word the chief would not allow his tribesmen to disturb them.

Not so peaceable were Mr. Young's later experiences with the Indians. When the Second Nebraska Cavalry was called out, in 1862, to put down the uprising at New Ulm, Minnesota, and Spirit Lake, Iowa, Mr. Young served eleven months, helping to chase the Indians up to Sioux City, under General Sully and Colonel R. Furnis. At Sioux City the soldiers were joined by the Sixth Iowa Cavalry, and at White Stone Hill the command surprised a large party of the hostiles, gave them battle, routed them completely, and burned their tepees. In 1873 Mr. Young loaded twenty-two hogs, which he took to Denver for Christmas and sold at a good profit. Leaving, with his four magnificent horses, on the day before New Year's, the coldest day on record in the United States, he traveled back to Elkhorn City, bringing with him a family, and he himself walked the entire distance, to keep from freezing.

In 1876 Mr. Young came to Custer county and located at the mouth of Spring creek, and the property, on which his son, Frank H. Young, carried on operations for many years, is still known as the Young ranch. Mr. Young built the old log house depicted on another page of this work, and the same is of much historical interest, as it was used as the first court house of Custer county. The Young ranch is still operated by the heirs of Benjamin Young, to whom it was sold. There, for several years, Milo F. Young served in the capacity of postmaster of Custer, and later he acted as deputy under his son, Frank H., who was county clerk. He is a Republican, and a member of the Masons. That his intellect is still unclouded, even at his advanced age, is shown in the fact that he personally, supplied the material for the foregoing sketch, in addition to relating numerous other interesting incidents of early life in this region. When he left the ranch, with a well earned competency, Mr. Young removed to his home at Broken Bow, where he is now residing, surrounded by every comfort and enjoying the affection and warm regard of a wide circle of friends.

In March, 1851, at St. Johnsbury, Vermont, Mr. Young married Mary Ann Woods, a daughter of Eben Woods, and they became the parents of four children, all of whom are deceased.

ELBERT P. GAINES, cashier of the Security State Bank of Ansley, is one of Custer county's young and progressive citizens who have created a favorable impression in banking circles and established themselves in positions formerly held by men many years their seniors. He is essentially a product of Custer county, as he was brought here in infancy, was educated in this community's public schools and has received his business training in its institutions, while his career thus far has reflected credit upon the county's influences and upon his own ability and character.

Mr. Gaines was born at Cambridge, the county seat of Henry county, Illinois, February 21, 1886, and is a son of E. H. and Fannie B. (Page) Gaines, the former a native of Illinois and the latter of Iowa. E. H. Gaines was reared and educated in his native state, and for a number of years was identified with the wholesale lumber trade, a field in which he met with marked success. In 1886 he came to Custer county and established himself in the hardware and implement business, in which he continued until his death. He was a man of excellent business ability, strict integrity, personal probity and sound citizenship, and he well merited his success and the respect in which he was uniformly held. He was a member of the Masonic fraternity, was a Republican in politics, and, with his family, belonged to the Christian church. Mrs. Gaines, who survives her husband, resides at Bethany, Nebraska. They were married at Menlo, Iowa, and became the parents of three children: Elbert P., to whom this sketch is dedicated; Fred B., who is identified with the automobile business at Chicago, Illinois; and Loine, who resides with her mother and is engaged in teaching school at Bethany.

Elbert P. Gaines attended the public schools of Ansley, and after his graduation in the high school he entered the hardware and implement business with his father, under whose able preceptorship he gained his initial commercial training. He remained in the store until he was appointed postmaster of Ansley, during the administration of President Taft, when he gave up other interests to attend to the duties of that office. When his term of four years expired, he identified himself with the Security State Bank, in the capacity of assistant cashier. This institution had been organized February 5, 1915, by local capitalists, who recognized Mr. Gaines' devotion, fidelity, and general ability, by advancing him, in 1918, to the post of cashier, which he holds at this time. The bank is capitalized at $20,000, and at this time has surplus and undivided profits of $3,000, while its deposits approximate $215,000. It is accounted a strong institution, bearing an excellent reputation in the banking circles of the state, and, guided by a conservative policy, has made constant advancement since its organization. Mr. Gaines has made many friends for the bank as well as for himself, among the patrons and depositors, and has done much to inspire public confidence.

On June 18, 1907, Mr. Gaines married Miss Clara Varney, who was born at Westerville, Nebraska, a daughter of Edgar Varney, one of the early settlers and merchants of Westerville, and later a representative merchant at Ansley. Mr. and Mrs. Gaines have two children: Edgar V., born December 10, 1909; and Helen L., born May 25, 1911. Mr. and Mrs. Gaines are attendants of the Methodist Episcopal church, and Mr. Gaines is a staunch Republican. He is prominent in fraternal circles, being a thirty-second degree Mason and a Shriner, and being at present worshipful master of his Masonic lodge. He is also a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and is past chancellor commander of the Knights of Pythias.

PLIN L. METCALF.—To the old and distinguished state of New York the county of Custer is in no small degree indebted for some of its most prominent citizens, eminent professional men, successful farmers and capable and well-to-do merchants—and in the van of the last mentioned class, although he is at present retired, is Plin Metcalf, a resident of Sargent and a member of the town council. Mr. Metcalf was born in Wyoming county, New York, September 3, 1863, and is a son of Augustus and Lucia (Crittenden) Metcalf.

Milo Metcalf, the paternal grandfather of Plin Metcalf, was born in Vermont, and as a youth was taken by his parents to Wyoming county, New York, where he followed farming throughout the rest of his life. In that county were born his children, of whom three sons, Judson, George and Plin, served in the Union army during the Civil war, the last named meeting a soldier's death on the field of battle. Augustus Metcalf was reared on the home farm in New York and for a time followed the pursuits of the soil as a vocation. He was married in New York state, his wife also being a native thereof, but in 1872 he went to Putnam county, Ohio, and engaged in the mercantile business at Belmore, where he was also postmaster for several years, and where he carried on a successful business until his death. He was a member of the Presbyterian church and was a Republican in his political views. After his demise Mrs. Metcalf carried on the business for several years, and also acted for four years as postmistress, but in 1883 she disposed of her holdings and came to Custer county, Nebraska, where, like her sons, she settled on a homestead. After coming to Nebraska she joined the Methodist Episcopal church. She is the mother of four sons: Walter, who still lives on his original homestead in Custer county; Plin, whose name initiates this review; Perry, who also is on his original homestead here; and Clarence, who is engaged in the implement business at Sargent.

After attending the district schools of Putnam county, Ohio, Plin Metcalf took a course at the Ohio State Normal School at Ada, and then commenced his career in the role of a school teacher. His experience as an educator, however, lasted only one year, for in 1883, when he was twenty years of age, he came to Custer county and took up a homestead, as did also his mother and three brothers, all of the farms adjoining. He continued to follow farming and stock-raising with a full measure of success until 1899, when he turned his attention to mercantile lines, investing in a business at West Union, where he was located as a merchant until 1909. His ten years of experience there had been beneficial, and when he came to Sargent he was better equipped in knowledge of merchandising, so that his success here was immediate. He was in partnership with James Haggerty in a general store for a time, but he eventually bought his partner's interest, and he continued as the sole proprietor of the business until January 1, 1918, since which time he has lived in retirement. During the active years of his career Mr. Metcalf displayed excellent judgment, fine business capacity and shrewd knowledge of affairs, so that his operations were prosperous, and he is to-day considered one of his community's well-to-do men. He has a good farm in Dawson county and holds other interests, all accumulated in an honorable and legitimate manner. Mr. Metcalf is a Republican and for some time has been actively interested in public affairs. For several years he was a member of the board of school directors, and he is now serving efficiently as a member of the town council of Sargent. His fraternal affiliations are with the Masons and Odd Fellows, in which latter order he has passed the official chairs. He and his wife hold membership in the Methodist Episcopal church.

In 1882 was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Metcalf to Miss Emma Slentz, who was born in Ohio, and to this union have come two children: Clyde, who is employed in the implement business with his uncle, Clarence Metcalf, and Grace, the wife of William Bruce, who at the time of this writing is serving in the United States Navy, his preliminary training having been received at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station, Illinois, and at Hampton Roads, Virginia.

J. HARRY BRYAN. — One of the young farmers who is a native of Custer county, who was here reared and educated, and who here began farming and has already achieved an immense success is J. Harry Bryan, who resides in the vicinity of Huxley postoffice.

J. Harry Bryan was born July 5, 1883, and is a son of Joseph and Mary E. (Baker) Bryan. Joseph Bryan was born in Missouri, in 1844, and his wife, who was born in southern Illinois, September 25, 1844, is still living. The parents were married in southern Illinois, and came to Custer county in the early '70s. As sterling pioneers they located a homestead nine miles northeast of Mason City, and upon this place Mr. Bryan lived until the time of his death, in 1892. His widow, now venerable in years, still lives on the old homestead. In their immediate family were eight children, seven of whom are still living. W. B. is a farmer in southeastern Kansas; Mrs. John T. Wood resides at Mason City; Mrs. G. L. Stevens lives in Custer county; Mrs. L. F. Wilcox has her home on a farm at Glendive, Montana; F. G. lives at Burwell, Nebraska, where he is in the employ of the railroad company; J. Harry, the subject of this sketch, was the sixth born; and Robert L. lives on the old homestead. The family belong to the Christian church. The father was a Republican in politics, and in his early life he entered the service of his country, from southern Illinois. While thus serving in defense of the Union in the Civil war he contracted consumption. He was in Sherman's historic march to the sea, and his father, W. J. Bryan, was killed at the battle of Pittsburg Landing.

The fair education which J. Harry Bryan enjoys, was gleaned from the public schools of his native county. He took up farming at an early age, and he now owns 120 acres of land, well improved, with a nice residence and all required outbuildings; and the farm equipment, which is to be rated as first class, meets the requirements of all the operations that can be conducted upon a place of its size.

In March, 1905, was recorded the marriage of Mr. Bryan to Mrs. Eva (Corey) Mitchell, who was born in Clay county, Nebraska, a daughter of William Corey, who was a pioneer of that county. The first husband of Mrs. Bryan was G. Mitchell. Mr. and Mrs. Bryan have three children — Guy, Leona, and Mildred — all bright and happy children, pursuing the foundation course of their education and contributing joy and satisfaction to their parents.

Mr. Bryan is a member of the local lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in which he takes a prominent and active part. He affiliates with the Republican party, and is rated as one of the leaders and dependable spirits in all partisan affairs. He is a progressive farmer, a good judge of live stock, and a citizen whose home and premises denote thrift and enterprise.

CHARLES W. BOWMAN. — For a number of years the name of Charles W. Bowman has been inseparably connected with the agricultural and real-estate interests of Custer county, where he has been located since 1885. His career here has been one of constant advancement since his arrival, and both as a farmer and realty operator he has won success and maintained a high reputation for ability and integrity.

Mr. Bowman was born December 27, 1863, at Plattsmouth, Cass county, Nebraska, a son of Albert G. and Mary Ann (Covalt) Bowman, natives of Ohio and West Virginia respectively, and is a grandson of Abraham Covalt. The family has been identified with the Christian church for many generations and its members have always been supporters of progressive movements along moral, educational and religious lines. Albert G. Bowman was a cabinetmaker by trade, a vocation which he followed first in Ohio and later at Plattsmouth, Nebraska, but eventually he turned his attention to agricultural pursuits in the western part of Cass county, where he rounded out a long, useful and honorable career. He and his wife were the parents of the following children: Sarah A. and Samuel H. died in infancy. Elizabeth, by her first marriage, had two children, Charles and Albert Wachter, who are farmers in Custer county. In her second marriage she became the wife of William H. Russell, a farmer, they leaving two children when they died, — John H. and Anna D. Abraham D. married Ella M. Bethel, and both are deceased. They had one son, — Carl E., who is a member of the firm of Bowman & Bowman, Broken Bow. Mary A., who married John Keefer, a farmer near Anselmo, Custer county, is deceased. Ida D., who died in 1890, married James M. Russell, and her son is farming with his father in Custer county. Rhoda H. is the wife of Joseph V. Carnes, a retired farmer of Lincoln, this state, and they have seven children, — Nellie, Myrtle, Lillie, Mary, Rhoda, Lulla and Ollie. Charles W., of this review, was the next in order of birth. Jennie V., who makes her home with her brother Charles W., at Broken Bow, is the widow of the late Jacob L. Phillips, banker and broker, who died in 1890.

Charles W. Bowman was given his education in the public schools of Cass county, and when still a youth he showed his industry and capacity for hard work by assuming the responsibility of contributing materially to his own support. When he was a lad it was his custom to arise at daylight, gather several gallons of strawberries, and carry them on foot to Greenwood, Nebraska, a distance of three and one-quarter miles, where he would peddle them to the villagers. In addition, he at times herded cattle for the neighbors, and in this way managed to secure enough money to keep himself in clothes. When he was but seventeen years of age he had saved money enough to buy a team of ponies, which he traded for an acre of land at Greenwood, but this he sold after coming to Custer county. Mr. Bowman continued his thrifty habits and about the time he reached his majority he had accumulated enough farm machinery to carry on operations, a team, a wagon and harness, and decided to try his fortune further to the west. Accordingly, March 20, 1885, he loaded his worldly possessions on his wagon and made preparations to bid his parents goodbye. Just as he was leaving, his father inquired as to the state of his finances. When he was informed that the young man had just $3 cash capital, he brought forth a $20 gold piece, and, with tears streaming down his sunburned cheeks, presented it to his son, saying: "Son, you are going into a wild, unsettled country; take this and may God bless you." Charles W. Bowman arrived in Custer county about ten days later and proceeded to take a homestead and a timber claim about four miles north of New Helena. The first few years were hard ones for the ambitious young man, and, with the other pioneers who were rapidly settling the country, he experienced many hardships and was called upon to use numerous expedients in order that he might carry himself over the bad years. Among other things he spent many weary hours in digging up cedar stumps in the cedar canyons, from which the cedar trees had been cut and hauled to Grand Island and other points at an earlier day. These stumps were dug up and split into fence posts and then hauled 100 miles to Grand Island and sold, or exchanged for the necessities of life. By 1902 Mr. Bowman found himself well on the road to prosperity and the possessor of a good property which had been developed solely through his own efforts. But while his agricultural operations had proved very successful, he had become attracted to the real-estate business, and finally, in 1902, he disposed of his ranch and farm and applied himself to realty and loans. His business ability, his expert knowledge of land values, and his general qualifications have enabled him to become a leading factor in his line of work. His former farm, situated on what is known throughout Custer county as the Bowman Table, is to-day worth $100 per acre.

Mr. Bowman was married November 20, 1897, near Anselmo, Nebraska, to Ida D. Dare, a daughter of James and Mary J. (Jackson) Dare, and four children have been born to this union: Lloyd D., Mary N., Maude E. and Deerce H. The family belongs to the Christian church. Mr. Bowman is identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and in the Masonic fraternity he has received the thirty-second degree of the Ancient Accepted Scottish Rite. Both he and his wife are members of the Order of the Eastern Star, in which Mrs. Bowman has filled all the official chairs of her chapter.

MARTIN F. BLANKENSHIP, a substantial farmer now living in comfortable retirement at Broken Bow, came first to Custer county in 1882, and with the exception of three years he has lived here ever since, the while he is well and favorably known all through this section. Mr. Blankenship was born at Indianola, Vermilion county, Illinois, September 7, 1856. His parents were Martin C. and Geraldine (Scott) Blankenship, the former of whom was born in Kentucky but reared in Indiana, and the latter of whom was born and died in Vermilion county, Illinois. His grandparents were well known people in their day, their names being William and Mary (Whitesett) Blankenship and William and Elizabeth (Goliday) Scott. The parents of Mr. Blankenship both died when he was an infant less than a year old, and of their seven children he and a sister, Mrs. Martha S. Nutterfield, who lives in Illinois, are the only survivors. The father was a preacher in the Missionary Baptist church.

Left an orphan when so young, Martin T. Blankenship necessarily was reared by strangers, and John T. Phillips and wife, farming people in Vermilion county, Illinois, became good foster-parents, teaching him habits of industry and giving him an opportunity to go to school in the winter time. In those days money was not very plentiful and boys had few chances to earn pocket-money. For that reason the first dime Mr. Blankenship ever earned and the use he made of it remain in his memory as the basis of an amusing story. He was about twelve years old when a neighbor paid him the ten cents for planting a field of corn, covering with a hoe, and the coin was treasured until he added ten cents more, about Christmas time, by turning a grindstone for a man. He gained permission to go to Danville and there he invested his capital in a bunch of fire-crackers, with which he anticipated making considerable of a celebration on Christmas day. He remembers remaining awake almost the entire night, until four o'clock on Christmas morning, and then of mischievously crawling on his hands and knees to the big old fireplace, where he inserted a fire-cracker in the smouldering embers. The explosion probably created enough excitement to satisfy a boy's love of adventure, but probably he was forgiven when his foster-mother found out that the noise was not occasioned by the breaking of her cream jar from the frost, as she had feared. It was just an innocent boyish prank, and since that time Mr. Blankenship has often stated that he had never subsequently gained as much fun out of a like expenditure. When he was eighteen years old his foster-father died and his foster-mother went to Indiana, but he had been earning his own living after he was fourteen years of age.

Mr. Blankenship married, September 18, 1879, at Potomac, Illinois, Miss Delilah E. Peterson, who died December 26, 1910. Her parents were Cornelius and Mary (Roderick) Peterson. In 1882 Mr. Blankenship brought his family to Nebraska and located in Custer county, five miles northwest of Broken Bow, and he remained on that place until 1886, when he returned to Illinois, where he remained three years. Farming and stock-raising have always engaged his attention, and he has been very successful. To his first marriage four children were born, namely: William D., Rosa B., Zona V. and Edward A., the last named being deceased. The first three were reared and schooled in Custer county. William D., who is a farmer near Kingfisher, Oklahoma, married Matie Hussey, a daughter of Charles Hussey, and they have one child, Flossy E. Rosa B. is the wife of Frank DeMoss, who is a resident of Danville, Illinois, a Democrat, a member of the order of Woodmen and of the Free Methodist church. Mr. and Mrs. DeMoss have four children, Hallie A., Floyd, Annis, and Gerald. Zona V. is the wife of John Downing, who was a farmer near Oakwood, and who is in the national army at the time of this writing; he and his wife belong to the Free Methodist church and they have no children. Politically Mr. Downing is a Democrat. Mr. Blankenship's second marriage took place at Alliance, Nebraska, August 2, 1913, when he wedded Mrs. Susanah Canter, a daughter of Hiram and Lydia (Smith) Donohue, who were members of the Baptist church. Mr. Blankenship has been for years a very prominent man in the United Brethren church and the church record shows that he has been an earnest worker. Politically he is identified with the Democratic party.

CHARLES F. ELLERSICK.—The milling interests of the community of Comstock and the surrounding country have a capable representative in the person of Charles F. Ellersick, who has been the proprietor of a flour mill in this locality for a period of twenty-three years, and who for the last eleven years of that time has been located at Comstock. He has developed an excellent business through good management and natural ability, and at the same time has been able to serve his community efficiently in official capacities.

Mr. Ellersick was born in Hanover, Germany, September 1, 1857, and came to the United States at the age of twenty-four years. A millwright by trade, he was employed by a Milwaukee, Wisconsin, concern, for which he worked for about twelve years, during which time he had charge of the installing of the machinery for the Broken Bow flour mill, erected by his house. Mr. Ellersick was not employed at his trade from 1888 to 1895, but in the latter year he bought a flour mill from Mrs. Jenkins and Mr. Mickle, located at Wescott. He operated that mill until the railroad, passing on the east side of the river, brought into prominence the town of Comstock and practically eliminated the town of Wescott, so Mr. Ellersick wisely changed the location of his mill, in 1907, to Comstock, where it has since flourished, with a constantly increasing business. This mill has a daily capacity of sixty-five barrels, and the demand for its product at present is such that it is operating practically all the time.

Mr. Ellersick is a business man of no mean ability, and one who is thoroughly familiar with every angle of his particular line, the while he is well known to the milling trade, with an excellent reputation for integrity and fidelity in business engagements. As a citizen he has contributed generously of time, means and energy to movements for the betterment of Comstock and its people, and for several years past he has rendered valuable service as a member of the town board, his business judgment and general acumen being held in high regard by his associates. Mr. Ellersick is a Democrat in his political allegiance, and fraternally he is affiliated with the local organizations of the Masonic order and the Modern Woodmen of America, in both of which he has many friends, as he has also in business life.

At Grand Island, Nebraska, in 1885, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Ellersick to Miss Lena Stoeppelman, and they are the parents of five children, namely: Katie, the wife of George Young, engaged in agricultural pursuits near the city of Sargent; Lena, the wife of Henry Hein, the owner and operator of a farm near Westerville; Miss Emma, residing at home but engaged in teaching in the public schools at Scottsbluff; Charles, a flour miller associated with his father in business at Comstock, the maiden name of his wife having been Bernice Fretz; and Flora, who remains with her parents. Mr. and Mrs. Ellersick and their children are consistent members of the Lutheran church, which they attend at Comstock, and they liberally support all religious movements.

HAMILTON B. GLAZIER. — Nearly forty years have passed since the late Isaac Glazier drove into Custer county in true pioneer style and settled on a homestead amidst a veritable wilderness where habitations were few and where civilization was still in its primitive form. For twenty years he lived and labored, slowly and arduously developing a farm and establishing a home for his family, and watching and assisting in the advancement and progress which were making the countryside to flourish and thrive. This honored pioneer has passed from earthly scenes, but the reputation for industry and integrity which he established is being perpetuated by his children, among whom Hamilton B. Glazier and his sister are the owners of the old homestead which they operate, near Comstock.

Hamilton B. Glazier was born in Winona county, Minnesota, November 9, 1862, and is a son of Isaac and Emily (Bolen) Glazier, natives of New York state. The parents grew to maturity in the Empire state, and they were married in Illinois. Shortly after that event they moved to Winona county, Minnesota, where they settled on a new farm and carried on operations for a number of years. Not satisfied with their surroundings, and desiring a home on the newly opened frontier of Nebraska, in 1879 they drove overland in a wagon to Custer county and located in the vicinity of the site of the present village of Comstock. Like all new settlers, they were forced to meet and to overcome many obstacles and to endure numerous hardships, but they were persons of hardihood and courage and cheerfully faced all difficulties. Mrs. Glazier passed to her final rest in 1886, but her husband survived until 1898, by which time he had become the owner of a valuable property, on which were improvements of a splendid character. During his residence here Mr. Glazier set out about thirty acres of timber, one-half of which is now owned by his son. Mr. Glazier was a Republican in politics, but was active therein only as a voter, never caring for public office. He and his wife were the parents of five children, of whom three are living: Miss Lois, who makes her home with her brothers, for whom she keeps house; Hamilton B., who is the subject of this notice; and Albert, also a bachelor, who is associated with his brother in his agricultural enterprises.

Hamilton B. Glazier received his education in the common schools of Minnesota, where he was reared as are most farmers' sons, and he was about seventeen years of age when he accompanied his parents in their overland journey to Custer county. He assisted in the early and later development of the homestead, in section 4, and since the death of his father he has added a number of improvements, including buildings, machinery, equipment and stock. He carries on general farming and stock-raising and has been uniformly successful in his ventures, so that he is accounted one of the substantial men of his community. While a good citizen and a supporter of worthwhile and progressive movements, he has been content to remain a farmer and has sought no positions of public import. Mr. Glazier has never married.

JOSEPH BRYAN.—The subject of this memoir was formerly a prominent farmer of Custer county and was specially well known for the part he took in the advancement of education, religion and material progress in the part of the county in which he was located. The people in the vicinity of Ansley owe to him a debt of gratitude that will be hard to pay.

Mr. Bryan was born in Missouri, March 29, 1846, and was the first-born son of William and Caroline (Brim) Bryan, who were the parents of six children. William Bryan was of English descent and served in the Civil war until he met his death, on the battle-field of Shiloh. His wife, who also was of English descent, died in Illinois. The parents of Joseph Bryan moved to Clay county, Illinois, when he was a small boy, and there, when seventeen years of age, he enlisted in Company K, Forty-eighth Illinois Volunteer Infantry. He served three years as a valiant young soldier of the Union, and after the close of the war he returned to Illinois and engaged in farming.

On September 16, 1869, Mr. Bryan was united in marriage, at Taylorville, Illinois, to Miss Mary E. Baker, who was born in Richmond county, that state, and who is a daughter of William and Caroline (Uterback) Baker, prominent and honored citizens of this community. Mr. Baker died in Illinois and his widow was a resident of Custer county, Nebraska, at the time of her death.

Mr. and Mrs. Bryan became the parents of seven children: William B. resides in Kansas; Isabel is the wife of J. T. Wood, of Mason City, Custer county; Nettie is the wife of Grant Stevens and they live in Kansas; Alice is the wife of Luther Wilcox, and they are now living in Montana; Frank G. resides in the city of Lincoln; J. Harry, who lives on the home farm, is individually mentioned on other pages of this volume; and Robert L., who is living with his mother on the old place, and who is the owner of three shares of the home farm, having bought shares from two of the other heirs, was born July 19, 1887.

Joseph Bryan organized school district number 132 and served as a member of the school board for a number of years. He and his wife were largely instrumental in the organization of the first Sunday school in the county. Since the death of Mr. Bryan his widow has continued to reside on the old homestead and she has devoted much of her time to the improvement of the place, the development of the farm and the paying off of the mortgage, as well as caring for the members of the family who are at home. She and her son Robert have been frequent exhibitors at the county fair. In 1911 they secured twelve first and six second premiums on exhibitions of fruits, vegetables, jellies and honey. These premiums included one sweepstake.

Mr. and Mrs. Bryan came to Custer county in 1879 and lived through the hard and strenuous days marked by pioneer privations. Their first home was a dugout, and this was later supplanted by a sod house, which seemed a palace compared with the former abode. They commenced with nothing and at one time were completely destitute of anything to eat. They succeeded in borrowing ten dollars from a more favored neighbor and made the trip to Grand Island for foodstuffs. All had the measles at the same time and many other hardships fell to their lot. They had to go to Lincoln to secure household goods, but all these difficulties were eventually overcome and they pressed forward to the goal of independence and prosperity. This is a fine family and the living children to-day are a credit to the parents who reared them, besides being a valuable asset to the community in which they have their homes. Mr. Bryan died in 1892, and his good wife still survives, the while she is an honor to the motherhood of Custer county.

The son Robert, whose farming operations on the home place are mentioned above, is a very excellent young man, is a splendid farmer and has performed an admirable service for his mother. He received his early education in the district school and in all respects is qualified for excellent citizenship and for the useful service he is rendering in his home community. Upon him falls the responsibility of maintaining the old homestead.

LEWIS R. DOWSE.—Though he has not advanced far beyond the psalmist's span of three score years and ten and still possesses a full amount of physical and mental vigor, Mr. Dowse has the enviable distinction of being the first permanent settler of Custer county, arriving here in August, 1873. It can thus be realized that the memory of this honored pioneer compasses the entire gamut that has been run in the development of this section of Nebraska from a prairie wilderness to a populous and opulent district of a great commonwealth, and it is gratifying to him that he has been able to play a part in the civic and industrial progress and upbuilding of Custer county.

Lewis R. Dowse is descended from staunch New England ancestors and is a native of Middlesex county, Massachusetts, where he was born in the town of Sherborn, October 20, 1845. His parents, William and Caroline (Ware) Dowse, were natives of the same town, the father born September 3, 1815, and the date of the mother's birth having been September 3, 1820. William Dowse learned the trade of whip-making under the direction of his father, who conducted an establishment for the manufacture of whips, where a large number of people were employed. After the death of his father William Dowse turned his attention to agricultural pursuits and he was thus occupied the remainder of his life. He died in September, 1901, at the age of eighty-six years, having long survived his wife, who passed away December 27, 1847. William Dowse was a Republican in politics and he and his wife were members of the Congregational church.

Edmond Dowse, a brother of William, held the office of chaplain of the Massachusetts state senate for twenty years and was re-elected at the age of ninety, but refused to serve any longer. He spent his entire life in his native town, passing away at the age of ninety-two, and for sixty years he held the pastorate of the local church.

The subject of this record spent his boyhood days in his native village, acquiring his early education in the public schools and also attending an academy at Sherborn. As a young man he secured employment in a factory where cards were made to be used in the manufacture of cotton and woolen cloth, his intention being to learn the business. The Civil war being in progress, his patriotic spirit was aroused and he offered his services to his country. Failing to pass the physical examination the first time, he again sought to enlist when, in 1864, the last call came, and this time he was successful. He faithfully served four months—until the conflict was brought to a close. Returning to his home he began learning the trade of shoe manufacturing, following that occupation until the spring of 1868, when he decided to follow the advice of Horace Greeley, and "go west." Arriving in Iowa in the month of March, 1868, he took up the occupation of farming, and he resided in Iowa until June, 1873, when he decided to go farther west and started for Nebraska. His arrival in Custer county was in the month of August, 1873, and it has been conceded by those who have interested themselves in his torical records that he thus became the first permanent settler of the county. In 1903 the Old Settlers Association awarded Mr. and Mrs. Dowse each a medal as the first settlers. Their daughter, Mrs. Alice Sims, also was given a medal, as being the first white child born in the county.

At Montezuma, Poweshiek county, Iowa, December 21, 1869, was solemnized the marriage of Lewis R. Dowse to Miss Sarah Wagner, a native of Auglaize county, Ohio, where she was born February 23, 1854, a daughter of Samuel and Caroline (Kats) Wagner, natives of Ohio and New Jersey respectively. The parents of Mrs. Dowse accompanied their daughter and their husband to Nebraska, as far as Loup City, where they remained until the spring of 1874, when they took up their abode in Custer county.

From the standpoint of material possessions, Mr. and Mrs. Dowse were in very moderate circumstances. They had several head of cattle, a limited supply of household goods and farming implements, no money, but an abundance of energy and a determination to succeed and establish a home. Those early years were fraught with innumerable hardships and privations. The first years their crops were destroyed by grasshoppers, and only those who had the experience can realize what the grasshopper scourge amounted to.

Mr. Dowse held squatter sovereignty until he pre-empted the piece of land which has been his home to the present time. From a humble beginning this pioneer couple have labored unceasingly, and that their efforts have been crowned with success is attested by the fact that to-day Mr. Dowse holds title to 400 acres of land, well improved and under a good state of cultivation.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Dowse has been blessed with the birth of eight children and the presence of an adopted daughter: William married Florence Murphy and is a farmer near the old home; Eliza is a graduate nurse; Alice, who was the first white child born in Custer county, is the wife of Charles Sims, residing at Newkirk, Oklahoma; Lewis S. married Marie Pickel and resides in the state of Washington; Lawrence married Mabel Miner and lives near Comstock; Elmer married Elsie Day and resides on the home place; Ethel is the wife of Frank Steeple, residing at Comstock; Nellie is deceased and Faye, unmarried, is a stenographer at Seattle, Washington.

A recital of some of the experiences and incidents that have come to this pioneer couple may help the readers of this volume to realize that forty-five years have come and gone since they took up their abode here. This was unorganized territory at that time and taxes were paid to Valley county, this being considered a loan, and the money being refunded after the organization of the new county. This was known as Kountz county at first, named after a firm of pioneer bankers in Omaha. Later it was called Garber county, after Governor Garber. The present name was adopted in honor of that gallant Indian fighter, General Custer. At the time of the Custer massacre the settlers in this neighborhood became much alarmed and some of them left here and went to Fort Kearney. Those who remained built a fort of sod and oak and cedar logs, and petitioned the government to equip the "Organized Rangers" with guns to protect the fort. But as they were never molested by the Indians the fort, which had been erected in section 15 of this township, never had to be used. The Indians caused the greatest alarm to the early settlers. Mrs. Dowse recalls that about the time of the Indian troubles in Montana, four Pawnees walked up to the house one evening while her husband was away. They claimed four ponies had been stolen by another tribe and they were in search of them. These four stayed all night at the home of a neighbor and the next morning the Indians asked for a writing of some kind to prove to other settlers that they were friendly. The neighbor gave them this note, "These are friendly Indians; grease them and let them slide." The spot where Mr. Dowse established his homestead had been the camping ground of Indians, and here numerous relics have been found. They have also discovered many holes in the ground in the shape of jugs, probably used by the Indians in curing meat.

Levia. R. Stone

Sarah. M. Stone.

But times have changed and what was a wild, rolling prairie is now dotted with innumerable farms, with here and there thriving villages; schools and churches have been built and Custer county is a much better place in which to live than when Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Dowse came here more than forty-five years ago, while in the work of transformation they have contributed their full share. They are members of the Congregational church and Mr. Dowse is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, thus maintaining pleasant relations with the few remaining veterans of the Civil war. In politics he has always given allegiance to the Republican party—the party which stood for a united country and has always been the party for progress and reform. When the history of Custer county is completed and the life record of its people written, no record will be found more worthy of a place in its pages, and none will be of greater inspiration to future generations, than that of the first family who made permanent location in Custer county.

LILBURN F. OXFORD, local manager of the business of the Dierks Lumber & Coal Company at Comstock, has the distinction of having been the second male white child born within the borders of Custer county, where he was reared to manhood, so that it is evident few citizens of the county at the present time have more fully witnessed the transitions, the splendid development and progress, in this now favored and opulent section of the state of Nebraska. As a child and youth he gained his share of experience in connection with the hardships and other unpropitious conditions marking the pioneer epoch in the history of Custer county, and he has kept pace with the march of progress in his native county, where he has been actively and successfully identified with both agricultural and commercial enterprise. As manager for the Dierks Lumber & Coal Company's business at Comstock, he is essentially one of the representative and influential business men of this thriving village.

Mr. Oxford was born in Douglas Grove, Custer county, on the 22d of July, 1876, and is a son of James L. and Laura B. (Henderson) Oxford, the former a native of the state of New York and the latter of Eagleville, Harrison county, Missouri. In the spring of 1874 James L. Oxford came from Missouri to Custer county, where he took up a pre-emption claim immediately west of the present side of the village of Comstock. In the autumn of the same year he returned to his old home in Missouri, and in the following spring he came with his family to Custer county, where he took a homestead near Walworth. He improved this property and there continued his farming and ranching operations until 1883, when he established his residence at Broken Bow and engaged in the livery business. There his wife died, in the spring of 1884, and he then returned to his farm, upon which he continued to reside until 1895, when he divided his Custer county landed interests among his children. He then removed to Oregon, where he purchased 640 acres of land and where he engaged in the raising of Angora goats and a good grade of cattle and where he still maintains his home. A Republican in politics, Mr. Oxford has taken a lively interest in public affairs, and while he has never had any ambition for public office he served two years as county commissioner of Custer county, an office to which he was elected in the late '70s. His religious faith is that of the Baptist church.

James L. and Laura B. (Henderson) Oxford became the parents of seven children, all of whom are living except one: Myrtle is the wife of Leonard R. Hersh, a farmer near Broken Bow; Mary E. is the wife of Albert Blessing, a farmer near Walworth, this county; Daisy met an accidental and tragic death by the overturning of a container of scalding water, about 1879, when she was a child; Lilburn F., of this review, was the next in order of birth; Charles, who is still a bachelor, is a farmer and sheep-raiser in South Dakota; Fred is married and is a prosperous ranchman in that state; and Albert N., who married May Waters, is likewise an exponent of agricultural and live-stock enterprise in South Dakota.

For his second wife James L. Oxford married Ella R. Ballinger, and they became the parents of five children, all of who are living: Clay is proprietor of a meat market at Brownsville, Oregon; Edward and Earl are farmers in that locality; Sylvia remains at the parental home; and Flossie is the wife of an Oregon ranchman.

After having duly profited by the advantages of the public schools of Custer county, Lilburn F. Oxford was for one year a student in the Broken Bow Business College. It is interesting to record that the first school which he attended was that of district No. 13, and the little sod schoolhouse, constructed in 1883, was located on land belonging to his father, the first teacher in this school having been Mrs. Thomas Lampman. The first school-teacher in that vicinity, however, was Mr. A. N. Peale, who conducted a select school in fall of 1880. In 1889 the log schoolhouse mentioned was replaced by a frame structure, and this latter building was destroyed by a cyclone, in 1898, while school was in session. One pupil, Eva Fowler, was blown through a door of the building and against the school flag-pole, the injury causing her death. Other pupils were severely injured but this one was the only fatality.

After completing his youthful education Mr. Oxford was engaged in farming during one year, but at this time the inception of the Spanish-American war led him to subordinate all personal interests to the call of patriotism, and he enlisted for service in that conflict. He became a member of the First Nebraska Volunteer Infantry, with which he served eighteen months. In an engagement in Marilao he received a flesh wound, and he proved a loyal and efficient soldier. After having been granted his honorable discharge from military service Mr. Oxford returned to the farm, where he continued operations for the ensuing two years. He then accepted the position of manager of the business of the Dierks Lumber & Coal Company at Berwyn, and he has since continued his association with this representative concern, with which he has made an admirable record, his transfer to the management of the company's business at Comstock having occurred in 1915. He has done much to further the success of the company's business and is known as one of the reliable, energetic and progressive business men of his native county, as well as a loyal and public-spirited citizen. He gives his political allegiance to the Republican party but has never manifested any office-seeking proclivities.

June 25, 1903, recorded the marriage of Mr. Oxford to Miss Madge Hersh, at St. Joseph Missouri. Mrs. Oxford is a daughter of George and Minnie (McWilliams) Hersh, who came to Custer county in 1886 and purchased land four miles east of Broken Bow. Mr. and Mrs. Oxford have two children—Iola, born August 19, 1908, and Lilburn N., born April 14, 1912.

ROBERT E. WATERS, who retired from the office of county clerk of Custer county in January, 1919, was, until his election to this office, a successful farmer and stock-raiser in the vicinity of Broken Bow. He still retains his holdings, but after assuming his official duties he gave more attention to the latter than to his agricultural work, the while he showed just as marked capability as an executive as he did as a tiller of the soil. Mr. Waters was born in Clark county, Missouri, March 12, 1878, a son of George O. and Elvira (Story) Waters, the former a native of Ohio and the latter of Missouri.

Isom Waters, the paternal grandfather of Mr. Waters, was born in Kentucky and at an early day became a pioneer of Missouri, later moving to Custer county, Nebraska, where he passed his last years. The maternal grandfather, Greenberry Story, also was a Kentuckian and an early settler of Missouri, where he passed away after a career passed in farming. George O. Waters was born and educated in Ohio, where he was reared as a farmer, and as a young man he went to Missouri, where he married. In May, 1879, he came to Nebraska and homesteaded land in Custer county, continuing to be engaged in agricultural pursuits until his retirement, when he was the owner of a half-section of land, all of which had been self-gained through industrious labor and good business methods and judgment. He took a somewhat prominent part in public affairs, having served as deputy clerk of the district court for four and one-half years, as well as town assessor and supervisor, and having established a good record. He was known as a leader in the local ranks of the Republican party, while fraternally he became affiliated with the Knights of Pythias. He and his wife are now residents of Bakersfield, California, and they are members of the Methodist Episcopal church. They became the parents of nine children, of whom six survive: W. W., who is an agricultural implement dealer at Broken Bow; C. F., who is engaged in dealing in stock-food at Des Moines, Iowa; Robert E., subject of this review; G. H., a farmer of Bakersfield, California; C. S., assistant chief of police at Bakersfield; and Elvira Mae, the wife of Albert Oxford, a stockman and farmer of Oxford, South Dakota.

A child when brought to Custer county, Robert E. Waters secured his education in the public schools of Broken Bow, and when ready to enter upon his independent career he chose farming and stock-raising as the medium for his success in the business of life. He was thus engaged when the Spanish-American war broke out, and he enlisted in Company M, First Nebraska Volunteer Infantry, which command was sent to the Philippine Islands, where he took part in three battles. Upon his return to this country he received an honorable discharge and resumed his labors as a farmer and stockman, continuing to be so engaged until 1915, the year of his first election to the office of clerk of Custer county. His first term was decidedly satisfactory to the voters of this county, who gave him the re-election in 1917, and he continued to be known as one of his county's most capable and popular officials until normal political exigencies compassed his defeat for re-election in the autumn of 1918.

In March, 1905, Mr. Waters married Miss Clara Daniel, who was born in Custer county, South Dakota, a daughter of J. M. and Belle (White) Daniel, the latter now deceased, and the former a retired resident of Riverton, Wyoming. Mr. and Mrs. Waters have six children—George, Mildred, Lena, Elvira, Mary, and Riley. The first four children are attending school.

Mr. Waters is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Modern Woodmen of America, in the former of which he has passed the various official chairs. He is a Democrat in politics, in which he has always taken an active part, and his influence is counted upon, and not in vain, during elections. He continues to cultivate his land near Broken Bow, but rather in an advisory than in an active way, his official duties having received his chief attention.

CLAY HARRY, manager of the Broken Bow branch of the Nebraska Telephone Company, became identified with this line of business in 1917, after several years of journalistic labor. During his college days he had shown a talent for matters pertaining to the newspaper field, and when he entered upon his career it was in this line of endeavor; but business life in another direction claimed him eventually, and he is making a decided success of his present activities. Mr. Harry is a Nebraskan by nativity, having been born on a farm in Hayes county, February 28, 1888, a son of Thomas Milton and Flora (Wright) Harry.

Thomas Milton Harry was born in Illinois, a son of Thomas Smith Harry, who passed the larger part of his life in that state. As a young man Thomas M. Harry went to Shenandoah, Iowa, where he married Miss Wright, a native of Ohio and daughter of Thomas Wright of Fairbury, Illinois. In 1885 Mr. and Mrs. Harry came to Nebraska and settled in Hayes county, Mr. Harry homesteading and eventually perfecting title to a claim near Palisade. He continued to be engaged in farming until 1893, in which year he was elected clerk of Hayes county, an office which he retained for four years, and after the expiration of his term he was engaged in the grain and elevator business for a number of years, in the meantime serving four years as assessor of Hitchcock county, Nebraska. He next moved to Texas, but after a short stay in the Lone Star state he disposed of his interests there and purchased a small farm in the neighborhood of Springfield, Missouri, where he and Mrs. Harry now make their home. They are the parents of four children—Zelma, the wife of Harris Fuller, a farmer of near Springfield; Clay, subject of this sketch; Phebe, the wife of Jesse L. Barlow, a farmer and stockman near Red Cloud, Nebraska; and Wayne R., residing with his parents. Mr. and Mrs. Harry are members of the Christian Science church. He is a Republican in politics and a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in which he has passed the various official chairs.

The early education of Clay Harry was obtained in the public schools of Hayes Center and Palisade, and he was graduated from the high school with honors. Following this, he entered Doane Academy, where he was graduated with the highest honors of the class of 1907. Becoming a student of Doane College, at Crete, Nebraska, he took a four years' course, his college career being a brilliant one, in which he gained numerous honors, being editor of the college paper for two terms and getting out the annual college publication in the year 1911. In his senior year he engaged in the newspaper business, as one of the owners of the Vidette-Herald, with which he was identified for two years. He then went to Central City, Nebraska, where he purchased the Central City Nonpareil. He was the owner and editor of this publication for twenty-one months, and he then returned to Crete, where he spent a short time in a job-printing office. Following this, he went to Holdrege, Nebraska, where he took charge of the Holdrege Citizen and remained one year. In 1917 Mr. Harry deserted the newspaper business to enter the service of the Nebraska Telephone Company, and in December of that year he came to Broken Bow, where he was made manager. He has since devoted his undivided attention to the duties of this post, and has succeeded not only in giving the people of the community prompt and accurate service, but also in advancing the company's interests materially.

April 9, 1915, Mr. Harry married Miss Esther Hollenbeck, who was born in Kearney county, Nebraska, daughter of John H. and Ida M. (Eastwood) Hollenbeck, early settlers of that county. Mr. Hollenbeck, who is now a traveling salesman, is a son of a veteran of the Civil war. To Mr. and Mrs. Harry there has come one daughter: Rosamond Ida. They are members of the Congregational church at Crete, where Mr. Harry belongs to the Masonic blue lodge. At Broken Bow he is an active member of the Public Service Club, and his military record includes membership from 1908 to 1911 in Company H, First Regiment, Nebraska National Guard. His political tendencies make him a Democrat.

BURRITT W. KIMBALL, a well known general farmer and stock-raiser near Broken Bow, has been a resident of Custer county for nineteen years and during this time has devoted himself continuously to agricultural pursuits, his industry, thorough methods and good judgment bringing about very substantial results. Mr. Kimball was born in Benton county, Iowa, April 11, 1875. His parents, both now deceased, were Hollis S. and Mary (Dorsey) Kimball.

The paternal grandfather, George Kimball, who was born in Vermont, removed with his family to Iowa during the boyhood of his son Hollis S., and spent the remainder of his life in that state. The maternal grandfather was Beal Dorsey, who died in Iowa, in early manhood. Hollis S. Kimball accompanied his parents from Vermont to Iowa, but a number of years later he came to Knox county, Nebraska, where he secured a homestead claim. He eventually proved up on this claim, and he continued to live on that homestead for twenty-five years. During the Civil war he served three years as a member of the Third Iowa Cavalry. In later life he moved to California, and his death took place in the city of Los Angeles. In his early political life he was a Republican but later identified himself with the Populist party. To his marriage with Mary Dorsey, who was born in Iowa, five children were born, and three of them survive — Nina, who is the wife of Frank Deitz, a farmer in Knox county; Burritt W., who is the subject of this sketch; and Willis, who is a farmer near Sioux City, Iowa.

Burritt W. Kimball attended school in Knox county and completed his school course at Niobrara. He has always been interested along agricultural lines and was already an experienced farmer when he came to Custer county, his first purchase of land being 280 acres, since then increasing to 440 acres. He has improved his property and has commodious and substantial buildings. May 26, 1897, recorded the marriage of Mr. Kimball to Miss Florence B. Johnson, who was born at Fulton, Illinois, and is a daughter of Dwight Johnson, a manufacturer of stock and hog food, at Omaha. Mr. and Mrs. Kimball have four children: Delisle, Thelma, and Margaret and Ione (twins.) Mrs. Kimball is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, as are also all of the children. In politics Mr. Kimball is a Republican and fraternally he is affiliated with the Modern Woodmen of America.

ALBERT R. CHRISMAN, a man of large estate and high personal standing in Custer county, retired from his farm to Broken Bow in 1915 but still carries on his farm industries and continues the raising of horses and mules on a large scale. He is one of the county's substantial business men.

Albert R. Chrisman was born in Lafayette county, Missouri, September 28, 1858, and is a son of Joseph M. and Lucy B. (Richardson) Chrisman, the former of whom was born in Virginia, in 1833, and the latter in 1840. They were married in Virginia, lived many years in Missouri, and both died in Nebraska, the mother in 1890 and the father in 1913.

The paternal grandfather, Joseph Chrisman, was a pioneer from Virginia to Missouri, making his prospecting trip on horseback, and about 1837 conveying his family across the country by wagon. He was a farmer and stockman and died in Missouri. His son, Joseph M., accompanied him to Missouri in 1837 but subsequently returned to Virginia, where he was married to Lucy B. Richardson, a daughter of Marcus Richardson, who spent his life on his Virginia plantation. To this marriage the following children were born: Lizzie, who is the wife of R. B. Sargent, of Custer county; Albert R.; M. J., a retired farmer of Broken Bow; Lucy, who is the wife of Geo. Sweeney, of Scheduling, Nebraska; H. E., of Broken Bow; Hattie, who is the wife of Sam Tooley, of Broken Bow; Samuel, who is deceased; and Jennie Ruth, who is a trained nurse. In 1883 the family came to Nebraska and homesteaded in Custer county. The parents were members of the Presbyterian church.

Albert R. Chrisman had school privileges in Missouri. He gave his father assistance on the farm and when the family came to Nebraska he helped to bring, with other stock, 150 head of cows, and for many years he continued to be largely interested in stock. He owns large bodies of land in the state, including a section in Blaine county and 480 acres in Custer county, north of Broken Bow.

November 20, 1889, recorded the marriage of Mr. Chrisman to Emma D. Tooley, a daughter of William W. and Lucy A. Tooley, who came to Nebraska in 1884, from Indiana, and who reside at Broken Bow. Mr. and Mrs. Chrisman have five children—Ray, who resides on the home farm; Chester A., who is, at the time of this writing, a soldier in the national army; and Lucy, Mary and Joseph. Mrs. Chrisman belongs to the Methodist Episcopal church. Mr. Chrisman is a member of the Woodmen and is independent in politics.

ROBERT R. DUNCAN, president of the Bank of Merna, is one of the leading business men and financiers of Custer county.

Mr. Duncan is a native of the Empire state, born at Buffalo, New York, February 17, 1857. His parents, James and Christine (Ross) Duncan, were natives of Scotland, coming to America when young people, and were married in New York, where they made their home until 1857, when they became residents of Iroquois county, Illinois, where James Duncan became a successful farmer. The remainder of their lives was spent in Iroquois county, where the mother died in 1885 and the father in 1908. They were the parents of six sons and six daughters, and they lived to see their children all grow to maturity and become useful members of society.

Robert R. Duncan was the youngest of the boys of the family and the last to leave the parental roof. He was reared on a farm and attended the public schools in the acquirement of his early education, later attending the Indiana Normal School at Valparaiso. For five years he taught school in Iroquois county, Illinois, and in 1888 he came to Custer county, Nebraska, where he engaged in the hardware business with R. J. Kelly and T. F. Kelly, at Merna. This was eighteen months after the railroad had come, and he was one of the pioneer merchants of the town, continuing in the hardware business successfully until 1903. In 1905 he helped organize the Home Bank of Merna and became cashier of the institution, remaining in that position until 1916, when the Home Bank and the Bank of Merna consolidated and Mr. Duncan became president, thus having been the active chief executive of the institution for the past thirteen years. This is one of the strong financial institutions of Custer county, its stockholders and directors being numbered among the substantial men of Nebraska.

At Ashkum, Illinois, on May 5, 1890, was celebrated the marriage of Robert R. Duncan and Miss Agnes McDonald, a native of Chicago, Illinois, and a daughter of Alex and Catherine McDonald, natives of Scotland, who became early settlers of Iroquois county, Illinois, where both passed away.

Mr. and Mrs. Duncan are members of the United Brethren church. Mr. Duncan is a member of Merna Lodge No. 171, Ancient Free & Accepted Masons and has received the thirty-second degree in Scottish Rite Masonry, besides being affiliated with Tangier Temple, Nobles of the Mystic Shrine, at Omaha. He also holds membership in the Merna organizations of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Modern Woodmen of America, and the Royal Highlanders.

Mr. Duncan has been a resident and business man of Merna for more than thirty years, arriving here when it was a village of 200 population, and he has taken a commendable interest in those things which have had to do with the growth and upbuilding of the community. Having faith in the future of Custer county as an agricultural district, he has invested in and is the owner of 1,120 acres of Custer county land. While making a success of his own enterprises, he has not been remiss in duties of citizenship and is held in high esteem and respect by all who know him.

ROBERT J. KELLY, a pioneer settler of Custer county, was born in La Salle county, Illinois, October 29, 1856. His parents, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Kelly, had emigrated from Ireland and had likewise made a pioneer home in the Prairie state when Illinois was in that stage of its history.

Mr. Kelly's boyhood days were spent on a farm in Iroquois county, Illinois. He married Elizabeth Carey, also of Iroquois county. In 1885 Mr. and Mrs. Kelly came to Custer county and took a homestead in Dale valley. For several years Mr. Kelly was engaged in the mercantile business and later managed a grain business in Merna. Since 1900 he has been engaged in the real-estate business at Merna, and in the years of his residence in the county he has taken commendable interest in those projects which have had to do with the development and progress of the county. He is the owner of a ranch of 800 acres and he has been successful in his business ventures.

Mr. and Mrs. Kelly are the parents of five children—three sons and two daughters—and all have grown to maturity in Custer county.

ALBERT J. VAN ANTWERP.—During the past ten years the office of surveyor of Custer county has been occupied by Albert Jason Van Antwerp, whose services have been of such efficiency as to preclude any idea of a successor being named in his stead. He is also a well known farmer and stock-raiser of his native county. He was born on his father's homestead in Custer county, July 4, 1882, and is a son of Francis Edward and Esther Alice (Lathrop) Van Antwerp.

The Van Antwerp family is of Holland Dutch origin, and for several generations lived in New York state. Francis Edward Van Antwerp was born at St. Charles, Illinois, the third one of five brothers. There he grew to manhood, and there his marriage occurred, his wife being a native of Roscoe, that state. In 1880, with their first-born son, L. J. Van Antwerp, they journeyed to Nebraska in pioneer style, with a covered wagon, and took up a homestead in Custer county. Upon the pioneer farm the father passed the remainder of his life, and he was successful in the accumulation and cultivation of a tract of 320 acres. He died January 29, 1917. Mr. Van Antwerp was one of the well known men of his community, and for a number of years, off and on, forward from 1884, he occupied the office of county surveyor, or deputy, in addition to which, in 1890 and 1900, he took the census of Wood River township. He was a Republican in his political views, and fraternally was affiliated with the Odd Fellows, the Camp of the Modern Woodmen, and the Knights of Pythias. Mr. and Mrs. Van Antwerp were the parents of five sons—Louis J., who is operating a farm in the vicinity of Lodi, Nebraska; Albert J., who is the subject of this sketch; Charles Edward Arthur, who resides with his mother on the old homestead; Major Ernest A., who farms near Lodi; and Merle S., who is identified with milling interests in Calloway.

After attending the public schools of Custer county, Albert J. Van Antwerp adopted the profession of educator, and for two terms he was engaged in instructing the young in the country districts. He then entered the normal school at Fremont, from which he was graduated in 1904, and in that same year he became a student at the University of Nebraska, which he attended through 1904 and 1905. When his education was completed, he came to Broken Bow and became deputy county surveyor under his father, a position which he retained about five years. In 1909 he succeeded his father in office, and each two years since that time he has been re-elected. His record in office is an exceptionally good one, a statement which is hardly necessary, in view of the fact of his repeated elections. A Republican in politics he is accounted one of the strong and influential members of his party in the county. While the duties of office have absorbed a large share of his attention, Mr. Van Antwerp has still found time to devote to business matters, in which he has achieved somewhat more than ordinary success. The owner of a splendid ranch of 400 acres, he is extensively engaged in raising live stock, and has recently started to concentrate his energies in this direction in breeding full-blooded Hereford cattle.

In 1905 Mr. Van Antwerp married Miss Marie Eneboe, who was born at Canton, South Dakota, a daughter of Paul J. Eneboe. Mr. Eneboe, who was one of the early homesteaders of South Dakota, experienced many of the hardships of frontier life, and during his earlier years was compelled to transport his grain seventy miles in order to find a market, at Sioux City, Iowa, his means of conveyance being an ox-team. Mr. and Mrs. Van Antwerp are the parents of two daughters—Iris Olivet and Avis, both attending public school. The family belongs to the Presbyterian church, and Mr. Van Antwerp is affiliated fraternally with the Masons and Odd Fellows, in the latter of which he has passed all the official chairs of the local lodge.

CHARLES PENN. — The experiences of Charles Penn, now a member of the retired colony of Broken Bow, have ranged through the pursuits of war and peace, and have included mining in Colorado and Mexico, blacksmithing and machinist work in Nebraska, and large sheep operations in which he occupied a leading and prominent place among the ranchers of his section. His career has been a long, useful, and eminently successful one, and, in his declining years, he may look back with a measure of pardonable pride over his accomplishments.

Mr. Penn was born in Morgan county, Ohio, November 22, 1846, a son of Caleb P. and Margaret (Newhouse) Penn, natives of Pennsylvania. Caleb P. Penn was a son of Reason Penn, who took his family to Morgan county, Ohio, at an early day, and there the father of Charles Penn was educated, grew to manhood, and was married. In 1850 Caleb Penn removed to Linn county, Iowa, where he settled down to agricultural pursuits, but in the evening of life he retired from active affairs and took up his residence at Broken Bow, with his son, at whose home both he and Mrs. Penn passed away. They were the parents of four children, of whom two survive — Charles and George, the latter a traveling salesman, with headquarters at Kansas City. Mr. Penn was reared a Quaker, while his wife was a member of the Christian church. He was a Whig originally in his political views, but with the birth of the Republican party he became an adherent of its principles.

The education of Charles Penn was acquired with some difficulty, as it was necessary that he walk three miles to and from the Iowa district school of his community, but in the meantime he also was able to learn much of the blacksmith and machinist's trades. The Civil war came on to interrupt his career, and, although he was little more than a lad, he enlisted, in 1862, in Company H, Twenty-fourth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, with which he served nearly three years. He fought with a command which took part in some of the bloodiest and hardest-fought battles of the great struggle between the north and the south, but his recollection of the hottest fight of them all was that of Champion Hill, where his regiment lost 676 during the time, out of the 1,018 men never returning. On his return from the war, the brave young soldier resumed his trades of machinist and blacksmith, both of which he fully mastered, and finally he settled at York, Nebraska, where he opened a shop for the pursuance of his vocations. He was successful in his efforts, and in 1882 he came to Broken Bow, gave up his regular trades, and turned his attention exclusively to the buying and selling of sheep, a field in which he had acquired some previous experience. This was something entirely different from his mining experiences in Colorado and old Mexico, his working at his trades, or his wearing of his country's uniform, but just as he had been successful in the other avenues of endeavor, so did he become prosperous in his operations along this line, and by 1883 he had 24,000 sheep and a large and valuable ranch. He continued to be actively interested in this field and to have large holdings in other enterprises and industries until 1907, when he retired from active affairs and transferred business burdens to younger shoulders.

Mr. Penn was married December 25, 1865, to Miss Emily Swecker, who was born in Wisconsin, a daughter of an early Iowa settler. Mrs. Penn died October 12, 1888, having been the mother of ten children, of whom seven are living: W. H., a sketch of whom appears elsewhere in this work; Effie Stephenson, of Edgemont, South Dakota; Nellie Brown, of Leaf City, South Dakota; Melvin, of Butte city, Montana; Ellsworth, also of that place; Clara Shocker, of Stanton, Nebraska; and Ed, engaged in carpentry at Broken Bow. Mr. Penn was again married January 1, 1890, when he was united with Miss Laura Wood, a native of England, and they have two children: Warren, of Los Angeles, California, a general salesman for the Hudson Automobile Company; and Edith, in the employ of the Burlington Railroad Company, at Lincoln. Mrs. Penn is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church. Mr. Penn is affiliated with the blue lodge and chapter of the Masonic fraternity. He is a Republican in politics, and on several occasions has held public office, having been city marshal while a resident of York, and sheriff of Custer county from 1885 to 1890, during which time he established a splendid record for efficiency, conscientious performance of duty, and unwavering courage.

HENRY B. LANDIS, M. D. — The professional labors of Dr. Henry B. Landis, at Broken Bow, have covered a period of seven years, during which time he has firmly established himself as a thorough, skilled, and learned practitioner. This honored member of the Custer county medical profession was born near Burlington, Iowa, April 13, 1874, a son of Peter E. and Elizabeth (Fetrow) Landis.

The paternal grandfather of Doctor Landis was Henry Landis, a native of Virginia, who migrated to Iowa and died in the latter state, while on the maternal side, the Doctor is descended from a Holland Dutch ancestor. Peter E. Landis was born in Virginia, June 1, 1848, and was a child when taken to Iowa. There he grew to manhood, and when the Civil war came on he was one of the youths who swelled the Hawkeye state's fighting ranks. As a member of Company A, Nineteenth Iowa Volunteer Infantry, he fought gallantly for two years and nine months. He then resumed the duties of peace, in a regular, honorable, and industrious manner, which eventuated in his securing compensating awards. He remained as a resident of Iowa until 1884, when he purchased a farm near St. Joseph, Missouri, where he still resides, as one of his community's most highly esteemed residents. Mr. Landis is a Republican, and belongs to the Christian church, which represents also the religious faith of his wife. Mrs. Landis was born at Burlington, Iowa, November 9, 1853, and their union, at Wapello, Iowa, has been blessed by the birth of eight children, of whom five are living: Henry B.; Mary Kathryn, the wife of C. F. Remus, a merchant of Maryville, Missouri; Lowrie F., who resides at the home place; Alice Cary, the wife of Lawrence Brunn, a farmer near St. Joseph; and Fern, residing with her parents.

The public schools of St. Joseph furnished Henry B. Landis with his preliminary educational training, and following his graduation from the high school there he entered the Central Medical College. His diploma and degree of Doctor of Medicine were granted him in 1896, and in that year he commenced practice at St. Joseph. Two years of interne work at Chicago and a post-graduate course in a polytechnic school gave Doctor Landis further preparation and added to the professional equipment which he brought to Broken Bow in 1911. His reputation, gained at St. Joseph, and at King City, Missouri, where he was located prior to coming to the county seat of Custer county, has been strengthened and solidified by his professional achievements at Broken Bow. He has the confidence of a large clientele, and a high standing among his brethren of the profession. His professional labors are of a general character, as he is equally at home in any branch of his calling. As one who keeps fully abreast of the advancements and progress made in medicine and surgery, Doctor Landis is a close student, and in this connection he is interested in the work of the American Medical Association, the Nebraska State Medical Society, and the Custer County Medical Society. He is a Republican in politics, and is affiliated with the Masonic fraternity, in which he is a Knight Templar. His religious faith is that of the Christian church.

In 1900 Doctor Landis married Miss Julia Elizabeth Jackley, who died, without issue, in 1907. He was again married in 1909, when he was united with Miss Lennis May Tanner, a native of Missouri. They have one daughter, Helen Elizabeth, who is attending school.

ALFRED C. SLOGGETT.—Prominent among the retired agriculturists of Broken Bow is Alfred C. Sloggett, who came to Custer county in 1886 and whose career in this state has been marked by advancement from a humble position to one of independence. Alfred Cole Sloggett was born in the village of Granby, Canada, March 13, 1853, a son of William and Bathania (Horner) Sloggett, the former a native of England and the latter of New York state.

William Sloggett was a cabinetmaker and wagonmaker by trade, and also conducted a store in Canada, which he did also after removing to Illinois, in 1856. Mrs. Sloggett died at Forreston, that state, about the close of the Civil war, having been the mother of twelve children, of whom four survive—William, a farmer of Ogle county, Illinois; Alfred C., of this sketch; John, a farmer of Whiteside county, Illinois; and James, formerly a farmer and merchant, and for the past twelve years engaged in the restaurant business at Broken Bow. William Sloggett was married a second time, at Forreston, Illinois, and four children were born of this union: Vivian, a clerk in a store at Fremont, Nebraska; Mourteaville, a North Dakota farmer; Mrs. Anna Kerlin, a widow, of Fremont; and Mrs. Pegden, whose husband is a farmer in the vicinity of that city.

Alfred C. Sloggett was but three years of age when brought by his parents to the United States, and his early boyhood was passed at Forreston, Illinois. His mother died when he was but eleven years of age and after that conditions at home were not pleasant for the lad, who ran away when he was fifteen, and who, for about a year and one-half, worked for John Kaline, at Woosung, Illinois, thirty-five miles from home. He saved his money and outfitted himself with clothes, made his way to Clinton, Iowa, and secured a position in a sawmill, but this did not prove congenial and after six months he resigned and found employment with a farmer named Church, with whom he remained four years, at twenty-five dollars a month—about ten dollars a month more than common wages at that time. In the meantime he attended the country school during the winter months. A longing to see some of his kinsfolk whom he had left behind, led him back to Illinois, where he had been given up for dead, but after a short visit he returned to Iowa, where he worked a year at gardening. Once more going to Illinois, he began working for his brother, Willian Sloggett, with whom he remained three years, following which he went to the home of Ed Bricknell, where he boarded, and during that year he farmed about forty acres of corn, on his own account. While he had been working for his brother Mr. Sloggett had become acquainted with Miss Emma Miller, a daughter of Manuel Miller, of Ogle county, and they were married September 15, 1877, at West Grove. They resided in Illinois about seven years, when, inspired by the stories heard of the west, Mr. Sloggett came to Custer county, Nebraska, where, about seven miles north of Broken Bow, he contested a farm of 160 acres. He returned to Illinois, where he remained about one year, and then came back and filed on the homestead. In 1886, with his wife and four children, Perry, Bessie, Charlie, and George, he came to make a home and accumulate a competency. At this time his possessions consisted chiefly of a few horses, which died the same year, and it was necessary that he find employment, in order to support his family while getting a start. Accordingly he assisted in putting in the railroad switches, and he also freighted oats about 100 miles up the line to where they were building the railroad. Mr. Sloggett has numerous reminiscences of these days. He tells of fording the river and of shooting prairie chickens and once in a while a deer. The next year he took up farming, and everything went well until the dry year of 1894, which brought about hard times. The family home was a sod house, as were the schoolhouses, and Mr. Sloggett assisted in the building of two of the latter. On this pioneer homestead the remaining children of the family were born: Edith, Hattie, Harvey, Annie, Orville, and Everett, of whom Annie and Orville are deceased. Perry, who farms his father's homestead, seven miles west of Broken Bow, in the Union valley, married a daughter of Charles Jenkins; Bessie A. is the wife of Joseph Loyd, an implement salesman of Broken Bow; Mrs. Edith Rosler is the wife of a very prosperous farmer eight miles east of Broken Bow; Hattie is the wife of Clyde Bates, a farmer nine miles northwest of Broken Bow; George A., a farmer three miles south and one mile west of Anselmo, married a Miss Rotton; Charles is single and a farmer; Harvey M. was taken into the United States service during the first draft, being first with Company D, 355th Regiment, at Camp Funsten, later going to Virginia and being assigned to Company F, Fourth Infantry, and finally being sent as a member of our heroic forces in France; and Everett is in the eleventh grade of the Broken Bow public school.

In 1902 Mr. Sloggett and his family moved to the Skelton place, about ten miles northeast of Broken Bow, where they lived more than two years, and in the spring of 1905 they moved again, this time to the Adams school section, four miles east of town. During the eight years that they resided there numerous fine crops were raised and Mr. Sloggett got a good start, but finally he tired of farming hill country, and this caused another change, the family moving to the old Rogers ranch, about one and one-half miles east of Broken Bow. After six years Mr. Sloggett retired from active pursuits and took up his residence in his modern and commodious home at Broken Bow, where he has every convenience. He is still the owner of 368 acres of valuable land and his other wise investments have made him one of his community's substantial men. Mr. Sloggett is a Republican, and served as road overseer for three years. He has been connected with the Modern Woodmen of America for twenty-five years. Mrs. Sloggett and all the children belong to the Methodist Episcopal church.

L. EMMETT COLE. — One of the old established and highly reputable undertaking establishments of Custer county is that conducted by L. Emmett Cole, who, during a period of twenty-three years at Broken Bow, has placed himself firmly in the confidence of the people. He was born at Carlinville, Macoupin county, Illinois, October 8, 1857, and is a son of William D. and Aramanda (Bailey) Cole.

William D. Cole was born in 1829, in Kentucky, was there reared and educated, and there he married Miss Bailey, the daughter of a Kentucky farmer. They moved from their native state to Illinois not long after their marriage, Mr. Cole being engaged in farming there for a number of years, but after their retirement from the active pursuits of life they went to Boise, Idaho, where they passed away, their deaths being but three weeks apart. They were faithful members of the Methodist church, and Mr. Cole was a Mason and a Republican. Of their children, five are living: L. Emmett; Libbie, who is the wife of John Neal, a real-estate broker of San Francisco, California; Susie, the wife of Ed House, a real-estate and insurance broker of Broken Bow; William D., a druggist of Portland, Oregon, who married Madge Womsley, of West Union, Custer county; and Fred B., who has charge of the North Wind Lumber Company, of Carson, Washington.

When L. Emmett Cole was still a lad his parents moved to Champaign county, Illinois, and there, in the public schools of Champaign, he received his education. He was an industrious youth, and his first money was earned in working on a broom-corn ranch, but subsequently he learned the painter's trade, to which he devoted a number of years of his life. He remained in Illinois until the year 1887, when he came to Broken Bow, and while still carrying on his business as a painter he learned the undertaking and embalming business. In 1895 he went to work for W. J. Woods, of Broken Bow, and this association continued for ten years, when Mr. Cole engaged in the undertaking business in an independent way. He has since carried on the business alone. Mr. Cole has conducted his business in a manner that has won to him the respect and confidence of the people of his community, and for this reason he is widely called upon for his services during times of death, his duties having taken him as far west on the Burlington Railroad as Ashby, and as far east as Mason City. He has an up-to-date establishment in every particular, with every convenience and all equipment for the proper care of the dead in a reverent manner, and features of his business are his chapel and his automobile service, including automobile hearse. Mr. Cole is a Modern Woodman, an Odd Fellow, and an Elk.

In 1886, at Champaign, Illinois, just before coming to Nebraska, Mr. Cole married Miss Emma Price, her father being a successful contractor and builder. To this union there were born four children: Mabel, who is the wife of Homer Desrocher, a stone contractor in Detroit, Michigan; Roy, unmarried, a sergeant in the engineering corps, United States Army in France; Grace, who is single and engaged in the millinery business at Detroit; and Harry, who is still attending school at Broken Bow.

H. K. ATKISSON. — The subject of this review is the efficient manager of the Milburn & Custer Telephone Company and has been a resident of Custer county for thirty-one years.

H. K. Atkisson was born in Wayne county, Iowa, January 25, 1858. His father, I. N. Atkisson, who was a native of Kentucky, was a lawyer by profession and came to Nebraska in an early day, residing first at Ashland, later at Lincoln. In 1887 he came to Custer county, where he made his home until his death, in 1891, at Broken Bow. The mother of our subject is Mrs. Minerva (Clark) Atkisson, who is a native of Pennsylvania, and who is now making her home in California.

H. K. Atkisson, one of a family of four children, accompanied his parents to Nebraska and came to Custer county with them in 1887. He was engaged in mercantile business at Merna for several years and for several years past he has been manager of the Milburn & Custer Telephone Company. He has been a notary public for eighteen years and also deals in real estate. When a young man he acquired considerable knowledge of law and legal procedure, while working with his father, and this knowledge he finds valuable in examining abstracts and investigating titles to property.

In Webster county, Nebraska, Mr. Atkisson married Miss B. L. Wells, a native of Michigan. Mrs. Atkisson has acquired a splendid education, is possessed of considerable literary talent and is serving at the present time as librarian for the public library of Merna. Mr. and Mrs. Atkisson have three children: Roy N., who is sales manager for Deere & Company of Omaha; Blanche, who is the wife of J. R. Judge, of Lushton, Nebraska; and Veva, who is the wife of F. E. Peterson, of Lincoln, Nebraska.

The family are members of the United Brethren church and Mr. Atkisson is a Republican in politics. Fraternally he is connected with the Merna organizations of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, Modern Woodmen of America, and Ancient Order of United Workmen, and he is one of the progressive citizens of Custer county.

SAMUEL M. LUCE, who is now living retired in Merna, after many years of activity as an agriculturist in Custer county, was among the very early settlers of this county and has witnessed the changes that have been brought about, while in the work of development he has aided in many ways.

Mr. Luce was born near Bangor, Maine, March 24, 1850, and is a descendant from Puritan stock, his ancestors having been numbered among the first settlers of the Pine Tree state. His father, William S. Luce, was a native of Maine and followed the life of a sailor until he received injuries that compelled him to abandon this vocation. In 1854 he came west, and after remaining a short time in Chicago he established his residence in Stark county, Illinois, where he continued to be engaged in farming enterprise until after the close of the Civil war. In 1866 he became one of the pioneers of Clarke county, Iowa, where he passed the remainder of his life, his death having occurred in 1871. His wife, whose death there occurred in the preceding year, was a native of Massachusetts and her maiden name was Hulda Rogers. Four of their sons were soldiers in the Civil war, all serving from Illinois, but in different regiments — William S. in the Ninth Cavalry; Alonzo in the Nineteenth Infantry; Richard in the Ninety-third Infantry; and Isaac in the One Hundred and Twelfth Infantry.

Samuel M. Luce was a little lad of four years when he accompanied his parents to Chicago and he was with them when the home was established in Clarke county, Iowa, in 1866. There he completed his education and there he eventually engaged in farming on his own account.

February 28, 1872, at the home of the bride's parents, near Lacelle, Clarke county, Iowa, was solemnized the marriage of Samuel M. Luce to Miss Mary V. Perry, who was born in Illinois, a daughter of Zachariah and Sarah (Keedy) Perry, natives respectively of Kentucky and Illinois. In 1882 the parents of Mrs. Luce became pioneer settlers of Custer county, and here they passed the remainder of their lives, the death of the mother having occurred in 1892 and that of the father in 1893.

Mr. and Mrs. Luce continued to reside in Iowa until 1882, when they came to Nebraska. They lived one year in Nuckolls county and in 1883 became residents of Custer county, although Mr. Luce had come to the county the year before and located and filed on his homestead of 160 acres, in section 6, township 17, range 21. Here he erected a sod house, which was the home of the family for twelve years. They were among the very early settlers in this part of Custer county. There was no town of Merna then, not a frame house in Broken Bow and only nine families in Dale valley. Mr. Luce helped organize the school district, helped erect the little sod schoolhouse and was identified with all movements for the upbuilding and development of the community. He made a success of his ventures in agriculture, brought his land to a high state of cultivation and was actively engaged in farming until 1906, when he retired to Merna, where he has resided since in a comfortable home erected at that time.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Luce has been blessed with seven children: Sarah is the wife of B. C. Browning, residing at Merna; Elijah is a resident of Merna; Nancy is the wife of Dell Jones, of Merna; LeRoy is living at Stratton, Nebraska; John is a resident of Fort Collins, Colorado; Charles W., likewise is a resident of Colorado; and Bessie is the wife of Orville Burton, of Grover, Colorado.

Mr. and Mrs. Luce are members of the United Brethren church and in politics Mr. Luce casts an independent ballot. He affiliates with several fraternal orders, being active in the Modern Woodmen of America, Modern Brotherhood, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Daughters of Rebekah.

Samuel M. Luce is one of the venerable pioneers of Custer county, where he has been an interested witness of the changes that have made the county one of the leading agricultural and stock-raising districts of Nebraska, and in every relation of life he has measured up to the full standard of manhood and loyal citizenship.

HARMER E. MYERS. — Although variously identified with affairs in Custer county since his arrival here more than a quarter of a century ago, it is probably as a moral and religious teacher that Harmer E. Myers will be longest and most gratefully remembered. More and more is it demonstrated that a cultivated mind and fine instincts reach their highest development oftentimes amid agricultural surroundings, diffusing around them that refinement and peace which are the hall-marks of the born gentleman toiler. To such a class belongs Mr. Myers, who is now one of the large land-owners of Custer county, but who for years was one of the most successful and most affectionately appreciated laborers in the United Brethren church, the numerous churches which he founded standing as monuments to his zeal and ministerial capacity.

Harmer E. Myers was born in Clarke county, Iowa, March 24, 1865, a son of Lambert P. and Rebecca (Rilea) Myers. His paternal grandfather, Jonathan Myers, was a native of Virginia, and moved to the Western Reserve of Ohio at an early day. In that historic part of the Buckeye state he passed the remainder of his life in agricultural pursuits, and there he reared a family of ten children. William Rilea, the maternal grandfather of Mr. Myers, was a native of Ohio and eventually moved to Iowa. In the early days he was a freighter on the Mississippi river, taking flatboats down to New Orleans, and was also widely known as a famous hunter and trapper of his day.

Lambert Packer Myers was born in Mahoning county, Ohio, in 1834, and as a young man learned the cabinetmaker's trade, which he followed in his home state. He was there educated and subsequently went to Indiana. In the '50s he removed to Iowa, where he secured employment in a mill. Through industrious work and careful saving he accumulated enough capital with which to purchase a farm in the neighborhood of Hopeville, where he rounded out his career and where he died in 1896. He was a Republican in politics and he served on school boards in several communities. He belonged to the United Brethren in Christ. Mr. Myers was married at Funk's Mills, Iowa, to Miss Rebecca Rilea, who was born in Brown county, Ohio, and who survives her husband, she being a resident of Bedford, Iowa. They became the parents of nine children, of whom eight are living: Leonard V., a furniture dealer, undertaker and embalmer at Red Oak, Iowa, is very prominent in his business in his state and was formerly vice-president of the National Undertakers Association; Marion U. is a carpenter at Beaconsfield, Iowa; Harmer E. is the immediate subject of this review; Anna is the wife of H. T. Chew, a farmer of Grand River, Iowa; Mrs. Elizabeth Besco, a widow, resides at Bedford, Iowa, where she has been successfully engaged in business as a dry-goods merchant for the past sixteen years; Armanella, prominent in the affairs of the Methodist Episcopal church, is the wife of Frank Allen, who was formerly a leading churchman and merchant of Bedford, Iowa, but is now a prominent real-estate man of Greeley, Colorado; Adna E. is a contractor and builder at Los Angeles, California; and Almond Ray, a graduate of the Gem City Business College, Quincy, Illinois, was in the banking business for a number of years at McAlester, Oklahoma, but later was a resident of Rosalia, Washington, and he is now engaged in farm enterprise near Colville, that state.

The country schools of Iowa furnished Harmer E. Myers his early educational training, and after he had taught school for one year he entered the Western Normal College at Shenandoah, Iowa, where he was graduated in 1888, with the degree of Bachelor of Didactics. Thereafter he taught for one year in Fremont county, Iowa, and one year in Gage county, Nebraska. For two years he was principal of schools at Crab Orchard, Nebraska and for a like period at Unadilla, Otoe county. He then taught one term of country school and one term in his home school in Nebraska. Prior to this time he had begun his labors as a minister of the faith of the United Brethren in Christ. He joined the annual conference, at Shelby, Nebraska, in March, 1892, although he had preached one year prior to this, having been granted a conference license. Assigned to Unadilla, he held some splendid protracted meetings and made a success of his first church. He then went to Seward, where he was pastor for three year, during which he more than doubled the membership there, taking in 121 new members. Subsequently he was pastor of the First United Brethren church at Lincoln, where he was instrumental in transferring the church from the suburbs into the city proper, and after eighteen months in that pastorate he went to Pawnee City, Nebraska, and remained as pastor of a country church for two years. In the meanwhile he had been formally ordained to the ministry, the ceremony of ordination having been performed at Blue Springs, Gage county, by Bishop Castle. In 1900 he came to Broken Bow, where he was minister for two and one-half years, at that time resigning from the regular ministry, his last sermon being delivered in a sod church at Custer Center, Iowa. However, from time to time he continued to preach, accepting different country appointments, and he still fills a pulpit occasionally, in addition to doing some work in the lecture field. During his long experience in the work of the church, Mr. Myers met varying conditions. During one period, for three years, he preached three times each Sunday. One of his biggest successes was a revival held at the O. K. schoolhouse, where he organized a large class. For one year he accomplished some gratifying work at the Ortello church, to reach which he had to travel forty miles from Broken Bow, it being his custom to leave this city at three o'clock Saturday afternoon, sleep in a hay-mow that night, and eat luncheon in his buggy, at Merna.

As an agriculturist Mr. Myers has made an excellent success. He purchased his first quarter-section in 1900, at five dollars on acre, and in 1902 he secured a like amount at the same price, but in 1903 was forced to pay six dollars and twenty-five cents an acre for a quarter-section, and later, when he bought a half-section, the price had again advanced. He has sold some of his land, but still owns 600 acres of valuable farming property, in two farms—one, his home place, consisting of 480 acres, while the other, eighteen miles from Broken Bow, comprises 120 acres. Mr. Myers does much in the way of stock-raising and dairying, a field of enterprise in which he educated himself, and he has a splendid herd of Durhams. He has milked as high as forty-seven cows, although the average is twenty-five, and in 1917 he sold six hundred dollars' worth of cream, it having been his expectation in 1918 to advance that figure to over $1,000. He usually sells and ships a car-load of cattle and a like amount of hogs each year, and he has made a success also in the raising of registered Percheron stallions.

In 1889 was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Myers to Miss Ella I. Talley, who was born in Ringgold county, Iowa, a daughter of Isaac A. and Nancy (Keller) Talley, who were born in Ohio, and came to Iowa in 1856, being among the earliest pioneers of Ringgold county, Iowa. To Mr. and Mrs. Myers there have been born the following children: Evangeline B. is the wife of William Hein, a farmer near Westerville, Custer county; Joy U. is engaged in teaching at Hastings, Nebraska; Paul S. resides at home and assists his father; Vivian is the wife of Frank Thornton, a farmer near Westerville; Jessie is engaged in teaching; and Royal, Hallie, and Beulah remain at the parental home. Mr. Myers is independent in his political views, and his only public office was that of a member of the town council at Crab Orchard, Johnson county, Nebraska.

FRED J. BAHR. — A comparatively recent addition to the grain and coal merchants of Broken Bow, F. J. Bahr established his interests here in 1909, bringing with him a commendable ambition to succeed, and that his aims have been realized is shown in the fact that he is to-day numbered among the leading business citizens of his adopted community. Mr. Bahr was born August 16, 1868, at Fayette, Iowa, a son of John J. and Lucy (Timmerman) Bahr.

John J. Bahr was born April 1, 1830, in the province of Alsace-Lorraine, France, and was a young man when he came to the United States with his father, William Bahr, and located in New York. There he married and for a few years was engaged in farming, but about the year 1860 he came to the west and bought 400 acres of land in Fayette county, Iowa, where he spent the remainder of his life. He was a Republican in politics, was a blue lodge Mason for fifty-five years, and in religious faith was a Congregationalist, while Mrs. Bahr was a Methodist. They were the parents of the following children: Eva is the wife of J. M. Alexander, a farmer and real-estate broker of Gothenburg, Nebraska, he being an Odd Fellow and a Republican; William A., a farmer of near Eagle, Nebraska, and a Republican, married Amy Roberts; Polly is the wife of William Sharp, for years a farmer at Eagle, and now at Trenton, a Republican and a member of the Methodist Episcopal church; Mary is the widow of J. D. Freeman, who died at Mercedes, California, in the spring of 1917, he having been a Democrat, a Modern Woodman, and a member of the Congregational church, to which Mrs. Freeman belongs; Fred J. is the subject of this review; Orson K., a Mason and Republican, and farmer in Montana, married Lucy Allen, a daughter of Charles Allen; and Thomas J., a Mason Republican and member of the Methodist Episcopal church, was formerly a farmer and is now a resident of the San Luis Valley of Colorado; he married Maude Jackson, daughter of John O. Jackson of Custer county. The maiden name of Mrs. Fred J. Bahr was Lucy Timmerman, and she was born in Jefferson county, New York, a daughter of Henry Timmerman, and a direct descendant of a hero of the Revolutionary war. Her father was born March 8, 1796, and on November 19, 1820, married Polly Conley, who was born May 27, 1801, and who died May 6, 1876, Mr. Timmerman dying October 6, 1883. Her grandfather, Henry Timmerman, was born in Montgomery county, New York, January 1, 1750, and in 1775 enlisted for service in the patriot army, for service in the war of the Revolution, under Captain Stutzel Yates. This command went on a campaign of eleven months into Canada, under General Montgomery, and its members were then discharged, at Quebec, Mr. Timmerman making his way back to his home, at Little Falls, on the Mohawk river. Drafted in 1776, he was sent to Ticonderoga and was out one month, and in the same year he was sent to assist in blockading Wood Creek; to Fort Stanwick, where there was a general engagement; and at the mouth of the Unadilla river, where he was stationed for about two weeks, under Major General Sylsen. In a campaign under Brigadier-General James Clinton, he fought against the western Indians and was then called into the militia service, which occupied about one-quarter of his time until the year 1780. He then enlisted in the batteau service, under Captain Samuel Gray, and remained therein for two seasons, during which time he was supposed to be out from six to seven months. His wife bore the maiden name of Polly Kellas.

Fred J. Bahr was educated in the schools of Iowa and Nebraska, was reared as a farmer, a vocation which he adopted upon attaining his majority. When he disposed of his interests in his native state, he came to Nebraska and secured a ranch of 400 acres, six miles north of Broken Bow, where he is making a successful specialty of raising the large type of Chester-White hogs. In 1909 Mr. Bahr came to Broken Bow, where he established himself in the grain and coal business, and this line he has followed to the present time, his splendid business abilities having enabled him to build up a large and important industry.

MRS. JOHN J. DOUGLASS

Mr. Bahr married Miss Minnie Morris, and to this union there have been born three children: H. Morris, who is in the eleventh grade of the Broken Bow high school; Vivian M., a teacher in the high school at Broken Bow, Nebraska; and Frederick J., six years of age, who has just started to attend the Broken Bow public school.

DR. Q. HOWARD STEVENS.—While he is comparatively a newcomer in the city of Broken Bow, where he took up his residence and began practice in September, 1916, Dr. Q. Howard Stevens has succeeded in establishing himself firmly in a position of prominence in professional circles, as well as in the confidence of the public. He is a native of the state of Nebraska, having been born at Millard, Douglas county, February 11, 1870, a son of George F. and Mary C. Stevens.

George F. Stevens was born in Maine and was a young man when he moved to Nebraska, in 1856. Mrs. Stevens immigrating to the United States from Denmark in the year following and taking up her home in this state also. They were married at Omaha, being residents of that place when it was but a small village, with little promise of its coming greatness, but later they took up land at the present site of Millard, the town being located on their old pre-emption claim.

Quincy Howard Stevens passed his boyhood and youth in eastern Nebraska. He received his preliminary educational training in the public schools, and subsequently attended Fremont College, where he had a creditable career and graduated with the degrees of Bachelor of Science, Bachelor of Arts, and Graduate in Pharmacy. On leaving college he found himself equipped for educational work, and thereafter he served as superintendent of public schools in several communities. While engaged in these labors he prepared himself as an optical refractionist. He attended the Needles Institute of Optometry, in Kansas City, from which institution he was graduated with the degree of Doctor of Optometry, and following this he was for a time engaged in practice at Omaha, in the meantime teaching in the Omaha Optical School. He located at Broken Bow September 1, 1916, and has since had a successful practice. He possesses a natural love for his profession and an earnest desire to assist his ailing fellow humans. His slogan: "See Stevens and See Better" is expressive and characteristic. His office is located in the Bow, where he has a complete optical equipment for testing eyes and making and fitting glasses that give comfort and good vision.

Mrs. Stevens was formerly Miss Elvira Morris, and she was an instructor in the public schools of Columbus City prior to her marriage. There is one son, Howard B., aged ten years.

JOHN J. DOUGLASS, who is now one of the highly esteemed retired citizens of Callaway, has the distinction of being one of the three surviving organizers of Custer county. For forty-three years he has resided within the borders of this county, during which time he has seen the country grow and has assisted it in its development, his experiences having included the various conditions, incidents, and eras of life here from the rough and rugged happenings of the frontier days to the refinements and conveniences of modern civilized existence.

Mr. Douglass was born March 17, 1845, at Sabina, Ohio, and is a son of Thompson and Ann (Coulter) Douglass, the former a native of Columbiana county, Ohio, and the latter of Ireland. His paternal grandparents, James and Mary (Taylor) Douglass were born in Scotland and were early settlers in Ohio. There were three sons and three daughters in the family: Albert, Sarah J., John J., Flora A., George, and Arminda, of whom Sarah J. and Albert are deceased. The common schools, which he attended during the winter terms, furnished John J. Douglass with his educational training, and until he was sixteen years of age he remained under the parental roof and assisted his father. At that time, however, he became restless, and, desiring to do something on his own account, accepted a position as clerk in a dry-goods and grocery store. He started at a wage of eight dollars a month, and during the four years that he was thus employed he was gradually given advancement, but he finally decided that mercantile life was not his forte, and he returned to farming, in which he was engaged for two years. About this time—not long after the close of the Civil war—he contracted the western fever, and in 1868 he came to Nebraska, settling at Falls City, Richardson county, in the extreme southeast corner of the state. It is worthy of note that he made the entire journey of 1,100 miles, from Sabina to Falls City, on horseback—a big job for one horse and quite an undertaking for a young man who did not know the country. All northern Missouri at that early date was thinly settled, and hundreds of stone and brick chimneys, known as “Lincoln monuments” at that time, were all left to show what had been prosperous homes before the ravages of war devastated the country. Arriving at Falls City in 1868, he secured employment as clerk with the mercantile firm of Reavis & Cameron. It was his desire at this time to venture further out on the frontier, and his plans for such a move had been practically completed when an incident occurred that dissuaded him from his desire at that time to get into the big-game country. A party of United States surveyors went out on the Republican river to survey government land, and the entire party was ambushed by hostile Indians and massacred to a man. Mr. Douglass’ friends persuaded him to abandon his trip, and he eventually returned to Ohio, where he remained several years, until the Indians were quieted.

In January, 1875, Mr. Douglass again left his Ohio home to return to the country which had gained such a hold upon him during his first trip, and he arrived here on the 6th day of that month. From Missouri he drove in a bunch of cattle, which he held on the Platte river during the summer, and during that time came to Custer county and located a ranch for the Rankin Live Stock Company, about a mile west of the present site of Callaway. Subsequently he went down into the Indian Nation and brought this concern’s cattle, about 800 head, to the ranch, as well as about 150 head of his own, which he had been holding on the Platte river. He was hired as foreman for this company and worked for them in that capacity about two years, or from 1876 to 1878, following which he put in about five years riding the range as a cowboy. Eventually he secured a large bunch of cattle of his own, and as the years passed he secured larger and larger business interests, so that finally he became one of the leading business men of the community, as well as an influential factor in financial circles. At the present time he is retired from active business pursuits and lives in his handsome and comfortable modern house at Callaway.

Mr. Douglass was married January 19, 1892, to Miss May Taylor, who was born in Marion county, Iowa, a daughter of Edgar and Sarah Margaret (Williams) Taylor. Mrs. Douglass’ maternal grandparents had been residents of Missouri, but when the Civil war came on they were sympathizers with the Union cause and were compelled to abandon their home and move to Iowa, where they lived until after the days of secession, of conflict, and of reconstruction. Mrs. Douglass received her education in the public schools of Iowa, attending the high school at Missouri Valley and later completing a normal course at the Woodbine Normal school, at Woodbine, that state. She taught several terms of school in Harrison and Monroe counties and then came, in July, 1888, to visit a friend at Broken Bow. As teachers were not plentiful, she was asked by Charles Randall, then county superintendent, to accept a school at Berwyn, a few miles east of Broken Bow. She accepted the school, and completed the term with much credit to herself as well as the district. About that time this school closed, and she was offered a position in the office of her future husband, who was clerk of the district court. She accepted this position and held the same for four years, or until the expiration of Mr. Douglass’ term of office, soon after which they were married and went to live on Mr. Douglass’ farm, just west of Callaway.

The country, however, was swept over by drouths, which left desolation in their wake, and great hardships were thus endured by those who could not turn to some other work than farming. Mrs. Douglass again took up school work, teaching for ten months the first year, with only a few days between terms, and she had begun on the third term when she received an appointment to a position in the state land commissioner’s office, at Lincoln, which she accepted and held until she resigned to come home and work in the post-office, her husband having been appointed postmaster during her absence. She held the position of assistant postmaster for seven years. In March, 1906, Mrs. Douglass took a post in the Seven Valleys Bank, which she held for over a year, when she again engaged in school work, and she has taught continuously since that time, with the sole exception of one year, during which she attended the Kearney State Normal School. She spent the summer of 1915 in the office of State Superintendent A. O. Thomas; thus her entire time has been devoted to some phase of school work for the last fifteen years. She has assisted several of the county superintendents of Custer county in giving teachers’ examinations, and in many other ways she has aided those interested in educational work.

During all the years in which Mrs. Douglass has taught in the rural schools of Nebraska, it has been her boast that she has never missed a day from school on account of the weather, although she has faced many a snow storm and even severe blizzards in making her trips to and from school. She has been blessed with exceptionally good health and possesses an energy that equals and exceeds that of almost any other woman in the state. By attending teachers' institutes and also the summer sessions of the State Normal School, she has kept pace with the times in the progress made in the various departments of school work. Besides her school work, Mrs. Douglass is an active member of several lodges, the church, with its various organization, and a number of clubs. She is one woman who is happy at having cast her lot in Nebraska and she often declares that she would not exchange her little cottage at Callaway for a mansion in the far east.

Mr. Douglass is one of the thirteen men who organized Custer county, and of the number only three are living in the summer of 1918 — A. L. Wise, Milo F. Young, and Mr. Douglass. He has always been prominent and active in the affairs of the county, having been elected clerk of the first district court of Custer county, in 1887, an office which he held for four years. His election came ten years after the organization of the county, the work in the meantime having been done by the county clerk. He also served as postmaster during a long period, besides holding various other offices, and his public record is an excellent one. While now living in retirement, he is still interested in county affairs, and his latch-string is always out to his many friends of the olden and later days. Mr. Douglass is fraternally identified with the Mystic Legion. He is a Republican, is an advocate of woman suffrage, and his religious faith is that of the Methodist Episcopal church.

THOMAS H. BROWN has been identified with railroading ever since he entered upon his career as a lad of seventeen years, and his experiences therein have brought him into connection with the systems of both the United States and England. Mr. Brown, who is now cashier of the Burlington Route at Broken Bow, was born in Yorkshire, England, January 29, 1880, and is a son of Edward and Eleanor (Mudd) Brown.

The vocation now followed by Thomas H. Brown is one which has had the services of the family during a long period, for his father was a depot agent in England, his native land, for more than forty years, and there he died when still in the service of one of the big railways. He was a well known man in his calling, as he was also in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of which he was a member for many years. Mrs. Brown, also a native of England, survives her husband and still resides in that country. There were two sons and four daughters in the family, and of the five children now living only two are in the United States: Elizabeth, the wife of George Thompson, a farmer near Edgemont, South Dakota; and Thomas H., the subject of this sketch. The family belongs to the Church of England.

Thomas H. Brown was given a public-school education in England, and when he was seventeen years old an opportunity presented itself for him to take up railroading. Having a natural inclination in that direction, he accepted his chance and thus gained much experience and won promotion before coming to the United States, January 31, 1911. Going direct to Edgemont, South Dakota, he secured employment in the office of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, where his work impressed the officials favorably, and in December, 1912, he was transferred to the office at Broken Bow and placed in the position of cashier. He has since retained this post and has concentrated all his energies in the discharge of his official duties. During his residence here, Mr. Brown has become widely acquainted, both with railroad men and others, and has succeeded in establishing a number of warm and sincere friendships.

In February, 1912, at Hot Springs, South Dakota, Mr. Brown married Miss Annie Veronica Stockdale, who was born in England, and to this union there has come one son, John Edward, who is now attending school. Mr. and Mrs. Brown are members of the Protestant Episcopal church. He is a Democrat in his political views, and is fraternally identified with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Modern Woodmen of America.

CHARLES F. BRAMER. — Classed with the well-to-do and highly esteemed citizens of Custer county, Charles F. Bramer has won well merited success in the field of farming and stock-raising, and since his advent in this locality, in 1907, has steadily advanced in position and prominence. He is a native of Germany, born at Labes, Pomerania, in 1863, a son of Fred and Amelia (Aldrich) Bramer.

Fred Bramer, a farmer by vocation, immigrated to the United States with his family in 1885 and settled in Saline county, Nebraska, where he followed agricultural pursuits during the remainder of his life, achieved a moderate degree of success, and died at the age of seventy years. He and his wife were the parents of the following children: Albert, who is engaged in farming in the neighborhood of Stamford, Nebraska; Ricka, who still resides in Germany; Mrs. Amelia Myers, of Shickley, Nebraska; Mrs. Ida Schmidt, who is deceased; Mrs. Lena Bielke, whose husband is a farmer at St. Michel; Charles F., who is the subject of this notice; Fred, who is a ranchman of this state; and Herman, who is identified with a lumber company in the state of Washington.

Charles F. Bramer received his education in the public schools of Germany and had just passed into his majority when he left his native land and immigrated to the United States. He first located in Saline county, Nebraska, in 1884, but fourteen years later he removed to Buffalo county, where he continued agricultural pursuits until coming to Custer county, in 1907. His operations here have all been along the line of general farming and stock-raising, and in each field he has achieved an enviable success. At this time he is the owner of a well cultivated farm located in section 16, township 71, where he has good buildings and other improvements, and his standing in his community is that of a capable farmer, an honorable business man, and a citizen of integrity. Mr. Bramer belongs to the Royal Highlanders, and he and the members of his family are members of the Evangelical church.

Mr. Bramer was married in 1889 to Bertha Schroeder, and they have the following children: Clara Mitchell; Gertrude Boyd, of Ansley; Minnie Porath, of Wyoming; and Ben, Clarence, Edwin, John, Elsie, Bertha, and Mabel, all residing with their parents.

RHINEHART PORATH.—One of the fine farms of the southeastern part of Custer county is the property of Rhinehart Porath. It comprises 720 acres of rich and arable land, and the well tilled fields surround substantial buildings—a pleasant residence, commodious barns, and excellent outbuildings. Mr. Porath, the proprietor, has been a resident of Custer county since 1891, and during the period of his residence here he has advanced himself, through industry and careful and intelligent management, to a position among the leading agriculturists of the locality. He was born in Pommern, Germany, in 1860, and is a son of William and Fredericka Porath.

The parents of Mr. Porath, who passed their entire lives in Germany, were farming people in moderate circumstances, and devoted themselves to the making of a comfortable home. They were faithful members of the Lutheran Reformed church, and died in that faith, the father when sixty-four years of age, and the mother at the age of sixty-three years. They were the parents of the following children: Rhinehart, the only one in America, and Mrs. Amelia Kreoger, Gustav, Emma, and Heinrich, all of whom live on farms in Germany. Rhinehart Porath received his education in the schools of his native land and was variously employed, principally at farming, until he came to the United States, in 1883. First settling in Wisconsin, he spent one year there, and he then came to Nebraska, where for two years he was employed in Saline county. In 1886 he entered the employ of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, during the construction of that company's line from Mason City to Litchfield, and he worked also for several contractors. He has memories of the latter connection still, for there are still three weeks of unpaid wages due him by a contractor named Reynolds. He also worked at Miller during the construction of the Union Pacific Railroad, but finally returned to farming, when, in 1891, he bought a relinquishment in Custer county. To his original purchase he has added from time to time, as his finances have allowed, and at the present day he has 720 acres in his property. A large amount of this land is under cultivation and devoted to general farming, and Mr. Porath also has met with much success as a raiser of horses, cattle, and hogs. He is a man of sound business ability, and is one of the most practical and progressive agriculturists of the community. He uses the most improved machinery in the development and other operations of his farm, owning his own implements and doing his own repair work, and he finds an automobile of great value to him in the daily course of his business duties. He has been content to keep absorbed in his agricultural affairs and has not aspired to prominence in public life, but as a citizen has been strong in his support of constructive legislation.

In 1898 Mr. Porath was united in marriage to Amelia Miller, of Swanton, Nebraska, and they became the parents of the following children: Benjamin, who is married and resides on a homestead in Wyoming; Ludwig, who is married and resides on a claim in the same state; Margaret, who is married and lives in Buffalo county, Nebraska; Hilda, who is the wife of a Custer county farmer; and Paul, Lena, John, Eunice, Edmond, and Wilma, all of whom remain at the parental home. Mr. and Mrs. Porath are members of the Evangelical church, and they attend the church of this denomination at Mason City. The pleasant Porath residence is located in section 27, township 71.

HARRY C. KIMBALL, one of the substantial business men of Broken Bow, has been engaged in the undertaking business here since 1904 and holds the oldest state license in Custer county. He was born January 29, 1878, at Oshkosh, Wisconsin, a son of Kendrick W. Kimball, and a grandson of Kendrick Kimball, a native of Ireland and an early settler of Wisconsin, where he was engaged in farming.

Kendrick W. Kimball was born in Wisconsin, and is one of the few old settlers of Custer county who still own their old homesteads. He came to this county in 1882, in the spring of which year he located in Clear Creek valley, east of Westerville, and for many years he actively followed farming industry. He is now in retirement and makes his home at Ansley, where he is surrounded by every comfort. He is a member of the Christian church, belongs to the Modern Woodmen, and is a Republican in his political view. In 1876, at Stockbridge, Wisconsin, he married Miss Myra Bourne, a daughter of Frank Bourne, of English descent, who was for twenty-eight years a sailor on whaling vessels and who visited many of the ports of the world. Seven children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Kimball: Harry C. is the subject of this review; Mary Alice, is the wife of Arthur Anderson, a farmer living eight miles northeast of Ansley, Nebraska; Jessie M. is the wife of John Hall, a farmer near Ansley; Bert F., a farmer living northeast of Berwyn, this county, and a Woodman and Odd Fellow, married Mabel House; Kendrick C. is an electrical engineer of Trident, Montana, and is a Mason and Woodman; Ruth is the wife of Uriah S. Lowden, a farmer on the old Kimball homestead, near Westerville; and Theo George, a high-school graduate and member of the Woodmen, is working as an electrical engineer, with his brother at Trident, Montana.

In the earning of his first dollar, Harry C. Kimball, showed himself a lad of resource and initiative. A circus was showing to the populace at Ansley, and notwithstanding the fact that the youth was unable to obtain from his father the price of admission, he attended the exhibition and soon had struck a bargain with the clown. Whereupon, in the parade, young Kimball was found driving a little grey mule hitched to a cart, the lad sitting under a screen and holding aloft a monster papier-mache head on a pole. Not only did he see the circus, but when he returned to his home that night he was able to display his earnings, and was, perhaps, the proudest boy in Custer county. In 1897 he was graduated in the Ansley high school, and following this he began working on the farm during the summer months, while in the winter terms he taught school in the country, for six seasons. In 1904 he came to Broken Bow and entered the employ of S. P. Groat, in the furniture and hardware business, subsequently holding a clerkship with Rockwell & Armstrong and their successors. In 1906, however, he engaged in business on his own account, and since that time he has steadily advanced in fortune and reputation, being known as the proprietor of one of the leading undertaking and embalming establishments in Custer county. Mr. Kimball has installed every appurtenance known to the art of modern undertaking, and is prepared in every way for the reverent handling of the dead. Possessing tact of the rarest kind, he is a sincerely appreciated friend at the homes which the angel of death has visited, and the confidence which is reposed in him comes from the manliness and integrity which he has displayed upon all occasions.

Mr. Kimball was married June 17, 1908, at Lodi, Nebraska, to Miss Emma Ward, daughter of Martin and Mary Ward, farming people of English descent and members of the Evangelical church. One son has been born to this union: Hugh C. W., eight years of age and attending school. Mr. Kimball is a prominent Republican, and has served Broken Bow four years as a member of the city council. He is affiliated with the Odd Fellows, Woodmen, and Highlanders, and he and Mrs. Kimball belong to the Christian church.

ELISHA TAYLOR. — Prominent among the operators in real-estate, loans, and insurance in Custer county is Elisha Taylor, a resident of this locality for thirty-five years. Long a farmer and ranchman, he gave his attention strictly to those pursuits until 1900, when he established himself in business at Broken Bow, and since that time he has so ably directed his activities and operations that to-day he is listed among the leading business citizens of the county seat. Mr. Taylor was born in Green county, Wisconsin, December 20, 1851, a son of Miner and Anna (Norder) Taylor.

Miner Taylor was born in the old Empire state, in 1825, and was a son of Elisha Taylor, a New York miller who passed his last days in Michigan. Miner Taylor was just past his majority when he moved to Green county, Wisconsin, where for a time he followed his trade of cooper. Later he became a saw-mill owner and after operating a business of that kind for a number of years he eventually concentrated his energies in farming. He was engaged in the latter pursuit when the Civil war came on, and in January, 1863, he enlisted in Company K, Sixteenth Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, with which he served until the close of the war. He advanced to the rank of corporal, and in numerous hard-fought engagements, several of them during Sherman's "march to the sea," he displayed soldierly qualities that made his record an excellent one. In 1888 Mr. Taylor came to Custer county, Nebraska, and bought a farm near Merna, where he passed the rest of his life in farming. He was a Socialist in his political belief, but took no active part in political or public affairs. His death occurred in 1906. In Green county, Wisconsin, he married Miss Anna Norder, who was born in Switzerland, in 1830, and who died in 1854. They had two children: Louisa J., the wife of G. A. Wiggins, a farmer at Cooper, Iowa; and Elisha, of this review. For his second wife Mr. Taylor married Lenore Stearns, and they became the parents of nine children, of whom seven are living: Jerome, who owns a stock farm of 5,000 acres, in North Carolina; Jessie Dietz, who is the wife of a Custer county farmer; Allen, who is traveling in Missouri; Frank, who is a photographer of Broken Bow; Hetty, who is the wife of Florin Jacobs, a farmer and president of the Co-operative Company store of Broken Bow; Nellie, who is unmarried and a resident of Broken Bow; and Willis W., who is a farmer near this place.

Elisha Taylor attended the district schools of Green county and the normal school at Whitewater, Wisconsin, and for his first vocation adopted the educator's profession. After five terms of teaching, he resumed farming, and he continued to till the soil of Wisconsin until 1880, in which year he came to Nebraska and took up a homestead in Blaine county. He entered the stock business, which he followed there for four years, and in 1886 he disposed of his interests and came to Custer county, where he commenced to give practically his entire attention to the buying and shipping of live stock. In this field he made great strides and was known as one of the prominent and successful men in his line, but a broader field of opportunity opened before him in 1900, when he embarked in the real-estate, loan, and insurance business. This enterprise has grown surprisingly and now is one of the most important of the city's business adjuncts. Mr. Taylor has a collection agency which handles a large amount of business annually; he owns land which he takes care of on his personal account, as well as doing a big commission business; and he represents a number of the leading insurance companies, in addition to handling farm and other loans. Straightforward in all his dealings, his reputation is beyond question or reproach.

In 1888 Mr. Taylor married Louise J., a daughter of Charles Heusinger, a machinist of Grand Island and Omaha. Mrs. Taylor, who was born at St. Louis, Missouri, had one child by a previous marriage: Kathryn, the wife of William Jenkins, manager of the shipping department of the wholesale grocery house of Coffin Brothers, Yakima, Washington. To Mr. and Mrs. Taylor there have been born five children: Charles E., who is associated with his father in the real-estate business; Fred L., who is county agricultural agent at Chadron, Nebraska; Louise A., who is the wife of Dr. Dale G. Houlette, now in France, where he is connected with the navy dental corps of the United States Navy; Clara H., who is residing at home and is stenographer for the Security State Bank; and Margaret A., who is attending school. Mrs. Taylor is a member of the Christian Scientist church. Her husband is a Socialist in politics, and has served as a member of the Broken Bow Council for several years.

LEVIER B. CRAMER, whose life in Custer county has covered a period of thirty-six years, is now one of the honored citizens of Broken Bow. He was born November 3, 1851, in Putnam county, Illinois, a son of Paul and Elizabeth (Basor) Cramer, the former a native of Urbana, Illinois, and the latter of Harrisburg, Pennsylvania. There were four sons and six daughters in the family, and all were faithful members of the Methodist Episcopal church. Paul Cramer, who was a mason and stone-cutter by trade, came to Custer county in 1882 and located one and three-quarter miles south of New Helena, on Victoria creek, where he purchased, for $200, land which afterward sold for $4,000.

During the boyhood of Levier Bitner Cramer there were several principles which were enforced upon the family, these being the ones of honesty and industry and the value of money. In the latter connection he still retains a vivid remembrance as to how this was impressed upon him. He and a neighbor boy, living near-by, found a hub band from an old Pennsylvania wagon, took it to town and sold it to a blacksmith for four cents, which money they proceeded to spend for candy. The matter in some way reached the elder Cramer, and when young Levier reached home, his father got down a new blacksnake whip and without warning or explanation gave him an old-fashioned warming up. The lesson had the desired effect, for subsequently and throughout his career Mr. Cramer has respected the value of money and has profited by this attitude. Mr. Cramer was never given the benefits of a school education, but his mind is bright and active, he possesses the knack of gaining knowledge in a manner not learned in books, and being intelligent he has obtained a good practical education. He accompanied his father to Custer county in 1882 and remained with him as his assistant until the elder man's death, in 1890. Since that time he has been engaged in business on his own account, at Broken Bow. He is a stone mason and has always followed the mason's trade, besides giving his attention to the cement contracting business and to broom manufacturing. Mr. Cramer is a natural mechanic and an expert in his line of business. His good workmanship and his industry have combined to assist him in the development of a prosperous enterprise. He has never cared for political matters, and has few interests aside from those of his home and his business.

In 1877, in Putnam county, Illinois, Mr. Cramer married Miss Lucinda Hartman, daughter of William Hartman, a farmer of that locality. To this union there were born fifteen children, of whom eight are living at this time: Lee, who is a farmer near Merna, Custer county, has been for four years a member of the police force at that point; John M., a resident of Broken Bow and a farmer by vocation, married Grace Thistle, and they have two children; Henry, a farmer and stock-buyer of Broken Bow Rural Route No. 1, married Christina Simonson, and they have six children; Frank, a farmer and stock raiser and buyer, of Broken Bow, married Maple Ralph, and they have two children; Roy, a farmer of Broken Bow Rural Route, married Maplet Givens and has one daughter; Gilbert, single, is a farmer on the Broken Bow Rural Route; Sadie is the wife of John Clarks, proprietor of a laundry at Broken Bow, and they have three children; and Ella is the wife of William Rudy, a contractor of Florid, Putnam county, Illinois, and they have two sons.

Mr. and Mrs. Cramer and their children are members of the Methodist church.

HORACE F. KENNEDY was born at Brownville, Nemaha county, Nebraska, September 2, 1873, a son of Charles H. and Catherine (Randall) Kennedy. His paternal grandfather was Stephen H. Kennedy, a native of Virginia, who followed the westward tide of civilization to Missouri at an early date in the history of that state and later located in Nemaha county, Nebraska, where he died. Mr. Kennedy's maternal grandfather was John Randall, who came from Tennessee, and was one of the early settlers of Nemaha county, Nebraska.

Charles H. Kennedy was born in 1850, in Missouri, and as a young man moved with his parents to Nemaha county, Nebraska, where he married Catherine Randall, who was born in Tennessee, in 1848. Not long after his marriage, Mr. Kennedy engaged in the hotel business at Auburn and later was similarly engaged at Broken Bow, but after twenty years of successful operation of houses which were popular with the traveling public, he retired and he and Mrs. Kennedy still survive to enjoy the comforts which have come as rewards for industrious and honorable lives. They are members of the Methodist Episcopal church. Of the four children in the family, three are living: Mrs. S. L. Muller, of Omaha, Nebraska; Horace F., of this review; and W. B., a farmer and ranchman of Wiggins Colorado.

The district schools of Broken Bow and Lincoln furnished Horace F. Kennedy with his early education, and his first occupation in life was found in employment on his father's homestead in Custer county. Later he was associated with his father in the hotel business at Broken Bow. H. F. Kennedy was sheriff of Custer county for four years, from 1909 to 1913, and is a Republican in politics. After his retirement from office, he engaged in the moving-picture business, and is now owner and manager of the Lyric, Broken Bow's beautiful theatre, one of the finest and best of its size in the state.

Mr. Kennedy was married December 25 1900, to Nannie R. Talbot, who was born about eight miles east of Broken Bow, a daughter of Dr. R. C. Talbot, one of the old-time medical practitioners of the county. They have two children, Ruth and Howard, both attending school. Mr. and Mrs. Kennedy are members of the Baptist church. He is a Scottish Rite Mason and Shriner and has passed the official chairs in the blue lodge. Mr. Kennedy has an honorable military record, having served as a lieutenant in the Spanish-American war, as a member of Company M, First Nebraska Volunteer Regiment. For sixteen months he fought in the Philippines, and during the fighting with the enemy he received a bullet through his right lung, which sent him to the hospital for two months. Mr. Kennedy is one of Broken Bow's substantial business men whose success has been well merited.

WALTER M. BRITTAN, a young farmer and business man who lives in the city of Callaway, is a native of Adams county, Iowa. He was born August 2, 1881. Concerning his father, Clifford N. Brittan, and his family, adequate record is given on other pages of this volume. Walter claims that his first money was earned as a mail carrier, although he was not in the service of the government. His mail-carrying operations consisted of taking notes for his uncle to the uncle's sweetheart, but the emolument received for this service, and its subsequent investment, are not recorded. Likewise, the name of the uncle and also of the sweetheart are withheld. So, other than that this is where the subject of the narrative makes his debut into business life, this item has very little historical value.

During his boyhood years, Walter M. Brittan lived in a hotel and worked in a livery stable. When only eight years of age he drove a team for the surveyors who were laying out the lines of the present Callaway branch of the Union Pacific Railroad. On these occasions he was out with this surveying party for two or three weeks at a time.

Mr. Brittan was married January 10, 1916, at Grand Island, to Maude L. Manyon, who is a young woman of gracious personality, she being a native of Illinois and a daughter of Jesse Manyon. Her mother's maiden name was Lettie Reed. In the comfortable home of Mr. and Mrs. Brittan, at Callaway, there are every form of home comfort and everything to contribute to happy home life. They have one child, Fern R., who is the pet of the family, and every one in the home musters to her command. Mr. Brittan has a son by a former marriage, Walter L. Brittan, who is attending St. Mary's College at St. Mary's, Kansas.

The Brittans are owners of 400 acres of good land, which Mr. Brittan oversees and operates in intensive farming. In addition to this, he is the agent for the Dort Motor Company, and is doing a splendid business.

The family is connected with the Methodist Episcopal church and Mr. Brittan is a prominent member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

JOSEPH F. WILSON was the efficient and popular sheriff of Custer county from 1911 until January 1, 1919, when he retired from office as a result of political exigencies which compassed his defeat for re-election in November, 1918. During his tenure of office he established and maintained a record for loyalty, fidelity to duty, and courageous and diplomatic handling of the important work that was assigned to him, with the result that he gained a secure place in the confidence of the citizens of Custer county.

Mr. Wilson was born at Ottawa, Illinois, on the 17th of September, 1869, and is a son of John and Bridget (Fitzgerald) Wilson. John Wilson was born in Scotland, in 1829, and was a young man when he immigrated to the United States and made settlement in the vicinity of Ottawa, Illinois, where he found employment as a miner in the coal mines, this line of work having been his vocation in his native land. Finally he turned his attention to agricultural pursuits, to which he continued to give his energies until his death, October 22, 1882. Vitally loyal to the land of his adoption, he tendered his aid in defense of the Union when the Civil war was precipitated, and he served three years and three months, as a member of Company D, Nineteenth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, with which he took part in many engagements, including several of the important battles that marked the great conflict between the states of the north and the south. In politics he was a Republican, and both he and his wife were consistent communicants of the Catholic church. After the death of her husband Mrs. Wilson continued her residence in Illinois until 1885, when she accompanied her son Joseph F. to Broken Bow, Nebraska, where she subsequently became the wife of David Broam and where she passed the remainder of her life. She was born in Ireland and was forty-eight years of age at the time of her death, in 1887. Of her four children by her first marriage the subject of this review is the only survivor.

Joseph F. Wilson acquired his early education in the public schools of Streator, Illinois, and after his graduation in the high school he found employment in a roller-skating rink. He continued in this service eight months, and thereafter found more profitable employment in connection with railroad construction work.

After having given eighteen months to work in this connection, the romance of railway service pulled upon him, and he resumed the vocation of his earlier years, that of farming. He continued his association with agricultural enterprise in Illinois for one year and then, in 1885, he came to Adams county, Nebraska, where he was similarly engaged for one year. He then came to Custer county, where he continued to be actively engaged in farming until 1911, when he was elected county sheriff. He immediately impressed himself upon the community as a man of vigor, resourcefulness and executive power, and the estimate placed upon his service was best shown in his retention of office for a period of seven years, during which he gave an administration that shall always figure as one of the most admirable in the annals of the official history of the county. In politics Mr. Wilson is aligned as a stalwart in the ranks of the Democratic party, and he has been active and influential in its councils in Custer county. He still retains active association with farm industry and is the owner of a half-section of land in Custer county. As in the past, he here gives much attention to the raising of live stock upon a somewhat extensive scale, and he has been specially successful in the raising of cattle. Mr. Wilson is a royal-arch Mason and is affiliated also with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Modern Woodmen of America, and the Knights of Pythias, in each of which his popularity is of unequivocal order.

March 3, 1892, recorded the marriage of Mr. Wilson to Miss Nellie M. Harris, the ceremony having been performed at Loup City, this state. Mrs. Wilson was born in Ohio and is a daughter of John Harris, who was one of the sterling pioneers of Custer county, where he obtained a homestead and where he became well and favorably known. Mr. and Mrs. Wilson have six children: Hazel is the wife of Harry Holly, of Broken Bow; Gladys is the wife of Ora Swancutt, a farmer near Ansley, this county; Beulah was graduated in the Broken Bow high school as a member of the class of 1918; and Clarence, Doris, and Leland (called "Woodrow" by his companions) are attending the public schools. Mrs. Wilson is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church and is actively interested in its work.

ANDREW PETERSON is a representative farmer and good citizen of Custer county, Nebraska, who has spent almost his entire life here. He was born near Copenhagen, Denmark, November 5, 1882, and is one of a family of eighteen children born to his parents, Milter and Mary (Peterson) Peterson, who are still living, hale and hearty, at Weissert, Custer county, to which village they retired from their homestead, in 1915. They came to the United States and to Callaway, Nebraska, July 4, 1888, and took up a homestead claim in Custer county, north of Oconto, where they continued their residence until they moved to Weissert, as previously mentioned. Of their large family the following survive: Peter, who is superintendent of a screw factory in the city of Hartford, Connecticut, married Hannah Gould; Pete, a bachelor, lives near Oconto; Mary, who is the widow of Nels Johnson, lives five miles south of Berwyn; Milter, who is a farmer and lives at Weissert, married Mabel Govier; Carrie, who is the wife of Christ Peterson, lives at Fremont, Nebraska; Lena is the wife of Henry Henderson, who is clerk in a furniture store in Council Bluffs, Iowa; Andrew is the subject of this sketch; James, who is a section boss on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, at Broken Bow, married Lucy Luther; Christ, who is fireman on a railroad and who lives at Grand Island, Nebraska, married Ruby Woods; and Pretrena is the wife of Daniel Lewis, a railroad section hand, at Oconto, Nebraska. The parents of the above family were members of the Lutheran church in Denmark, but since coming to the United States have been united with the Church of God. The father is a Republican in his political views.

Andrew Peterson was six years old when he accompanied his parents to the United States and his education was obtained in the public schools in Nebraska. He was reared on his father's farm and has followed agricultural pursuits ever since. He was married March 3, 1909, to Mrs. Effie (Barnes) McCaslin, a daughter of John and Emma (Lefler) Barnes. The father of Mrs. Peterson was born in Illinois and the mother in Ohio. They came to Custer county in the spring of 1885 and homesteaded in the neighborhood of Swiss valley, where they lived until 1910, when they removed to Superior, Wisconsin. There Mr. Barnes bought the farm which he continues to operate. Mr. and Mrs. Barnes had six children, namely: Effie, the wife of the subject of this review; Clarence, who is a carpenter by trade and who lives at Broken Bow, married Edna Evans; Orville, who is a railroad man living at State Line, Wisconsin, married Eva Spraker; William, Merle, and Osa, the younger daughter, remain with their parents at Superior, Wisconsin. By her first marriage Mrs. Peterson had three children, the one survivor being Jesse McCaslin, who was born August 23, 1902, and who assists Mr. Peterson on the farm. Mr. and Mrs. Peterson have one son and two daughters: Elmer C., born February 2, 1910; Dorothy, born December 19, 1912; and Emma, born June 24, 1916. Mr. Peterson belongs to the Church of God. He is a Republican in his political views, like his father, but has never been a candidate for office.

CLIFFORD N. BRITTAN was born October 9, 1854, in Lafayette, Indiana. His parents, Francis and Louisa (Gates) Brittan, were natives of England and of their thirteen children only four are now living: Luther A., Mrs. Clara Beard, Mrs. Laura Dix, and Clifford N. The father came to the United States when twenty-one years of age. He landed in New York and at once entered into the silk mercantile business, in which he continued the rest of his life—or until ripe old age caused his retirement.

Mr. Brittan's first recollection of money earned was assorting the small nuggets of mineral that were removed from mines and thrown into the refuse dumps by the miners. His father moved from New York to Indiana, and from there to Dodgeville, Wisconsin. From the Badger state he moved to Burlington, Kansas, about the year 1855. Three years later, in 1858, he moved to Kansas City, but he decided that it was a very unsafe place for a man of Union proclivities. Accordingly, he started for Peoria, Illinois, to look for a situation, and expected his wife and seven small children to follow later by boat. Travel was by water, for the reason that railroads were very scarce and poorly operated in those early days. The steamboats made regular trips. Mrs. Brittan succeeded in getting her family aboard without accident, and the same evening the Confederate soldiers captured the boat, near Boonesville, and started down the river with their prize. Some time during the night they learned that General Lyons had defeated the Confederate army near Boonesville, and this caused them to abandon the boat. The next morning General Lyons took charge of the boat, which he held for three days. Mrs. Brittan sent word to the General concerning her situation and finally the boat's crew were allowed to proceed with the boat to St. Louis, where they landed the passengers. From here Mrs. Brittan and her family proceeded by boat to Peoria, Illinois, where they met the father.

Clifford N. Brittan became a harnessmaker by trade and occupation. He was married on Christmas day, 1871, in Quincy, Iowa, to Alice B. Jones, who was born and reared at that place and who is a daughter of Luke R. Jones and Elizabeth (Parke) Jones, both natives of West Virginia. In the Clifford Brittan family are five children: Frederic C., Walter M., Charles E., Harry F., and Hazel B. Wright. Frederic C. lives on the old Holliway ranch near Arnold and has a water-power plant which furnishes electric power and lights for the village of Arnold. Walter M. is individually mentioned on other pages. Charles E. is located at Alliance, Nebraska, and at present is vice-president of the First State Bank of Alliance. He is also vice-president of the Antioch Bank, at Antioch, and is a potash dealer and operator. Harry is a farmer and ranchman living ten miles southwest of Callaway, where he conducts very successful and extensive ranch operations. Hazel B. is the wife of Carl Wright, of Callaway, who is the Callaway miller.

Clifford N. Brittan came to Custer county in 1889 and engaged in the hotel and livery business. During a period of ten years he gave his attention to farming and ranching, still living in Callaway. In 1917 he sold 1,440 acres of good land, but he still owns a full section—640 acres. In addition to this he has a fine town property and is counted a very successful man. Public-spirited, responsive to every appeal for community improvement, he is an excellent citizen. In politics he is independent, and religiously he is connected with the Methodist church.

CHARLES A. GRANGER, who is a well known and respected citizen of Comstock, Nebraska, is one of the substantial men of Custer county, farming and stock-raising being industries in which he is extensively engaged. Mr. Granger has been a resident of Nebraska for over forty years, but his birth took place in Macomb county, Michigan, June 24, 1843. His parents were Haskell and Eunice (Dibble) Granger, these being good old New England names, but his father was born in New York and his mother in Canada. They were the parents of seven children, three of whom are living, namely: Charles A.; Sallie, the wife of James Chrisman, a retired resident of Wahoo, Nebraska; and Evelyn, the wife of Edward Knod, their home being on their farm in Saunders county, Nebraska.

For a number of years, during which time the parents of Mr. Granger lived in Indiana, the father was engaged in business enterprises in different cities. During an early period he owned and operated a dray line in Michigan City, Indiana, and for three years he conducted a meat market at Crown Point, that state. He then bought a hotel in that village and conducted it two years. In March, 1877, he brought his family to Nebraska and settled in Saunders county. His death occurred in August of the same year. The mother survived him many years, having passed her eighty-ninth birthday when she passed away, in 1915. They were people of real worth and were members of the Methodist Episcopal church. The father was a Republican in politics and was a member of the Masonic fraternity.

Charles A. Granger attended the common schools in Indiana and assisted his father, who, with his other activities, was engaged in farming and stock-raising. Mr. Granger accompanied his parents to Nebraska and his father's death, so shortly afterward, placed added responsibilities on his shoulders. In the spring of 1893 Mr. Granger came to Custer county and bought land. He resided on that tract eleven years, making many improvements, and he then sold the property and moved into Comstock, where he has resided ever since. In the meanwhile he purchased another farm, west of the town. This place contains 110 acres, and he directs the farming and stock-raising industries without living on the farm, making it profitable because he has had abundant experience and still keeps abreast of the times along agricultural lines.

Mr. Granger was married April 25, 1869, at Hebron, Indiana, to Miss Marion Matheson, and they have seven children, as follows: Lydia is the wife of P. T. Walton, and they live at Plattsmouth, Nebraska; Zara, who is a farmer near Sargent, Custer county, married Nannie Seidel; Harry, who is in the well and windmill business at Comstock, married Inez Heller; Clarence, who is a farmer northwest of Comstock, married Maud Cleveland; Eva is the wife of Arnold Simpson, a farmer near Sargent; Florence is the wife of Mahlon Cleveland, a railroad man living at Aurora, Nebraska; and Edith is the wife of Charles Cleveland, a farmer north of Comstock. It is a great satisfaction to Mr. and Mrs. Granger that their children are all so well settled in life and that all, with the exception of two, live near the old home, making it possible for them to have the companionship of their thirty-three grandchildren and their three great-grandchildren. Since taking up his residence at Comstock Mr. Granger has taken an active interest in civic affairs, but not as a politician. His many years have given him a wider experience than some of his fellow citizens and his ripened judgment is frequently consulted in matters of local importance. Mr. Granger is a veteran of the Civil war. He enlisted, at Valparaiso, Indiana, in January, 1862, as a member of Company B, One Hundred and Fifty-first Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and he served one year. He was then discharged on account of sickness. He took part in several minor skirmishes but in no important battles.

CHARLES L. MULLINS, M. D.—The medical profession of Custer county has no more skilled or distinguished member than Dr. Charles L. Mullins, who, both as a private practitioner and in numerous positions of public trust, has gained a state-wide reputation. He is a veteran of the Spanish-American war and in connection with the nation's participation in the great world war he has been an indefatigable worker in behalf of the government's interests. The high esteem in which he is held by his professional confreres is evidenced by his being chosen president of the Nebraska State Medical Society.

Dr. Charles L. Mullins was born at Winchester, Clark county, Missouri, January 27, 1867, a son of William B. and Anna M. (Kephart) Mullins. His paternal grandfather, Reuben Baker Mullins, was born in Virginia and at an early day went overland into Kentucky, as a contemporary of Daniel Boone. He was married in Virginia to Betsy Love before emigrating, and both passed the rest of their lives in the Blue Grass state. The maternal grandfather of Doctor Mullins was Henry Kephart, who was born in Pennsylvania, moved to Kentucky, married Sallie Teaters, and finally settled in the neighborhood of Blakesburg, Iowa, where he was engaged in farming until his death and where Mrs. Kephart also spent her last years. William B. Mullins was born in Pendleton county, Kentucky, in 1814, and as a young man adopted the profession of school teaching, a capacity in which he went to Blakesburg, Wapello county, Iowa, where he wedded Miss Anna M. Kephart, who was born in Kentucky, in 1833. Some time after their marriage they moved to Winchester, Clark county, Missouri, where they were residing at the outbreak of the Civil war, and Mr. Mullins enlisted in the Twenty-first Regiment of Missouri Volunteer Infantry. At the close of a gallant service, he returned to Missouri, resumed merchandising, and continued to be so occupied until his death, which occurred August 11, 1884. Mrs. Mullins survived him until 1917. They were the parents of six children: William H., of Missouri; R. B., a dental practitioner of Broken Bow; Mary, the widow of C. W. Bollinger, formerly a retail and wholesale music dealer of Oskaloosa, Iowa; Sallie, the wife of S. W. Parr, of that place; Dr. Charles L.; and Luzenna, the wife of Fred Trico, of Oskaloosa, Iowa. William B. Mullins was a Mason and in politics was a Democrat.

Charles L. Mullins attended the public schools of Missouri, Iowa, and Nebraska, and as a youth took up the study of pharmacy, completing his education therein at Northwestern University, Chicago. He was registered and began the practice of pharmacy in Cass county, Nebraska, where he resided for several years, and while thus engaged he became interested in the study of medicine, to which he applied himself personally for some time before entering the Omaha Medical College. Graduated with his degree in the class of 1891, he began practice at Gretna, Nebraska. In 1892 he removed to Eagle; in 1894 he came to Ansley, Custer county; and in 1895 he centered his activities at Broken Bow, where he has since carried on a general practice. He is a close and careful student of his profession, and on several occasions has taken post graduate courses at Chicago.

Not long after his location at Broken Bow, the Spanish-American war came on, and Doctor Mullins enlisted as a medical officer, receiving the rank of captain with the First Nebraska Volunteers. He served in the Philippines and rendered valuable service to his country as a member of the first board of health at Manila after the American occupation. Much of his time recently, in fact since the entrance of the United States into the great war, has been devoted to war work of varied character, and he gave specially effective service as a member of the exemption board of Custer county. Several years ago Dr. Mullins served as coroner of Custer county, and at present he is county health officer, a post which he has held for a number of terms. He is also a member of the Nebraska state board of medical examiners. He belongs to the Custer County Medical Society, of which he has been secretary for a number of years, and of which he was formerly president; he was president of the Nebraska State Medical Society for the year 1918; and he is a member also of the Missouri Valley Medical Society and the American Medical Association. In politics he is a Democrat, and he is affiliated with the Masonic fraternity, including the Scottish Rite.

By a former marriage Doctor Mullins has three children. The eldest, Tom P., is engaged in the practice of dentistry at Valparaiso, Nebraska. Charles L., Jr., is a graduate of West Point Military Academy, 1917, and at the time of this writing he is a captain in the Twelfth Infantry, United States Army, stationed at Camp Fremont, California, awaiting orders to go to France. The only daughter, Mary, is the wife of H. Mashburn, a California ranchman. Dr. Mullins was married October 18, 1904, to Thankful Z. (Potts) Day, who was born in Kansas, but reared in California. She is a member of the Episcopal church.

ALBERT P. JOHNSON, now one of the leading members of the Custer county legal fraternity, did not initiate his active career as a professional man. It was not until he had for some years been engaged in pursuits of a commercial nature that he took up the study of law, but since his entrance upon this field of endeavor, in 1903, he has advanced steadily in prestige and to-day he is adjudged one of Broken Bow's leading attorneys. Mr. Johnson was born at Racine, Wisconsin, October 22, 1871, a son of Burt and Caroline (Swinson) Johnson.

Shortly after the close of the Civil war, Burt Johnson took up his residence at Racine, Wisconsin, where he was married and settled down to work as a skilled mechanic in the wagon shops of the Mitchell Lewis Company. Later he secured business interests of his own, and, becoming independent in means, in 1911 he retired from active affairs and removed to Kearney, Nebraska, where he and his wife now reside, in the enjoyment of the comforts that come to those who have lived industrious and honorable lives. While not connected with any particular religious denomination, they are Christian people who live the true faith and whose actions are guided by honorable motives. Mr. Johnson is a Prohibitionist in politics. They are the parents of four sons: J. W., who is a carpenter of Broken Bow; Albert P., whose name introduces this review; Edward J., who is engaged in farming in Lincoln county, Nebraska; and Benjamin S., who likewise is a successful farmer, with a property west of Merna, Custer county.

The public schools of Racine, Wisconsin, furnished Albert P. Johnson with his early education, following which he enrolled as a student at a school at Gibbon, Nebraska, this school later becoming York College, York, Nebraska. He was duly graduated after completing the prescribed course, in 1891. For several years he was variously employed, but in August, 1895, came to Broken Bow, where he began clerking. He gradually drifted into the insurance business, and while thus employed came into contact with a number of problems that attracted his interest to the law. Deciding that he would follow a professional career, he began studying under Kirkpatrick Brothers, a well known law firm of the city at that time, and eventually he went to the State University of Oregon, where he completed a course and was graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Laws, in 1903. On his return to Broken Bow, he at once engaged in practice, and since that time has devoted himself unremittingly to his calling. For a time he was engaged alone, but eventually became, as now, a member of the firm of Sullivan, Squires & Johnson. This is considered one of the strong legal combinations of the county, and has been retained in numerous cases where important litigated interests have been opposed. Not long after his admittance to the bar, Mr. Johnson was elected county attorney of Custer county, and he acted in that capacity during 1904 and 1905, since which time he has not cared to have his name used in connection with public positions, preferring to give his large clientele his undivided attention and energies. He belongs to the county and state bar associations and to the Modern Woodmen of America, and in political faith he is a Democrat.

Mr. Johnson was married, March 4, 1894, to Miss Lola M. Hogg, who was born in Iowa, a daughter of John A. and Margaret (Hall) Hogg, pioneers of the Hawkeye state. To this union there have been born five children: Esther R., who is the wife of Merlin C. Vannice; Albert Paul, who is in the United States Army, as a member of Flying Squadron C, stationed in Georgia at the time of this writing; Thelma R., the wife of William Schultz; and Margaret and Carol, public-school students. Mr. and Mrs. Johnson and their children belong to the United Brethren church.

JAMES D. HASKELL, one of Custer county's best known and most respected citizens, came here in the spring of 1876, before the county was organized. He is a man of interesting personality and the experiences he lived through form an absorbing page of the county's history and are told with the gift of the true story teller.

James D. Haskell was born June 2, 1853, in Butler county, Ohio. His father, Enoch Haskell, was a substantial farmer of Butler county and reared his son in that practical way that in large measure prepared him well for the hardships, experiences and changed conditions that later entered his life. The district schools gave him an education that sufficed for ordinary social and business affairs in his early manhood, and later, in the school of experience, he has widened and broadened his knowledge. In the spring of 1876 many eager homeseekers turned their eyes toward Nebraska and, when they were able to choose, very many of them decided to settle in Custer county. Mr. Haskell entered the county with 100 head of yearling heifers, for which he had paid $700 and which he had driven from Ellis, Kansas. He located a claim about eight miles west of Calloway.

When Mr. Haskell came to Custer county he was a man of family. In December, 1880, at Eaton, Ohio, he was united in marriage to Miss Cora L. Wilcher, a daughter of Joseph Wilcher, and seven children were born to them, namely: Kent, Essie, Arlie, Alta, Hazel, Iela, and Minnie.

Mr. Haskell is an honored pioneer who has had startling adventures and unique experiences in Custer county, and the reader is referred to the detailed account of the same given in another part of this history.

HARRY C. EVANS, proprietor of the Evans Hereford Ranch, located two miles west of Callaway, Custer county, has been for many years known to the citizens of this community, to which he came with his parents in the year 1887. He is now known as a prominent and successful breeder of registered Hereford cattle and registered Percheron horses—a line of business in which he has been engaged for five years, and in connection with which he is rapidly taking rank with the leading stockmen of the county.

Harry C. Evans, who was born at Mason, Effingham county, Illinois, February 12, 1877, is a son of Joshua H. and Samantha (Gibson) Evans, and a grandson of John Gibson. His father was a Republican in his political sympathies, was a blacksmith by trade and followed this vocation in Illinois for a number of years, both he and his wife having been faithful members of the Methodist Episcopal church. They had two children: Launa, who is the wife of George H. La Fleur; and Harry C. When Harry C. Evans was four years of age his parents moved to What Cheer, Iowa, and he attended the public schools of that place and also at Perry and North Platte. He finished his schooling in Custer county, Nebraska. The only son of his parents, he early displayed industry and a predilection for his father's business, and when he was still so small that he had to stand upon a box, he began earning money at his father's forge, where he placed himself in front of the anvil and did striking to make a weld. He thoroughly mastered his father's trade and with him moved to Callaway in 1887. Here father and son continued blacksmithing together until the elder man was elected postmaster, an office which he capably filled for a period of twelve years. In the meantime Harry C. Evans continued the blacksmith business until 1913, when he disposed of his interests to turn his attention in the direction of raising and breeding stock. For some time past he had been interested in the subject of Hereford cattle and Percheron horses, and when he bought the 720-acre tract, two miles west of Callaway, which is known as the Evans Hereford Ranch, he began with characteristic energy to breed registered animals in both these lines. He has met with surprising success during the five years that he has been engaged in this business, and the results that he has attained have made him known as somewhat of an authority on the subject. Mr. Evans occupies an established place in the confidence of his associates and the general public, and is a progressive citizen who supports beneficial and constructive movements in his community. He is a Republican, but not an office-seeker, and he and his wife are members of the Methodist Episcopal church.

Mr. Evans was married June 23, 1907, at Mason City, Iowa, to Miss Frankie M. Crossley, the only child of Amasa A. and Gertrude (Van Fleet) Crossley, the former a native of Pennsylvania, and the latter of Auburn, New York. Mr. and Mrs. Crossley were members of the Episcopal church, and the father belonged to the Odd Fellows' fraternity. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Evans: Gertrude June, attending the Callaway schools as a student of the third grade; and Robert C., Frankie M., and Harriet L., at home.

BRYAN LEONARD.—The art of healing is as old as man, and there have been and still are many and diverse systems. One of these that has become very generally accepted among well informed people, because of its remarkable efficacy when other systems have entirely failed, is known under the name of chiropractic. Its practitioners are of both sexes, as in other medical schools, and are graduates of institutions which thoroughly teach the underlying scientific principles of this admirable system.

Bryan Leonard, who is well known as a chiropractor at Callaway, Nebraska, was born in Ireland, in 1882, a son of Hubert and Julia (Freeman) Leonard, who were likewise born in Ireland, and of whose large family of children eight are living—Mrs. Mary Tehon, John J., Michael M., James G., Patrick F., Hubert, Bryan, and Charles E. Dr. Bryan Leonard was four years old when his parents came to the United States and settled in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and in 1886 the family came to Custer county, Nebraska, and located in Eureka valley. There he grew to manhood, attending school and assisting his father in boyhood and afterward following farming and ranching on his own account. Prior to taking up chiropractic, Dr. Leonard taught in the schools of Custer county for eight years. It would be interesting to know what definitely turned Dr. Leonard's attention to the profession for which he is so eminently qualified, but statistics are at hand that show that in 1911 he became a student of chiropractic, at Davenport, Iowa, and he was graduated in the Chiropractic College in that city.

Dr. Leonard was married in 1905, in Custer county, to Miss Elizabeth J. Schmitz, who is a daughter of John B. and Ann (Wardrobe) Schmitz, and they have one son, Gale H. Mrs. Leonard also is a chiropractor, having likewise been educated at Davenport, Iowa, and having graduated in the same class with her husband. They both practiced at Farmington, Iowa, and at Milton, Iowa, prior to locating at Callaway, in 1914. Here they have been continuously engaged in practice with the exception of the time required for a post-graduate course, which they have both completed, and Mrs. Leonard has also completed a full course in Red Cross work. They have built up a fine practice here and have state licenses for both Nebraska and Kansas.

JAMES R. DEAN, associate justice of the supreme court of Nebraska, came for Chicago to Custer county in October, 1890, and has resided here ever since except when serving on the supreme bench, when, as the law provides, he resides at Lincoln. He is a native of St. Louis, Missouri, and is of Scotch-Irish ancestry. He is a son of Henry and Ellen Margaret Dean. His mother's family name was Armour. She was a native of South Carolina, but her parents were of Scotch-Irish descent. Judge Dean's father emigrated from County Antrim, Ireland, as a boy of seventeen, without means. He became a tanner and leather merchant at St. Louis, with interests in tanneries at Allegheny and other points in Pennsylvania. When he retired from business he engaged in farming. He died in 1889 and his widow passed away in 1901, their remains being interred in the family plot of ground in Woodland cemetery at Des Moines, Iowa.

Judge Dean acquired his preliminary education in his native city and at Decorah, Iowa. When he was ten years old he visited Europe with his father, and in later years he has visited nearly every state in the Union, as well as Mexico and Canada. After his eleventh year, except when in school, he worked on a farm until he entered upon his profession. In 1885 he was graduated from the law department of the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, besides taking other branches of study at the university and paying his own way through school. That year he located and entered practice in Chicago, where he remained until he came to Broken Bow. He was the fourth to hold the office of county attorney here, being first elected in 1894 and re-elected in 1896. He was city attorney of Broken Bow four years and a member of the board of education ten years, serving four years as president. In his first year as city attorney he compiled the ordinances of 1904.

In January, 1892, Judge Dean married Miss Jennie E. Sutton, daughter of Albert Y. and Abbie C. Sutton, of Broken Bow, and they have two children, Paul H. and Dorothy S. Dean.

On January 1, 1909, the subject of this review was appointed supreme judge, by Governor George L. Sheldon, when the constitutional amendment was adopted increasing the membership of the supreme court from three judges to seven. In 1911, on a party ticket, he failed of election to the supreme bench, by a narrow margin, but he led his party judicial ticket in the state by about 9,000 votes. He has membership in the American Bar Association; the Masonic Fraternity, including the Royal Arch Chapter, the Knights Templars, and the Shrine; and also the Odd Fellows. He is a Presbyterian, as were his forefathers. In 1906 he was commissioned from the presbytery to the General Assembly at Des Moines, Iowa. He is a Democrat—perhaps one of the best known of that party in Nebraska. In 1913 he was a Wilson presidential elector-at-large.

November 7, 1916, Judge Dean was elected judge of the supreme court for a term of six years. At that election there were six candidates for the supreme bench, three of whom were elected. They were not the candidates of any political party but appeared as individuals on a separate ballot, without party designation. The total vote for supreme judge in Custer county that year was 5,163, and of these

Judge Dean received 4,024 votes. His decisions and written opinions are said to have the merit of such brevity as is consistent with clearness. Those written by him during his appointive term are in volumes 83, 84, and 85 of the Nebraska Supreme Court Reports and volumes 120 to 124 of the Northwestern Reporter. His opinions for his present elective term begin in volume 100 of the Nebraska Reports, and the current Northwestern Reporters beginning with volume 161. Some of his opinions appear in "Lawyers Reports Annotated" and in other legal publications.

Northeast of Broken Bow Judge Dean has some land where he successfully grows alfalfa. In 1910 he became interested in this plant, and now he has almost 100 acres that yield from two to three crops yearly.

GEORGE I. SELLON, M. D., city physician of Broken Bow, has been one of the prominent members of his profession here since 1912, and his splendid acquirements have served to attract to him a large professional following, while his standing among his fellow practitioners has led to his being the recipient of various honors in the Custer County Medical Society. Doctor Sellon was born at Murray, Iowa, July 24, 1882, and is a son of Henry and Alice (Swickard) Sellon.

Henry Sellon was born in Illinois, the son of a Methodist Episcopal minister who came to the United States from England. For a time Henry Sellon was engaged in farming in his native state, but after his marriage to Miss Swickard, who was a native of Pennsylvania, he went to Iowa and purchased a farm in the vicinity of Murray, Clarke county. About 1895 the family home was changed to Wyoming, in which state the mother's death occurred, and Mr. Sellon subsequently went to Harding, Arkansas, where he is living on his own farm. There were four children in the family, of whom three are living: Stella, who is the wife of C. P. Budd, a stockman of Marbletown, Wyoming; Edward L., who served as a soldier during the Spanish-American war and died soon after the close of that struggle; George I., who is the subject of this sketch; and Mabel, the wife of Dr. C. D. Stafford, a practicing physician of Kemmerer, Wyoming. Mr. Sellon is affiliated with the Methodist Episcopal church and in politics is a Republican.

George I. Sellon attended the public schools of Murray, Iowa, and the high school at Evanston, Wyoming, following which he pursued a course in the Wyoming State University, at Laramie. There he was graduated in 1905, with the degrees of Bachelor of Arts and Bachelor of Philosophy. After his graduation he engaged in educational work, and for three years he was superintendent of schools at Cumberland, Wyoming, but his preferred profession was that of medicine, and he accordingly entered the medical college of the Nebraska State University, being graduated in 1912, with the degree of Doctor of Medicine. During his final year at college he worked as an interne in the Swedish Hospital at Omaha, and following his graduation, fully prepared, he came to Broken Bow and established himself in practice. He has been very successful in the building up of a large professional business and while his practice is of a general character, he has made somewhat of a specialty of diseases of the eye, ear, nose, and throat, of which he has made a particular and thorough study, and a field in which he has gained some reputation. Dr. Sellon is serving as city physician of Broken Bow. He belongs to the Custer County Medical Society, of which he was secretary in 1915 and president in 1917, and he holds membership also in the Nebraska State Medical Society and the American Medical Association. He enjoys an excellent reputation as a physician who closely observes the highest professional ethics. Politically he supports the Republican party. In Masonry he has risen to high rank, belonging to the Scottish Rite bodies and also the Mystic Shrine.

In 1912 Dr. Sellon married Miss Myrtle L. Leffler, who was born at Exeter, Nebraska, a daughter of F. J. Leffler, who served through the Civil war and was an early settler of Nebraska. To this union has been born one son: Dale I., now three years old. Mrs. Sellon is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church.

WILLIAM E. HEAPS, who is a fine example of the thrifty, enterprising farming class of Custer county, was born on his father's farm seven miles northeast of Broken Bow, March 8, 1888. His parents are Charles G. and Elzina (Wheeler) Heaps, both of whom were born in Indiana, from which state they came to Custer county, Nebraska; in its early days of permanent settlement. They are highly respected farming people and are members of the Baptist church. They have the following children: Oliver, Frank, William E., Charles, Rex, Ada, Margaret, and Leone. The father belongs to the Modern Woodmen of America and in politics votes with the Populist party.

William E. Heaps obtained his education by attending the public schools in the winter time, and he remained at home assisting his father until he was twenty years of age. The first money he earned for himself was fifty cents a day, paid him by Joseph Holcomb. He has been frugal and industrious and he owns what is known as the Peter Mohat place, situated six miles north of Broken Bow, and consisting of 600 acres of valuable Nebraska soil.

Mr. Heaps was married June 11, 1913, to Miss Velma Smith, who is a daughter of Charles and Rose (McGraw) Smith, and a granddaughter of James McGraw. Mr. and Mrs. Heaps have three children: Marie H., Clarence G., and Lois M. He belongs to the Baptist church.

LON DAVIS, a substantial retired farmer now residing in Custer county, owns a large amount of valuable property in the vicinity of Broken Bow—forty acres adjoining the city and 420 acres situated two miles to the east. He came first to Nebraska in the spring of 1882, and although farming and cattle-raising have been his main industries since then, there is one interval which he recalls with a great deal of interest, that being several years during which he rode the range as a cowboy. Mr. Davis was born in the village of McCarthy, Ohio, July 2, 1850. His parents were David A. and Louisa (Davis) Davis, his paternal grandparents coming from Wales and his maternal ancestors from England. By trade his father was a stonecutter. He belonged to the order of Odd Fellows and he and wife were members of the Methodist Episcopal church. They had seven children, namely: Lon, Charles, Ellsworth, William M., Benjamin F., Hannah, and Clara B. All of these children are living except Hannah.

Lon Davis lived at home in Jackson county, Ohio, until he was eight years old and after that made his home for some years with Hon. H. S. Bunday, then a member of congress, who was the father-in-law of Senator Foraker. In the spring of 1882 Mr. Davis came from Ohio to Dawson county, Nebraska, and for the two succeeding years he lived near Trapper's Grove, two miles east of Sumner, moving then to the vicinity of Georgetown, on the South Loup river. In the spring of 1886 he rode the range and trailed cattle down the South Loup river from the Streeter Woods ranch to Glendive, Montana. With his cowboy comrades he assisted in ferrying the cattle across the Yellowstone river and then drove the cattle 150 miles northwest, to the new ranch. During this trip they went through Rapid City and the Black Hills and had serious times in their efforts to get water while passing through the 100-mile strip known as the Bad Lands, in South Dakota. Mr. Davis has many entertaining stories to relate concerning cowboy life as he experienced it while with the H-3 ranch on Running Water, and his description of the method of a roundup is very interesting. When a roundup is started different camps are located where water and feed are plentiful. A large territory is worked and the cattle are driven in and "night-herded" until many miles of territory have been included, when the bunches of cattle are all thrown together and each outfit cuts out its own brand and then works them back to their own range. The roundup was often the scene of much sport, and sometimes remarkable horsemanship was displayed in cutting out and branding the calves. Frequently also the "boys" engaged in riding contests after their business was completed, and their equestrian skill has long been the theme of verse and story, besides which, it may be added, it frequently has been a main feature in motion-picture work, in recent years.

Mr. Davis was married at Broken Bow, September 3, 1890, to Miss Emma Sanderson, who is a daughter of John and Hannah S. (Chapman) Sanderson, and a granddaughter of John and Hannah (Watson) Sanderson. Mr. and Mrs. Davis have five children: Mrs. Clara B. Taylor, Mrs. Ruth A. Copsey, Ina M., Alon E., and Elbert D. Miss Ina M. Davis is a popular teacher. The family belongs to the Presbyterian church. Mr. Davis is a good citizen but not a seeker for office. In politics he is a Republican.

W. H. PENN, who is now numbered among the substantial business men of Broken Bow, has been the architect of his own fortune, and, having based his life's structure on substantial foundations, has builded soundly and well. When he entered upon his career he was possessed of little save inherent ability and a determination to succeed, and these have been sufficient, through their development, to enable him to become a well-to-do merchant in a community that does not lack for able men.

Mr. Penn was born in Linn county, Iowa, December 18, 1866, a son of Charles and Emily (Swecker) Penn, a sketch of whose career will be found in the review of Charles Penn. elsewhere in this work. He attended the public schools of York, Nebraska, and was sixteen years of age when he accompanied his parents to Broken Bow, where his first work was in the official capacity of deputy sheriff under his father, who was at that time sheriff of Custer county. His strict attention to duty in that position gained him public confidence, and he was subsequently made city marshal, an office which he held for one year, but eventually he turned his attention to mercantile pursuits, accepting a position as clerk in one of Broken Bow's stores. After twelve years of experience in this direction, he engaged in the clothing business on his own account, and subsequently he added dry goods, shoes and men's furnishing goods. The firm name is now Penn & Rodgers Company, and the establishment carries a large and up-to-date line of attractive goods, its trade having grown and developed from a small beginning to a point where four clerks are given regular employment and extra help is needed for Saturday night's business. Mr. Penn is accounted an energetic, thoroughly capable and strictly honorable man of business, and his standing and reputation are high in commercial circles and with the general public.

In 1895 Mr. Penn was united in marriage to Miss Maude Hurless, who was born in Iowa, a daughter of John and Mary E. Hurless. The Hurless family resided for a few years in Iowa, but in the '80s came to Nebraska, where Mr. Hurless and his wife passed away. For many years Mr. Hurless was a railroad man, principally employed in bridge construction work, as a foreman. To Mr. and Mrs. Penn there have been born five children: Charles, who is identified with the Bell Telephone Company, at Bridgeport, Nebraska; Louise, who resides with her parents; Harry, who is attending a school of wireless telegraphy at Minneapolis; and John and Winifred, also students, at home. Mrs. Penn is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church. Mr. Penn is fraternally identified with the blue lodge and chapter of the Masonic order. A Republican in politics, he is influential in his party, and has taken a keen interest and helpful part in civic affairs, being at this time a member of the Broken Bow city council. It has been his fortune to have attained many of his ideals and ambitions, and to have so directed his affairs in life that he has won success without the aid of outside influences—he is an excellent example of the self-made man.

GEORGE E. PENNINGTON, M. D.—Dr. Pennington, who is familiarly known in Broken Bow and throughout Custer county, was born March 28, 1875, in Stewartsville.

Missouri. His father, Robert T. Pennington, was a man of sterling worth and came of a fine line of Kentucky ancestors, he himself being a native of Kentucky. The Doctor's mother's maiden name was Martha M. Kerns. The immediate family circle of which Dr. Pennington is a representative, was a large one, —there were fourteen children, seven of whom are living at the present time. Recording their names we have the following: John, William R., George E., James L., Margaret E. Duncan, Eliza Sweitzer, and Emma Gauntt.

The Doctor's father served three years in the Home Guards of his native state. He has a record of having lived fifty-three years on his Missouri homestead, where he reared his children. When the Doctor was a small boy he worked on the farm, doing such work and chores as generally fall to the lot of a farmer boy. His first money was earned by dropping corn by hand in the cut-over stump land of Missouri. This was a hard job, and there is small doubt but that the boy earned the twenty-five cents per diem. After finishing the common schools he attended the Wesley University at Cameron, Missouri, from 1894 to 1896, inclusive. After this he entered Emsworth Medical School, at St. Joseph, Missouri, where he completed a four years' course, graduating in 1902. In addition to this medical preparation, the Doctor was a student at St. Louis for several months, rounding out and completing his medical course. In 1902 he was married, at Bolivar, Missouri, to Miss Julia E. Egbert, who since that time has been his companion and helpmeet, sharing with him all the vicissitudes of a rising young physician bent on establishing a lucrative practice in a western country. Mrs. Pennington, like her husband, is a native of Missouri, and is a daughter of Caldon G. Egbert, who was a native of Illinois. Her mother, whose maiden name was Sarah M. Gardner, was a native of Tennessee. In the Egbert family of which Mrs. Pennington was a member were five children — Emma Rollins, Julia E. Pennington, William T. Egbert, Charles L. Egbert, and John A. Egbert.

Dr. and Mrs. Pennington have three children. The oldest, Marie E., is in the high school; Pauline is finishing the eighth grade; and Georgia is in the fifth grade.

After his graduation and marriage, Dr. Pennington came to Custer county and located at Anselmo, where he engaged in the drug business, which he handled in connection with his medical practice. He remained at this place until 1908, when he moved to Broken Bow and commenced the building of the lucrative practice he now enjoys. This city has been his home since that time. The Doctor is, well and favorably known, not only in Anselmo and Broken Bow, which have been his home towns, but throughout the entire county. In the early days of his practice, trips were long, and consequently he was called long distances into the country for consultation purposes and often met the people of other towns in the county. His official position has tended to widen his acquaintance. He has served the county as health officer for eight years, and for seven years prior to the abolition of the office of coroner he served as county coroner. In fraternal circles the Doctor has been an ambitious climber and is to-day one of the few thirty-second degree Masons in the county. He is also an Odd Fellow and ranks high in the councils of that fraternity. Politically, he affiliates with the Republican party. He and his family are connected with the Christian church, where they are faithful and constant attendants. Whenever the Doctor's professional duties will permit, he is found attending the church services held on the Sabbath day. Dr. and Mrs. Pennington are estimable people and held in high esteem by all their neighbors, fellow townsmen, and a wide circle of friends.

COMMODORE C. BIGGERSTAFF. — One of the members of the retired colony of Broken Bow, Mr. Biggerstaff, during a long and active career, has been successful in his operations as agriculturist and business man, and the extent and importance of his various holdings at this time serve to give him a position of prominence among his city's capitalists. He was born in Athens county, Ohio, October 27, 1852, a son of John J. and Nancy (Sickles) Biggerstaff, who passed their lives in Knox county, Illinois, having moved there from their Ohio home in the fall of 1853. There the senior Biggerstaff was a farmer and stock raiser. They were members of the United Brethren church, and the father was a Democrat and a member of the Masonic fraternity. Seven children were born to John J. and Nancy Biggerstaff: Commodore C. is the subject of this sketch; Alonzo died in infancy; Julia E. is the wife of Richard Williams, of Kansas City, Missouri; Josephine is the wife of Henry Wesner; Margaret, is deceased; Mary A., is the wife of James W. Ramp; John C., is a retired capitalist of Oakland, California.

Mr. Biggerstaff was given a public school education in Knox county, Illinois, and also spent the winter of 1875-6 at Knox College, Galesburg, Illinois, following which he returned to the home farm. He and his family remained in Illinois until 1880.

Mr. Biggerstaff was married July 7, 1878, in Knox county, Illinois, to Miss Jennie Cook, a daughter of John W. and Elizabeth (Ramp) Cook, the ceremony taking place at the home of the bride's grandfather, Benjamin Ramp, a wealthy farmer and stock-raiser. To this union one son was born, Chauncey C., born July 26, 1904. John W. Cook came from York, Nebraska, to Broken Bow in 1890 and embarked in the grocery business, which he followed continually here until his death, February 7, 1908. He was a Republican, a substantial citizen, and a member of the Odd Fellows lodge. He and Mrs. Cook were the parents of four children: Laurretta L., who is the wife of Thomas L. Sharp; Jennie, who is the wife of Commodore C. Biggerstaff; Mary Elizabeth, who died in infancy; and Wilson Gaster, formerly a physician and minister of the Methodist church, a graduate of the osteopathic school at Kirksville, Missouri, who died in March, 1908.

In the spring of 1880 Mr. and Mrs. Biggerstaff came to Nebraska and located at York, where he was engaged in the mercantile and cattle business until May, 1884, when he moved to Broken Bow, Custer county. In that year he engaged in the lumber business, under the firm name of Biggerstaff & Hershey, and in this enterprise he continued about four years. In the meantime, in 1886, he took up land two miles northwest of Broken Bow, and during the next twenty-three years he was engaged in agricultural pursuits and stock-raising. He then retired and took up his residence at Broken Bow, where he is accounted one of the city's most substantial citizens, being the owner of large tracts of land as well as stock in valuable oil wells and paying coal mines. Mr. Biggerstaff is a Democrat, but is not in any sense a politician. He belongs to the Presbyterian church, of which Mrs. Biggerstaff is a prominent attendant, having been one of the seven charter members of the Broken Bow congregation, in 1885. She has always been prominent in church work, and was likewise instrumental in the formation of Broken Bow's library association.

SAMUEL VAN BUSKIRK, a resident of Custer county, since 1888, has been variously identified with the interests of this region since the time of his arrival and, principally as an agriculturist, has accumulated a competence that permits him to pass the evening of life in comfortable circumstances, in his pleasant home at Merna. A native of the Keystone state, Mr. Van Buskirk was born in Monroe county, Pennsylvania, May 6, 1848. His father, Samuel Van Buskirk, also was a native of Pennsylvania, where he was born in 1808, and he died at Alta, Iowa, in 1891. He was a successful farmer and in 1856 he became a pioneer settler in Iowa, in which state he resided for different intervals in Delaware, Dubuque, and Buena Vista counties. The mother of our subject was in her maidenhood, Mary Ann McNeal. She was a native of Pennsylvania, in which state she married, and her last days were spent in Alta, Iowa. She and her husband were members of the Methodist Episcopal church.

Samuel Van Buskirk was a lad of eight years when the family settled in Iowa and in that state he was reared on a farm. When he reached his majority he chose the occupation with which he was familiar, and in Buena Vista county, Iowa, he followed agricultural pursuits until 1888. He then became a resident of Custer county, Nebraska, where he pre-empted 120 acres, north of Broken Bow. His first home was a sod house, and pioneer conditions were still in evidence on every hand. Five years later he purchased land north of Merna, and there he conducted farming and stock-raising operations with good success for many years. While a resident of Iowa he learned the value and superior quality of the Aberdeen Angus cattle and he brought to Custer county a fine male of that breed. While he was engaged in diversified farming, his pastures were well stocked with that type of cattle, for which he found a ready demand on the market, such stock having a reputation for generally commanding top prices. Industry and good judgment have marked the career of this progressive exponent of the agricultural and livestock interests of his adopted county, and Mr. Van Buskirk has been able to retire with a competence, being the owner of 600 acres of land.

In Iowa Mr. Van Buskirk was united in marriage to Miss Ann Elizabeth Van Buskirk, a native of New Jersey, and she presides with grace and dignity over their beautiful new home in Merna. Four children came to bless the home: Bessie is an accomplished and popular teacher in the Merna schools; Jesse is a merchant at Merna; Lura is the wife of David Ward and they reside at Marcus, Nebraska; and Della is deceased.

The family are members of the United Brethren church and Mr. Van Buskirk is a Republican in politics. Fraternally he belongs to the Merna lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and also the Masonic lodge of Merna. Though seventy years of age, Mr. Van Buskirk is a man who might pass for one twenty years younger, and he is still active in affairs, looking after his landed interests and being a director in the Bank of Merna. He is recognized as one of Custer county's public-spirited citizens and in every relation of life measures up the full standard of American citizenship.

ROBERT D. McCARTY is one of Custer county's pioneer citizens and is now living retired in a beautiful home in Merna. Robert D. McCarty is a native of New York state, and was born near Syracuse, March 9, 1840. His parents, Dennis and Hanora (Clifford) McCarty, were natives respectively of County Cork and County Tipperary, Ireland. They immigrated to the United States when young people and were married in New York. Dennis McCarty became a farmer, and about the close of the Civil war located on a farm in Webster county, Iowa, near Fort Dodge, where he and his wife spent the remainder of their days.

Robert D. McCarty was reared on a farm in New York and accompanied his parents to Iowa. About this time he engaged in railroad-construction work, which he followed for many years.

In the spring of 1880 he and his family, in company with the Downey and Corcoran families, came to Custer county, and he secured as a homestead the southwest quarter of section 14, township 18, range 22. He also took a tree claim of 160 acres, but as the trees did not make a very good growth he pre-empted this land, and this half-section was the scene of his activities until he retired. He has been successful as a farmer and to-day is the owner of 800 acres of land.

On September 10, 1870, at Fort Dodge, Iowa, was solemnized the marriage of Robert D. McCarty and Anna Downey, a native of Scranton, Luzern county, Pennsylvania, a daughter of John and Ellen (Sweeney) Downey, a record of whom appears elsewhere in this volume. The home of Mr. and Mrs. McCarty has been blessed with the birth of eleven children, all of whom have grown to maturity, and as the hand of death has not yet entered this household they have every reason to be thankful. The record of the children is as follows: James owns and operates a farm in Custer county; Lizzie is the wife of Ambrose Sweeney, of Merna; Ella became the wife of Edward Snell, residing in Seattle, Washington; John is a farmer on East Table; Joseph is a merchant in Merna; Mike and Robert operate land belonging to their father; Frank is the owner of a farm near the old home place; Ambrose is a member of the national army; Raymond is engaged in farming and is still a bachelor; and Margaret is the wife of J. D. Christ, of Anselmo.

Mr. and Mrs. McCarty are among the very early settlers of the county and recount many interesting incidents pertaining to the early days and the hardships with which they had to contend. One of the greatest obstacles to overcome was the matter of securing water. When the McCarty family and those who accompanied them came to Nebraska they drove with teams. Just northwest of where Broken Bow now stands they stopped to inquire of some men where they might get water for their stock and for family use. J. D. Ream, who had located there that spring, pointed to a spot where he said was the well and said they could help themselves. On reaching the spot, they discovered a horse had fallen into the well and no water could be had. They continued their journey to the locality where they had filed on land, and the next day sent a hired man and one of the sons to get water on Victoria creek. They failed to find this stream and returned with water which they had scooped up out of a buffalo wallow, and which could be used only after a thorough process of boiling.

Not a sign of anyone ever having been here could be seen, not a wagon track in Dale valley, and their nearest neighbors on the north were in the Black Hills. Their first home, in which the family lived for several years, was constructed of sod, the bit of lumber used in it being hauled from Grand Island. For several years after coming here Mr. McCarty followed railroading, while the wife and children held down the claim. The winter of 1881 was one of the worst ever seen in this country. Starting on the 11th of December it snowed continuously until the 25th, and it looked strange to the family to see a blizzard raging and the sun shining. The snow was nine feet deep on the level. The prairies in those days were covered with fleas, which gave considerable annoyance to the settlers, who would put the legs of their bedsteads in cans of water to keep the fleas from getting into the beds. But with all the trials and hardships, they were happy in the thought that they had a home they could call their own, and a place where they could rear their children. The satisfaction that comes to them now, more than repays for all the hardships they endured.

The members of the family are communicants of the Catholic church, and in the work of development they have contributed their full share. To the courage and labors of such as the McCarty family the present generation is indebted for the comforts and blessings of present-day conditions, and a history of Custer county would be incomplete without mention of what they have accomplished.

OLIVER G. SMITH. — One of the prosperous exponents of the agriculture and stock-raising interests of Custer county is Oliver G. Smith, who has been a resident of the county since pioneer days.

Mr. Smith was born in West Virginia, February 7, 1868. His father, Cornelius D. Smith, was likewise a native of West Virginia, in which state he married and became a land-owner and farmer. He resided there until 1879, when he came to Nebraska and took a homestead in Kearney county, near Minden. After one year's residence there he sold out and came to Custer county, in 1880, where he homesteaded on section 3, township 18, range 21, casting in his lot with the very early settlers in this part of the county. The first home was a sod house with a dirt floor and dirt roof, and in this the family lived for several years. The mother of our subject bore the maiden name of Jane Pierpont and was a native of West Virginia. She came to Nebraska as a pioneer woman and is now making her home in Merna, her husband having passed away at the age of seventy-five years. She is a member of the United Brethren church, as was also her husband, and they became parents of seven children: Oliver G. is the eldest; Mattie is the wife of D. W. Widaman, of Merna; Mrs. Charles Wachter likewise resides in Custer county; David S. is a resident of Merna; Wirt lives in the Arnold vicinity of Custer county; Mary died at the age of sixteen years; and John died in childhood.

Oliver G. Smith was a boy of eleven years when the home was established in Nebraska. He was reared amid the scenes of pioneer days and on reaching manhood became a farmer. His first purchase was 160 acres adjoining the old place, and when it came into his possession it was wholly unimproved. To-day Mr. Smith is the owner of 775 acres, with a fine set of improvements, and general farming and stock-raising are carried on with good success.

As a companion and helpmeet Mr. Smith chose Miss Luella Wheeler, who was born in New York, a daughter of Joseph and Eliza

Wheeler, who became residents of Custer county in 1888 and are both now deceased. Mr. and Mrs. Smith have become parents of three children: Lena passed away at the age of twenty-one years; and Alta and Edgar are still at home.

Mr. Smith is one of the substantial men of the community. He casts an independent ballot at the polls and has never aspired to nor held any public office. He belongs to the Modern Woodmen of America and Woodmen of the World lodges in Merna and is held in unqualified esteem by all who know him.

WILLIAM H. Mc KNIGHT. — A resident of Nebraska from the time when the only buildings known in the central part of the state were composed of sod, William H. McKnight has watched with the eye of a proprietor the various changes that have been brought by the passage of the years and the sturdy and progressive work of the settlers, and has himself borne a full share of the labor of development. He is now one of the large landholders and successful agriculturists of the Berwyn community of Custer county, where his accomplishments entitle him to the respect and esteem in which he is uniformly held by his fellow citizens.

Mr. McKnight was born in Lafayette county, Wisconsin, May 20, 1850, a son of Miles and Joanna (Dillehay) McKnight. His father, the son of Scotch parents, was born in 1805, in eastern Tennessee, and was married in Virginia to Miss Joanna Dillehay, who was born in Virginia, August 11, 1811. The year following the close of the Black Hawk war they moved in covered wagons to Wisconsin, and for a number of years Mr. McKnight was employed in the lead mines at Mineral Point, because, although he had taken up land, he had no capital with which to develop his farm and was consequently compelled to take other work. He passed the remainder of his life in Wisconsin and before his death, May 15, 1865, had seen his financial affairs in excellent shape, and was known in his community as a well-to-do citizen. Mrs. McKnight survived him until 1873 and died in the faith of the Baptist church, of which he also was a member. He was a Democrat in his political sympathies. Of the seventeen children born to this worthy couple, only three survive at this time: William H.; Belle, who is the widow of N. G. Dergin and resides at Monroe, Green county, Wisconsin; and M. W., who is engaged in farming in the vicinity of Adams, Nebraska.

William H. McKnight was educated in the public schools of Wisconsin and was reared on the home farm, where he was living at the outbreak of the Civil war. He was much too young for service, but was constantly entreating his parents to permit him to join the army, and toward the close of the war, when he was still only a lad, he ran away from home and joined the Eleventh Illinois Cavalry, with which he served six months. He then returned to his Wisconsin home and resumed his association with farm enterprise. In 1871 he there married Miss Etta Parsons, who was born in Wisconsin, a daughter of Monroe I. and Jane Parsons, now residents of Iowa. There were five children born to this union, of whom four are now living, these being: Ira Derwood, who resides on a farm at Glenwood, Iowa, and is engaged in the real-estate business; Lewis Winfield, who is a farmer of the same community; Della Leora, who is the wife of Oscar Lee, principal of the State Industrial School at Waukesha, Wisconsin; and Wilbur Harrison, who is a member of Company I, One Hundred and Sixty-eighth Infantry, arrived in France in December, 1917: he was later wounded and, was in a hospital at the time this article was written. Mrs. McKnight died December 13, 1888, and February 28, 1889, Mr. McKnight was again married, Miss Belle Jones becoming his wife. She was born February 7, 1868, in Tippecanoe county, Indiana, and is a daughter of James Alfred and Louisa Elvira (Joslin) Jones, the former a native of Indiana and the latter of Kentucky. The parents of Mrs. McKnight moved to Saunders county, Nebraska, in 1869, and after the father's death the mother came to the home of her daughter and son-in-law, with whom she remained until her death. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. McKnight: Jesse Floyd, who was in the base-hospital camp at Camp Cody, is now at home; Virgil Sidney is a farmer of Custer county; and Forrest Edward, George William, and James Theodore all remain at home.

Mr. McKnight first came to Nebraska in 1879, in which year he located in Butler county. He saw little to encourage him at that time, the country being practically undeveloped, while the few settlers, living far apart, were doing without conveniences and living in primitive sod houses. After two years he returned to Wisconsin, but the western country had made its impression and formed its attraction, and shortly thereafter he again located in Butler county, where he followed farming until 1903. That year marked his arrival in Custer county, which has since been his home. Here he purchased 440 acres of land, put it under cultivation, built a nice home and substantial outbuildings, and he has since established himself as a progressive and skilled farmer who thoroughly knows his business and can make his labor pay him proportionately. He carries on general farming and raises all kinds of live-stock, the while the success which has attended his efforts is evidence of the consistency of his methods.

Mr. McKnight is fraternally affiliated with Ansley Lodge No. 176, Ancient Free & Accepted Masons, and has received the thirty-second degree of Scottish Rite Masonry, at Omaha. In politics a Republican, he has wielded some influence in his community, and has rendered good service as a member of the school board.

CLARENCE MACKEY.—Instances are numerous in Custer county where men have arrived in this part of the country without acquaintances or friends and have worked their way to affluence and position, but there are few which equal the record of Clarence Mackey, president of the Ansley State Bank and one of his community's wealthiest and most prominent citizens. Mr. Mackey was handicapped at the outset of life by very little educational training, and before he came to Nebraska he had been unable to accumulate any sum even approaching a starting capital. Yet his ability, given the opportunity, finally evidenced itself, and to-day Mr. Mackey is accounted one of Ansley's leading citizens.

Mr. Mackey was born at Minerva, Ohio, August 11, 1860, and is a son of Thomas and Caroline (Taylor) Mackey, natives of Stark county, Ohio. His father, who was the son of a lifelong resident of the Buckeye state, learned the cabinetmaker's trade in his youth, and was engaged in the work of his trade at the outbreak of the Civil war, when he enlisted for service in the Union army and became a first lieutenant in a regiment of Ohio volunteer infantry. He engaged in a number of hard-fought battles, but escaped wounds, although for some time he was confined to the hospital, because of sickness. After the war he was engaged for a long period in agricultural pursuits and the later years of his life were passed at Minerva, Ohio, where he died in 1899, and where his widow, who survives him in ripe old age, still makes her home. She is a devout member of the Christian church and is a woman of many excellencies of mind and heart. Mr. Mackey was a Democrat in his political faith and was a member of the Masonic fraternity. He and his wife were the parents of five children, of whom four are living: Clarence is the immediate subject of this review; Harry, who resides at Chadron, Nebraska, is a locomotive engineer on the Chicago & Northwestern Railway; William met his death a number years ago, in a railway accident; Leona is the wife of E. W. Jobes, a manufacturing machinist at Minerva, Ohio; and John, who resides at the old home at Minerva, is retired from active pursuits. The maternal grandfather of Clarence Mackey was Pinn Taylor, who was born in Ohio and spent his entire life there, patenting land under President Monroe, at a time when the Indians were to be found in large numbers.

The educational advantages of Clarence Mackey in his youth were decidedly limited in character, for he early began work at the coal mines of Pennsylvania, and continued thus employed for a number of years. He first came to Nebraska, in 1891, and following this was employed at various places. In 1892 he located near Westerville, where he first rented a farm of 160 acres. He later purchased land, and this he put under cultivation and improved in various ways, in the meantime carrying on extensive operations in mixed farming and stock-raising. His success was marked in agriculture, and subsequently he began to turn his attention to other affairs. About 1903 he entered the field of banking, and at the present time he is president of the Ansley State Bank, which, under his wise and capable direction and conservative policies has become recognized as one of the safe and substantial institutions of the county. His success has been absolutely self-gained and his career can be profitably studied by aspiring youths who are commencing their careers without friends or fortunes to assist them.

In 1892 Mr. Mackey married Miss Ella Campbell, who was born in Pennsylvania, a daughter of Richard and Elizabeth (Fate) Campbell, who now live at Westerville, Custer county, Nebraska. Mr. Campbell was a railroad man for many years. Mrs. Mackey died in April, 1906, the mother of four sons and one daughter: William, who is twenty-one years of age, entered the United States Navy, June 1, 1918, as a student at the Great Lakes Naval Training School; Thomas, eighteen years of age, has entered the United States Navy school at Lincoln, where he attends the State University; Richard, who is seventeen years of age, is attending school; Clarence, Jr., fifteen years old, is likewise a student; and Ella, thirteen years old, is attending school. Mr. Mackey was again married, in February, 1917, when Miss Elsie Saville became his wife. She was born in Custer county, and is a daughter of Dana M. and Sarah L. Saville. Her father, who came to Custer county about 1883, and was a pioneer homesteader, died on his farm, in 1916.

Fraternally Mr. Mackey is connected with the Masons, in which order he has reached the thirty-second degree of the Scottish Rite; and he is affiliated also with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Modern Woodmen of America and the Knights of Pythias. In each of these fraternities he is popular with his fellow members. He has long been prominent in civic and political affairs of a local order, and his well known business and financial ability, as well as his integrity and personal probity, have caused him to be selected by his fellow citizens for positions of marked trust. He has twice been a member of the state legislature and twice county treasurer, and his public record is a splendid one, characterized by conscientious and constructive service for the general welfare. He is a staunch Democrat.

DANIEL G. BOWLEY. — Practical industry, wisely and vigorously applied, seldom fails of attaining success, and the career of Daniel G. Bowley, now one of the progressive farmers of Custer county, is but another proof of this statement. When he started out in life he had but few advantages to assist him along the road to success, but his diligence and judicious management have brought him ample success as a reward for his labors.

Mr. Bowley was born in Alleghany county, Virginia, October 3, 1870, a son of William O. Bowley, who was one of Custer county's first settlers and of whom extended mention is made elsewhere in this volume. Our subject accompanied the family to the pioneer home in Nebraska and as a boy witnessed the hardships and struggles of the early-day settlers. As his age and strength increased he assisted more and more in the labor incident to developing and operating the homestead, and under the instructions of his father he learned the best methods of planting and harvesting, so that when he reached manhood he was well equipped with the practical experience to enable him to become a farmer on his own account. He started out for himself at the age of twenty-two years and operated land as a tenant for a few years, meeting with the success that justified him in making a purchase of land. It is fifteen years since he bought his present farm, which at that time was wholly unimproved but which has been brought to a high state of cultivation, and by the erection of suitable buildings Mr. Bowley has a valuable property. General farming and stock-raising form the basis of the enterprise carried on by the owner, though he has given considerable attention to horticulture and has a fine apple orchard of seven acres, the same having been bearing fruit for several years.

For a companion and helpmeet Mr. Bowley chose Miss Josephine Hennesey, a native of Virginia. They are members of the Methodist church, South, and Mr. Bowley's political beliefs make him a Democrat. The Bowley family were among the first settlers of the county and members of that family have had to do with the upbuilding of the community for more than forty years, so that historic consistency is conserved when a place is given the subject of this biography in the annals of Custer county.

WARREN THOMAS HURST, M. D. — The medical profession of Custer county includes among its members many men of eminent ability, whose training has been comprehensive and whose fine talents have been developed through broad experience, close application, constant study and the broadening influence of intimate association with their fellow men. In this category one of the foremost, without doubt, is Dr. Warren T. Hurst, a general practitioner in medicine and surgery and a specialist in diseases of the eye, ear, nose, and throat. He has been engaged in professional labors at Broken Bow since 1912. Dr. Hurst was born August 20, 1878, at Marion, Linn county, Iowa, and is a son of Thomas and Martha (Walker) Hurst.

The parents of Doctor Hurst were born, reared and educated in Canada, where their marriage was solemnized, and shortly after that event they came to the United States and settled in Illinois. After about ten years' residence in that state, they changed their location to Iowa, where Mr. Hurst continued to work at railroading, which was his life vocation. In 1883 he came with his family to Nebraska, where he held various positions with railroad lines, and finally he took up his permanent abode at Omaha, where, although advanced in years, he continues to be identified with the big railway companies, at this time being connected with the flag service in the shops. He has been a Mason for many years, is a Republican in politics, and his wife is a member of the Baptist church. They are the parents of three children: Lydia, the wife of Theron Brown, a railroad man of Omaha; Frances, the wife of James Leary, a mechanic of Denver, Colorado; Dr. Warren T., of this review. There are two deceased children: George E., formerly of Omaha, died in 1912, and Mrs. Alice Elizabeth Short, of Omaha, died in 1910.

Dr. Warren T. Hurst was five years of age when he accompanied his parents to Nebraska, and here his early education was secured in the public schools. He was graduated from the high school at Weeping Water, Cass county, with the class of 1895, and after some further preparation he entered the Creighton School of Medicine, at Omaha, where he took a four years' course. He spent another year at the Chicago College of Medicine and Surgery and then went to Valparaiso, Indiana, where he was graduated May 20, 1912, following which he engaged in practice at Chicago. In this same year he changed his field of operation to Broken Bow, and since then he has built up a splendid practice, both in a general way and as a specialist in the treatment and cure of diseases of the eye, ear, nose, and throat. Doctor Hurst belongs to the various organizations of his calling, and keeps fully abreast of the advancements being made in the sciences of medicine and surgery. He stands high in his calling, not alone among his fellow practitioners, but with the general public as well, and has served as county physician of Custer county and as health officer. His political tendencies cause him to support the principles and policies of the Democratic party. During his college career he joined the Phi Rho Sigma fraternity, and he belongs also to the Masonic fraternity, both York and Scottish Rite bodies and also the Mystic Shrine. Dr. Hurst has been a supporter of good movements, civic and educational, as well as those of the Presbyterian church, of which he is an attendant, Mrs. Hurst being a member thereof.

Prior to her marriage to Dr. Hurst, Mrs. Hurst, who is a native of Copenhagen, Denmark, was Miss Lola Beck. She and the Doctor are the parents of one child; Juanita.

JAMES LANGE. — Since he is the owner of a fine tract of land on the second bench of the Buffalo Table, south of Callaway, and has around him everything necessary for comfortable living and thrifty farming, Mr. Lange should be rated as one of the foremost citizens of the south part of the county.

James Lange was born in Denmark, on the 13th day of December, 1865, and is a son of Theodore and Anna M. (Sorrenson) Lange, both of whom were natives of Denmark, possessing all the characteristics of Scandinavian thrift. For more complete record of Theodore Lange and the family, reference may be made to the sketch of Marius Lange, on other pages of this volume.

When James Lange reached the age of fourteen years he entered upon a four years' apprenticeship in a blacksmith shop. When nineteen years of age he came to the United States, and in the city of Chicago he and his older brother, Marius, worked about a year. Then coming farther west, he landed in Lexington, Nebraska, and worked for Anton Abel, a ranchman who seems to have had a ranch in both Dawson and Custer counties. A year later he came into Custer county, where he continued work on the Abel ranch on the Cottonwood branch, for at least a year. He then filed on a homestead 20 miles south of Callaway, on Buffalo creek. This property he acquired by the relinquishment of Jacob Peterson. He and his brother bought a yoke of oxen and went back to Lexington to straighten up the land deal. On this trip they experienced one of the severest and most trying ordeals of their pioneer days. They were caught in a three-day blizzard, and when they started for home the snow was nearly three feet deep. They had to lead a couple of wild bronchos, which they had bought of Mr. Abel. Night overtook them, they lost their way, could find no trail and came near to freezing to death. Marius was not strong, and the task of plowing through the snow was more than he could stand. He became sick and exhausted, and James carried him miles on his back and led the ponies. Marius begged to be left on the prairie, but that would have meant his death, so they dragged on mile after mile, and reached home about one o'clock in the morning. Both men had their feet so badly frozen that their toes had to be amputated.

On February 24, 1889, in Broken Bow, was solemnized the marriage of James Lange to Miss Hester Richardson, daughter of William T. and Jane (Vinsen) Richardson, both Kentucky people. Since the establishment of their home the Lange family has had its circle increased by the birth of four children—Gertrude S. J., Julius T., Verna M. and Loretta L., all of whom remain under the parental roof and contribute to the life and happiness of the place.

Mr. Lange's holdings comprise 720 acres, which he is now improving. A fine dwelling has just been erected, which makes a splendid modern domicile in which the family can enjoy farm life. A general farming and stock-raising business is carried on by Mr. Lange and the boys. The family are connected with the Lutheran church and in the matter of politics, Mr. Lange's first choice is for the Democratic party.

JOSEPH D. BYLER.—This is an ordinary story of an ordinary man,—one who in his modest way lived his life and in his departure left behind him a splendid family, a creditable record, and the comforts earned by hard toil.

The subject of this memoir was born in Pennsylvania, January 2, 1857, and was a son of Jacob and Sarah (Yoder) Byler. He came of an excellent Pennsylvania family, and was one of eight children, only three of whom are living at the present time—Isaac, Rudolph, and David. Joseph D. was the youngest of the family.

It was in Pennsylvania that the boyhood years of Joseph D. Byler were spent, and there he had recourse to the common schools, in which he received a good fundamental education that qualified him for the business transactions of life. At the age of fifteen years he left the home farm and started into the world for himself. His first journey landed him in Logan county, Ohio, where he worked for a number of years. From there he went to Garden City, Missouri. There he associated himself with Charles McCants, and the two started for Nebraska. He arrived in Custer county in the spring of 1885. An inventory of his worldly possessions showed him to be better off than a good many others were when reaching the county. He had three mules, harness, wagon and twenty-five dollars. He located in Roten valley, fourteen miles southwest of Callaway, and bought a relinquishment from James Howell. It was here that he established, and maintained for two years, bachelor quarters.

Two years after he reached Custer county Mr. Byler married Miss Ida F. Hauenstine, a native of Ohio and daughter of Jacob and Lucinda (Dull) Hauenstine, both of whom were natives of Pennsylvania. In the family of Mrs. Byler's father were fourteen children. The surviving members of this large family of children are: Mrs. Joseph Redhead, living near Callaway; Jacob, of Toledo, Ohio; Mrs. John Belmire, of St. Louisville, Ohio; Joseph, residing near Callaway, Custer county; and Mrs. Ida Byler, widow of the subject of this memoir.

When the Byler home was established in Custer county, in 1887, it was an unpretentious sod house, and the home was maintained and the early developments of the farm started under very adverse circumstances. For two years Mr. Byler hauled water six and seven miles. Then he dug a well 200 feet deep and put in a board casing. He had a horse and bucket to draw the water from the well. Later he added more room to the sod house, but in order to do this he took the roof from the barn and got along with a dirt floor.

In the course of time four children were born into the home of Mr. and Mrs. Byler, and concerning them the following brief record is entered: Bessie M. Blixt, whose husband is an implement dealer in Callaway, has four children, two boys and two girls. Clarence H. is, at the time of this writing, in the nation's military service, as a member of Battery C, Three Hundred and Thirty-ninth Field Artillery, at Camp Dodge, Iowa. Ruth A. and Nellie M. are at home with their mother.

A great sorrow came to the home on the 8th day of July, 1916, when the husband and father was called from the scene of his labors in this world to the reward of the next. He had been a kind and provident father and husband, and his death was a sore bereavement. He left his family, however, in good circumstances, on a farm of 480 acres, well improved and in a high state of cultivation. For twenty years prior to his death, Mr. Byler had been a faithful member of the Evangelical church. Mrs. Byler and her children who are not married, make their home on the place and maintain the farming operations conducted by the late husband and father.

ARTELLUS P. CALHOON.—One of the venerable and honored citizens of Broken Bow, long a Nebraska farmer in Polk and Custer counties, Artellus P. Calhoon is now living in comfortable and well deserved retirement, after a long and creditable career. He is a native of St. Joseph county, Michigan, and was born May 26, 1845, his parents being Alvin and Lois (Bean) Calhoon.

While still a young man, Alvin Calhoon, who had been reared to farming, raised a company for service in the Indian troubles, and he fought with the rank of captain. Later he removed to Michigan, where he settled on a farm and passed the rest of his life in agricultural pursuits. He was a strong Abolitionist, in the climacteric period leading up to the Civil war, was a stanch Republican in his political views, and he and his wife were faithful members of the Methodist church, of which he was a local preacher during the early days. There were eight children in the Calhoon family, and all are living: Marcellus, who married Clara Rowley, is a retired farmer of Ord, Nebraska; Emma, who is the widow of Samuel Sidwell, makes her home at Minatare, Nebraska; Clarence C., who married Tillie Hahn, is a farmer of Polk county, Nebraska; Bingham, who married Caroline Simpson, is a farmer of York county, this state; Lola is the wife of Lewis Munson, a farmer near Peoria, Kansas; Lawrence and Florence are twins, the former having married Anna Demmick and being a farmer near Gladwin, Michigan, and the latter being the widow of Lewis Moore, of Three Rivers, Michigan; and Artellus P. is the subject of this sketch.

Artellus P. Calhoon received his early education in the public schools of Michigan, and as a young man of twenty-seven years he came to Nebraska, his first settlement being in Polk county, where he took up a homestead and farmed for eighteen years. In 1900 he disposed of his interests in that locality and came to Custer county, where he continued his operations with increasing success until the spring of 1918, when he turned over the responsibilities and burdens to younger shoulders and retired to his comfortable home at Broken Bow, where he is surrounded by every convenience. During his active years Mr. Calhoon was rightly accounted a capable farmer and stockman, as well as an able business man whose transactions were characterized by the highest integrity. He has always been a loyal and public-spirited citizen and at various times has been active in civic affairs, more as a supporter of movements for the general welfare than as an aspirant for office or a holder of public posts.

In the spring of 1877 Mr. Calhoon was united in marriage, in Polk county, Nebraska, to Miss Henrietta Robinson, who is now deceased, and they became the parents of six children, concerning whom the following brief record is consistently entered: Alvin, who married Bertha Luther, is a minister of the Free Methodist church and is living near Alberta, Canada, where he has a farm and fills a pulpit; Calvin, who married Dolly Barbee, is a preacher of the Home Association, and resides near Jerome, Arizona; Miss Zora resides with her father, for whom she keeps house. Ina is the wife of Rev. James Davis, a farmer and preacher in the vicinity of De Nova, Colorado. Clinton, who married Mary Shepard, is a preacher of the Nazarene church and resides in Kansas. Charles, who is still a bachelor, resides with his father and sister and is now studying to become a minister.

It is interesting to note that Mr. Calhoon's sons have inherited from their paternal grandfather the predilection for ministerial labors, three already having adopted this profession and the fourth being engaged in preparing for that high calling. The married daughter of Mr. Calhoon chose for her husband a preacher. Mr. Calhoon is himself a generous contributor to religious enterprises and movements.

EARL W. BROWN. — This caption spells the name of a prosperous son of a popular sire who was one of the prominent pioneers of Custer county, as the story which follows will disclose.

Earl W. Brown hails from Kansas, where he was born March 12, 1881, and he is a son of A. D. and Matilda (Mullen) Brown, Custer county pioneers of more than ordinary prominence. In the family of A. D. Brown were the following named children — Claude, Harl, Lawrence, Forrest, Stella Holliday, Earl W., Lila Phifer, and Oma, the last mentioned being a student in the Grand Island Business College at the present time. A. D. Brown was a prominent farmer and stock-raiser in the early days of the South Loup country, in which section he settled in 1881. Here he located a tree claim and bought 160 acres, about five or six miles southeast of the site of the present thriving town of Arnold. He was at that time in the full vigor of manhood and soon became one of the active and influential men in that part of the county, much credit being due him for the service he rendered in developing the southwest section of the county. He served on the board of supervisors for a number of years. He and his good wife were devoted members of the Christian church. Mr. Brown died on his farm, December 17, 1909. He was a high-degree Mason and an Odd Fellow of high rank and good standing. The children have been a credit to their parents and occupy in their respective communities much the same relation as that sustained by the parents. All of the children are in the Christian church and the boys are either Masons or Odd Fellows.

Further brief data concerning A. D. Brown, the sterling pioneer, are available and should be incorporated in this review. He was born at Indianapolis, Indiana, March 1, 1847, and thus his age at the time of his death was sixty-two years, nine months and five days. He was reared and educated in the old Hoosier state and he represented that commonwealth as a gallant young soldier of the Union in the Civil war. At the age of eighteen years he enlisted as a member of Company A, One Hundred and Thirty-second Indiana Volunteer Infantry, John S. Tarkington having been captain of the company. Mr. Brown proved a faithful and valiant soldier and his honorable discharge, dated December 15, 1864, was signed by Abraham Lincoln, president of the United States, and Edwin M. Stanton, secretary of war. His marriage to Miss Matilda Mullen was solemnized in 1870, near Dwight, Illinois.

It was here in Custer county that Earl W. Brown ran the gamut of youth and received his education in the public schools. Here, too, he laid the foundation for the activities of his manhood years. On June 7, 1915, in the home of the bride, on the South Loup river, four miles east of Georgetown, he led to the marriage altar Miss T. Leila Downey, the ceremony being performed by Rev. N. C. Johnson. Mrs. Brown is a daughter of John M. and Anna E. (Welch) Downey, pioneers who became widely known as Mr. and Mrs. "Mack" Downey and who became the parents of nine children — Charles H.; Mary McMillan; Leila Brown; Edna Wood; Helen, who was graduated in the Broken Bow high school and who is now a teacher and a prominent playground supervisor for the Chautauqua system; Verna, who is a stenographer in Saginaw, Michigan, was a commercial graduate of the Broken Bow high school; Zenadie was graduated in the Broken Bow high school and is a teacher at the present time; Gregor M. is at present attending Kearney Military Academy; D. Marlen is a student and is at home with his parents. Mary, Leila, and Edna Downey finished their education at the state normal school. The Downey family are all members of the Presbyterian church. The father was an old-time landsman who came to Custer county nearly forty years ago.

Mr. and Mrs. Earl Brown are following in the footsteps of their respective parents and in addition to being representatives of two very popular families, both prominently connected with early-day history, they individually are winning a well deserved popularity for themselves. One child, Robert E., two years of age, furnishes sunshine and good cheer for the home. Mr. Brown is farming rather extensively, as he operates his mother's farm and also 320 acres of his own. He is one of the men to be reckoned with at the present time — one of the contingent upon whom present-day responsibilities rest heavily. He is a farmer and stock-raiser of no mean caliber and the general appearance of his home premises denotes thrift and declares his success. He is a member of the Christian church, his wife holding membership in the Prebyterian church, and both stand for high ideals and highest type of service. Mr. Brown has received the thirty-second degree of the Scottish Rite in the Masonic fraternity, and is a Republican in politics. As stated in the beginning, this prosperous son of a popular sire has paid the tribute of his life to Custer county.

JACOB J. SEANEY. — Living in honorable and well earned retirement in the Finchville vicinity, than which there is no more fertile district in all the vast domain of Custer county, is a courteous gentleman who has known the privations and hardships of pioneer life in the west and who has contributed his share to county upbuilding and food production as demanded by the present day. It is to this citizen that recognition is here accorded.

Mr. Seaney was born February 16, 1853, in Union county, Indiana, and is a son of Pleasant and Elnora B. Seaney, both of whom likewise were born in the Hoosier state, and who became the parents of three children — William, Sarah Beck, and Jacob J. The father was a farmer, and he lived and died near Richmond, Indiana.

Jacob J. Seaney lived at the parental home until he attained to his legal majority. He earned his first money trapping muskrats and coons. He received good educational advantages, but all his life has confined his efforts to the farm. In the state of his nativity he was married, on October 3, 1878, to Miss Nancy Mendenhall, a daughter of Noah and Nancy (Gard) Mendenhall, the former a native of Pennsylvania and the latter of Indiana. In Mrs. Seaney's immediate family, besides herself, were two children — Jeremiah, and Margaret Hamilton. Mr. and Mrs. Seaney came to Custer county in 1888 and located on the South Loup river, six and one-half miles southeast of where Arnold now stands. There is some contract in the condition in which Mr. Seaney arrived and that of other pioneers, for he was fairly well supplied with this world's goods when he first took up his residence here. He owns at the present time 800 acres of good land, well adapted to farming and stock-raising and in this dual occupation he has acquired most of his money. In the family circle are the following named children: Elsie is the wife of Charles T. Snyder, who lives at Snodgrass, Wyoming, and is assistant game warden of that state, and they have one daughter. Charles P., who is farming near Arnold, married Lida Bailey and they have one son. Maud M. is the wife of Ellery Kruser, a farmer in the Arnold vicinity, and they have two sons and one daughter. Dora is the wife of Ferdinand Beshaler, an Arnold farmer. Elmer J. is still a bachelor and is farming his father's land.

Mrs. Seaney, the mother, died May 12, 1891. Mr. Seaney still lives on his farm, but his possessions are such as to render him care-free and to enable him to retire from active work. His land is leased and still goes on producing foodstuff for humanity. The pioneers of the '80s and '90s know of Mr. Seaney's early activities and hold him and his family in high esteem. In politics his affiliations are with the Republican party, and he has been always ready to assist all worthy objects, the while he has been regarded as a prominent and leading spirit of the community.

NOAH MELHAM. — America, with its vast and varied opportunities for the achievement of success, has attracted to its shores those of every civilized race in the world, and in every well settled community there are to be found representatives of far-distant countries. Custer county is no exception to this rule, and one of its thriving communities, the enterprising little city of Sargent, has a worthy representative of far-off Syria, in the person of Noah Melham, who is successfully engaged in business as the proprietor of a general store.

Mr. Melham was born August 4, 1884, at Aumscheit, Syria, Asia Minor, and is a son of Melham Norah and Mary (Scessian) Norah, who spent their entire lives in Syria. The father was a small farmer for many years, but when overtaken by failing health he took up the occupation of charcoal burning. There were eight children in the family, of whom five are living: Charlie and his wife, Jennie, reside near Sargent, and he is a farmer; the present address of Abraham is unknown; Beade is engaged in farming near Sargent; Noah is the subject of this review; and Barbara is the wife of John Rohana, a farmer living in Syria. Noah Melham received his education in his native land and remained under the parental roof until he attained the age of twenty-one years, when, stirred by ambition which could not be satisfied in his own country, he bade farewell to his parents and went to Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, where he remained six months. He then came to the United States and for six months was a resident of Fall River, Massachusetts, at the end of which period he turned his face to the west and in 1906 arrived at Comstock, Nebraska. For one year following his arrival he tried his hand at farming, but this vocation did not prove congenial or remunerative, and the young Syrian gave up the attempt and began traveling as a salesman of Watson's remedies. He thus continued for three years, during which time, through his industry and capable methods of salesmanship, he accumulated a snug little capital. He had built up a good business, which was growing rapidly, but the first of his objects was accomplished, and he sold out his route and returned to his native land, where he remained six months. Within that time he married Sadie Wieken, who was born in Syria, May 4, 1885, a daughter of Pete and Machbobe (Mahwat) Wieken, farming people of that land, where they spent their entire lives. Mrs. Melham has one brother, John, who still farms the paternal acres in Syria. Mr. and Mrs. Melham became the parents of three children, of whom two survive: Marie, born July 17, 1911; and Oscar, born June 2, 1913.

Upon his return to the United States from Syria, Mr. Melham again took up his residence in Custer county, and again gave his attention to farming. This he followed with some degree of success for six years, but, once having experienced the attractions of commercial life, he was irresistibly drawn back into business affairs, and he eventually sold out his farming interests and opened a general store at Sargent. This he has continued to conduct with constantly growing success, a feature of his business being the handling of the proprietary articles known as Watson's remedies. A man of pleasing personality, courteous, obliging, he has made scores of friends in his adopted land and this fact perhaps has contributed as much to his success as have his untiring industry and his native business ability.

MARSHALL E. EDDY, ex-county treasurer of Custer county, furnishes in his career another exemplification of self-made manhood. Thrown upon his own resources at the tender age of eleven years, he has won his way to business success and public influence, and at present he is extending the scope of his usefulness to the work of education, religion and national patriotism. In consonance with the regulation that a county treasurer may serve only two consecutive terms, Mr. Eddy retired from this office at the end of the year 1918, after having served two terms. He was born May 5, 1857, in Canada, and is a son of Stephen P. and Margaret Jane (Finlay) Eddy.

The Eddy family originated in England, whence its early representatives came to America prior to the Revolutionary war, in which several bearing the family name participated. For some years the family resided in New York state, where Harden Eddy, the paternal grandfather of Marshall E. Eddy, passed his life as an agriculturist, and there also, for a time, lived the maternal grandfather, Henry Finlay, who was a native of Ireland. Stephen Eddy was born, reared, and educated in the Empire state, and after his marriage went to Canada, where for a few years he was engaged in business as a contractor for brick and stone work. He subsequently returned to New York, but in 1877 he removed to Michigan, where both he and his wife were residents of Bay City at the time of their death. They had nine children of whom five are living. Charles H., an invalid, is proprietor of a shooting gallery at Unionville, Michigan; Mary is the wife of James Ormisten, a land man of Alberta, Canada; Margaret J. is the wife of C. C. Honeywell, a farmer in the vicinity of Unionville, Michigan; Marshall E. is the subject of this sketch; and S. R. is a painter at Marquette, Michigan. The family has been affiliated with the Methodist Episcopal church. Two of the uncles of Marshall E. Eddy took part in the Civil war, as Union soldiers. One, Carleton Eddy, was wounded in the last battle of the war and never recovered from his injuries, dying a few years later; the other, Philo, was in the engineer corps, and returned safely to his home.

Marshall E. Eddy, as noted above, was called upon to make his own way in the world when he was still a child, and for the most part he educated himself, although he attended the public schools of Canada and Bradford, Pennsylvania. He equipped himself so well that he was able to secure a teacher's certificate, and for several years he taught school near Bradford, being present during the big excitement in the oil fields, about 1879. From that community he came to Exeter, Nebraska, where he taught school for one year, following which he turned his attention to agriculture and began working a homestead in Custer county, twelve miles west of Merna. He was courageous and persistent enough to remain until he paid out on his claim, and he then transferred his base of activities to Merna, where he took charge of an implement business for the firm of Holland & McDonald. After working for this concern three years, he received and accepted an advantageous and attractive offer from the Deering Harvester Company, and for six or seven years he was a traveling salesman for this famous corporation. When he resigned and left the road it was to form a partnership with Mac Johnson, in a ranch located in the northern part of Custer county, where they handled 300 to 400 head of cattle, but Mr. Eddy later sold his interests to his partner and bought a tract of land at the townsite of Merna, where for three years he was engaged in farming. Next he was one of the founders of the institution known as the Home Bank of Merna, and about that time was also instrumental in the erection of several large structures there, including a modern hotel and opera house. When he sold his bank, after operating it for three years, he came to Broken Bow to assume the duties of deputy county treasurer, under Clarence Mackey, and he held that position for five years. During this time he gained in full degree the confidence and respect of his fellow citizens and when the opportunity came they elected him to the county treasurership, his record in that office being such a splendid one that when he appeared for re-election he was given a majority of 1,700 votes, on the Democratic ticket, in a county that is largely Republican. He retired from office in January, 1919.

Mr. Eddy was married November 10, 1888, to Miss Frances J. Reader, who was born in Wisconsin, a daughter of Henry and Wilhelmina Reader, the former a native of New York and the latter of Switzerland. They were early settlers of Wisconsin, from which state they drove to Iowa in an ox-cart, as early residents, and about 1882 changed their home to Nebraska, where they passed the remainder of their lives. Mrs. Eddy was educated at Osceola, Iowa, and after teaching school in Iowa two terms spent the same length of time in teaching at Broken Bow. She is a member of the Christian Science church and is one of the highly intellectual and well informed ladies of her adopted city. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Eddy, of whom the first born, Carl, died at the age of nine months. Euroia Pearl has for the past two years been engaged in Chautauqua work, and is now manager of a troupe of girls, touring the New England states, she herself being a brilliant reader and gifted and a talented singer. She received her early education at Merna, following which she was sent by her parents to Brownell Hall, at Omaha, and her musical training was completed at Northwestern University, Chicago, and the Boston Conservatory of Music. Vera M., the youngest child, was educated at Merna and Brownell Hall, Omaha, following which she took a three years' course in the Mechanics Institute of Rochester, New York, from which she secured a diploma in domestic science. She also has a state teacher's certificate in Nebraska, and during the 1917-18 term taught in the Union school, near Berwyn, Custer county. On the 18th of May, 1918, Miss Vera Mae Eddy became the wife of Sargeant William J. Lovelace, of Kentucky, who was at the time located at Camp Taylor, that state, in the service of the United States. Since the signing of the armistice Sargeant Lovelace has been transferred to Newport News, Virginia.

Mr. Eddy is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America, and is a prominent Democrat. Always a loyal and public-spirited citizen, he has given his aid to all progressive and patriotic movements, and in connection with the world war he rendered his country excellent service as chairman of the exemption board at Broken Bow, and as a member of the executive committee of the Red Cross.

JOHN D. WIELAND, who is manager of the Dierks Lumber Company at Callaway, Nebraska, is a man well and favorably known in Custer county, of which he has been a continuous resident for thirty-three years. He has led an active business life during all that time, continually coming into contact with other stable and reliable men, and at the present time he is numbered with the county's best and most dependable citizens.

John D. Wieland was born at Salem, Columbiana county, Ohio, February 14, 1867, and is the only survivor of the six children of Daniel and Christiana (Koupp) Wieland. Daniel Wieland was a farmer, and in the spring of 1867, when his son John D. was three months old, he removed from Columbiana county, Ohio, to Montgomery county, Iowa, where he carried on farming until his death, which occurred when John D. was about eighteen years old. The latter had completed the common-school course and had also a business-school education. When thrown upon his own resources he came to Custer county and immediately secured employment with the Dierks Lumber Company. He worked for this company at Broken Bow for eight years, in a responsible position, and then moved to Callaway and took charge of the Dierks interest at this place. Mr. Wieland has the distinction of being the oldest employee of the company, having worked for it continuously for thirty-three years. It goes without saying that he is highly valued by the company's principals, who have found him not only thoroughly efficient, but also faithful and trustworthy.

Mr. Wieland was married, at Callaway,

Nebraska, March 28, 1894, to Miss Elizabeth Thompson, a daughter of Robert and Esther (Hendry) Thompson. Mr. and Mrs. Wieland have three sons and one daughter: Robert D., who is a druggist and registered pharmacist, in business at Callaway, married Sophia Maller, a daughter of Albert Maller; Verne O., who is a student of the Callaway high school, is employed in the lumber and coal office of the Dierks Lumber Company; Lester D., who resides at home and still pursues his studies, is a clerk in his brother's drug store; and Laurretta, a bright little miss of ten years, is still in school. Mr. Wieland has never taken any active part in politics but has always been conscientious in the performance of civic duties.

PETER N. HENRY is an industrious and progressive farmer and highly respected citizen of Custer county, where he has prestige as a representative of an old and honored pioneer family. Further distinction is his in that he can claim Custer county as the place of his nativity.

Mr. Henry was born in the district known as Stop Table, west of Callaway, this county, and is a son of Josephus W. and Margaret (Atwood) Henry, the former of whom was born at Edinburg, Johnson county, Indiana, in 1842, and the latter of whom likewise was a native of the old Hoosier state. In the early '80s Josephus W. Henry came with his family to Nebraska and numbered himself among the pioneer settlers of Custer county. He became a substantial farmer and valued citizen, was a Republican in politics, was affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and he and his wife were members of the Baptist church. Of their nine children six are living,—Samuel M., James W., Joseph F., Peter N., Mrs. Minnie Carr, and Mrs. Catherine Blixt.

Peter N. Henry remained with his parents until he had attained to his legal majority, and in the meanwhile he had assisted his father in the work of the pioneer farm and attended the country school during the winter terms. In choosing a vocation he wisely adopted that under whose influences he had been reared, and he has devoted his attention to the basic industries of agriculture and stock-raising, with an attendant success which demonstrates his energy and good judgment. Mr. Henry is the owner of 200 acres of excellent land, in the vicinity of Callaway, his well improved farm being situated nine miles south of that village, besides which he owns an attractive and comfortable residence at Callaway. In an industrial way he gives his attention to diversified agriculture and stock-raising, and while he has never been active in politics he gives his support to the Republican party, co-operates with his fellow citizens in the furtherance of measures advanced for the general welfare of the community, and is loyal to all civic duties and responsibilities.

At Broken Bow, on the 24th of November, 1908, Judge A. R. Humphrey solemnized the marriage of Mr. Henry to Miss Elizabeth Osborne, a daughter of David M. and Mary E. (Gilbert) Osborne, who were born in Indiana and who now reside at Callaway, Custer county, their other children being as here noted: Ollie, who is the wife of Joseph D. Haunstine; Alwilda, who is the wife of Arthur Ashley; and Scott, C. Wesley, Noah C., and Francis M., all of whom remain at the parental home. Mr. and Mrs. Henry have no children.

CHARLES E. REED. — One of the young men of sterling worth in Custer county, who was born, educated, reared and married here, is Charles E. Reed, who belongs to an early settled and highly respected family of the county. Charles E. Reed was born in Custer county, December 7, 1895, one of a family of nine children born to his parents, F. S. and Amy (Jacobson) Reed. The mother of Mr. Reed was born at Crete, Nebraska, and died in Custer county, January 14, 1918, aged fifty-three years and ten months. The father was born in Illinois and is an extensive agriculturist in this county.

Charles E. Reed obtained his education in the public schools. Farming has been his chosen vocation and at the present time he is working with his father, in order to have an unusual harvest in the time of war stress, when loyal and patriotic men all over the land have been offering their lives on the field of battle, and when others, far away from the stage of conflict, have been making superhuman efforts, in their occupations and activities, to help the cause for which the stupendous world war has been waged. At time of this writing Mr. Reed was placed in Class 4-A of the selective draft.

Mr. Reed was married February 26, 1917, at Broken Bow, Nebraska, to Miss Flossie Palmer, who was born in Custer county, she being a daughter of John B. and Mary A. (Kensell) Palmer and a granddaughter of Henry V. Kensell. The father of Mrs. Reed resides on his ranch, which is located seven miles southwest of Broken Bow. Mr. and Mrs. Palmer came to Custer county in 1884 and settled eight miles southwest of Broken Bow, at a time when they had to freight all their supplies from Kearney, a distance of sixty-five miles. They had a family of four sons and two daughters, as follows: Edward F. Palmer is deceased; Jasper I. is at home; Clarence E. is a member of Company E, Fourth Infantry, American expeditionary forces in France; Joseph E., who died from wounds received in the trenches in France, June 16, 1918, will have his name perpetuated as the first Custer county hero to give his life in the world war; Flossie is the wife of Charles E. Reed of this sketch; and Ollie remains with her parents. In the season of 1918 Mr. Reed and his father have 250 acres in corn and 250 acres in small grain, and their prospects are very encouraging as to the abundance of the yield on both sections. Mr. and Mrs. Reed have one child, Alice Lorraine, born September 26, 1918.

THOMAS NORBURY.—Custer county has had many men of worth who have finally passed from the scene of life, and a notable one of these was the late Thomas Norbury, who for many years was president of the Seven Valleys Bank, at Callaway, this county. He was an unusual man in many ways, and during a part of his life was a traveler and a pioneer in different lands, his experiences giving him a wide knowledge of men and affairs. He possessed literary ability that won him notice as a magazine writer, and he was also an astute business man and able financier. For more than a quarter of a century he lived in Custer county, and during that time, through his energy, encouragement, and capital, some of the most stable business enterprises here were organized and established on firm foundations.

Thomas Norbury was born at Knutsford, Cheshire, England, December 28, 1841, and died at Callaway, Custer county, Nebraska, July 25, 1915. He was the only child of John and Ann (Daniels) Norbury. His father was a master builder and as the youth grew up, when not attending school, he learned the mason's trade under his father. In 1859 his father consented that he should make the voyage to Australia, hoping the sea air would restore the youth to health, which desirable result was realized. When Thomas Norbury reached Australia, with two companions he began to prospect for gold, and they located a claim on which they were working when a telegram reached him that his beloved father was dying. Hastily disposing of his interests for almost nothing, the dutiful son hastened back to England, where he found his father on the road to recovery and, in fact, he lived many years afterward. In the meanwhile the abandoned claim in Australia was later fully developed and became known as the famous Williams Creek mine, estimated to be worth millions of pounds.

Mr. Norbury remained in England until about 1860 and during those years wrote voluminously for the magazines. He then once more decided to try mining for gold, and in this quest he visited the mines in the vicinity of Caribou, British Columbia. He continued to prospect for the precious metal for several years, and before feeling ready to settle down to a quiet business life he made two trips around the world. In answer to another call from his father, he then returned to England, and subsequently he went into the building business at Leigh, in Lancashire. He had a large business there, and in his own yards dressed the lumber for use in the houses he built for rent. He became a man of local prominence and served on the town board of Leigh. Mr. Norbury then crossed the ocean once more, and landed in the United States. In 1888 he came to Custer county, Nebraska, locating at Callaway in June of that year. He immediately became interested in the building up of this section and was one of the first to buy shares in the flouring mill and other enterprises which he helped to put on a paying basis. He was one of the leading organizers of the Seven Valleys Bank of Callaway and was its president for many years.

On the 20th of August, 1893, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Norbury to Miss Agnes L. Tyson, at Cottonwood farm, near Callaway. Mrs. Norbury was born March 10, 1864, on Clarence street, Bolton, Lancashire, England. Her parents were William and Jane (Roberts) Tyson. On the paternal side her grandparents were Roger and Betty (Burkitt) Tyson, and on the maternal side her grandparents were Joseph and Mary (Davis) Roberts. Her father was born on the border of Cumberland, in the north of England, and her mother was born October 3, 1827, at Nantlyn, county of Denbeigh, North Wales. Mr. Tyson was an upholsterer by trade. His children were as here noted: Adelaide J., Birkett, and Barbara are deceased; Miss Catherine A. lives in England; William, who is president of the Seven Valleys Bank at Callaway, is a Royal Highlander, a Republican and a member of the Episcopal church, his wife, Annie, being a daughter of William Norbury; Agnes L. is the widow of Thomas Norbury, the honored subject of this memoir; Fannie, who is the wife of Edward Warburton, a druggist in England, has one child, and they belong to the Congregational church; and George, who is a member of the Church of England and of the Masonic fraternity, owns a cotton mill at Leigh, England.

To Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Norbury a son and daughter were born—Thomas W. and Fanny J. Thomas W. Norbury had four years of training in the Kearney Military Academy and then attended the Bradley Polytechnic School, at Peoria, Illinois. Thereafter he was bookkeeper in the Seven Valleys Bank, a position which he was filling when he enlisted for service in the world war, as bugler in Company B, One Hundred and Eighth Military Police, Thirty-third Division, Illinois infantry. At time of this writing he is "somewhere in France." He is a member of the Episcopal church and is affiliated with the Royal Highlanders. Miss Fannie J. Norbury was graduated from the Callaway high school and afterward was for one year a student in the Nebraska State Normal School at Kearney. She resides with her mother at Callaway and they are prominent in social life. Mrs. Norbury is a communicant of the Episcopal church and she holds membership in the Royal Highlanders and the Order of the Eastern Star.

JOHN H. RUSSELL.—In every community will be found quiet, industrious business men following different vocations, without whom the ordinary industries of civilized life could not go on, and very often it will be found that these are self-made men, having, unaided, built up their own fortunes. In this connection attention may be called to John H. Russell, who is the leading stone mason at Callaway, an experienced man in his line of work, and also a citizen who is held in esteem on account of his sterling character. John H. Russell was born at Gates, in Custer county, Nebraska, December 25, 1882, and is a son of William H. and Elizabeth E. (Bowman) Russell, the latter of whom was born in West Virginia, a daughter of Abraham Bowman. William H. Russell was born in Indiana but later in life became a farmer in Custer county, Nebraska. Of his two children, John H. is the elder, and Jennie A., who died at Lincoln, Nebraska, in 1903, was the wife of Trem N. Denman.

John H. Russell remained at home with his parents until he was twelve years old, attending school and making himself useful to his father, and later on he was a student for one year in the Lincoln high school. He has taken care of himself ever since he left the parental roof. He began as driver of a delivery wagon for J. C. Bowen, and remembers how proud he was when he thereby earned his first suit of "store" clothes. In 1897 he applied himself to learning the mason's trade and afterward, for seven years, he was in the employ of William C. Dodson, a prominent general contractor at Lincoln. In 1904 Mr. Russell came back to Custer county. For six months he was connected with a hotel at Merna, but with that exception he has been in business as a stone mason continuously ever since. He has completed the stone work on many of the important buildings at Callaway and other places, and his reputation is that of a steady, reliable and competent workman.

Mr. Russell was married, at Broken Bow, Nebraska, June 3, 1905, to Mrs. Vinnie Barker, who is a daughter of Jesse M. and Indiana (Carter) Ash, and she has brothers and sisters as follows: Mrs. Elva Wright, Mrs. Blanche Mooney, Alonzo, Ward, Harry, Herbert, Boyd, George, and Corbett. By her former marriage Mrs. Russell has one son, Richard Barker, and Mr. and Mrs. Russell have three daughters, Nina, Della, and Lulu, all of whom are attending school. Mr. Russell has never been very active in politics but he has his own political preferences and keeps well informed on all the great issues of the present time, as well as showing lively interest in public affairs in his own nation, state, county, and community.

ROBERT E. GIVEN.—On the roll of Custer county's early settlers who have passed to their reward, mention should be made of Robert Elliot Given, who was born in Pemberton county, Virginia, March 25, 1826. On the 4th of January, 1855, he was united in marriage to Rachel M. Jordan, a native of the same county as her husband, her birth having occurred June 13, 1831. They were farming age of eighty-seven years, a privilege which people and in 1870 they became residents of Whiteside county, Illinois. In 1879 they numbered themselves among the early settlers of Fillmore county, Nebraska. In 1884 they came to Custer county, where Robert E. Given secured as a homestead the southwest quarter of section 28, township 18, range 21, where he became one of the early settlers of this part of the county. His first home was the primitive sod house, and he shared in the hardships and privations incident to those early days. He later bought a quarter-section adjoining his original homestead on the west, where he and his wife passed the remainder of their days and where his death occurred

April 3, 1899, his wife having preceded him to eternal rest, January 19th of the same year. A few days prior to his death he told his minister that he had been a Christian for sixty years. He and his wife had been lifelong members of the Methodist Episcopal church.

Robert E. Given met with success in his farming operations, and at the time of his death he was the owner of three quarter-sections of land. He and his wife had a family of nine children: William is a resident of Lincoln, Nebraska; Sampson is engaged in agricultural pursuits in Custer county; Elizabeth is the wife of J. S. Kennard, of Seward, Nebraska; Mansel, who died two years ago, lived in Chicago; Samuel is a resident of Whiteside county, Illinois; John died in infancy; Ellis W., who owns and operates the old home farm, is individually represented on other pages of this volume; E. S. is residing at Pueblo, Colorado; and Deborah is the wife of James Anderson, of Emporia, Kansas.

Pioneer conditions were still in evidence on every hand when Robert E. Given settled in Custer county, and he lived to see vast changes take place in the community he helped to develop.

MICHAEL McCARTY is one of the native sons of Custer county, and was born on his father's homestead, in Dale valley, September 28, 1888, a son of Robert D. McCarty, of whom extended mention is made elsewhere in this volume.

Michael McCarty was reared on the farm and acquired his education in the public schools of his native township. As a boy he assisted in the development of the homestead and when a young man of twenty-one years he wisely chose the vocation with which he was familiar. He is now operating a farm of 160 acres, belonging to his father.

For a wife and companion Mr. McCarty chose Miss Irene Dale, a native of Custer county, and they are the parents of three children: Rachel, Laurence, and Leonard. Mr. and Mrs. McCarty are members of the Catholic church and are held in high esteem in the community with which the McCarty family have been identified for thirty-eight years.

CARL R. KRENZ. — Few men in Custer county have been residents here for a longer period than has the gentleman whose name introduces this record, thirty-eight years having come and gone since he cast in his lot with the pioneers of this county.

Carl Rudolph Krenz is a native of Prussia, Germany, where he was born November 27, 1831. He has no knowledge of his parents, both having passed away when he was quite young. He made his home in his native land till he was twenty-two years of age and there he learned the trade of furrier. In 1853 he started for America, and after a trip of three weeks, from Liverpool, England, he landed at Brunswick, Nova Scotia, the voyage being made on a sailing vessel. He went to Boston, Massachusetts, where he found employment until 1859, when he became a resident of Davenport, Iowa, there working at his trade for sixteen years. His next place of residence was in Nebraska City, where he remained two years, after which he went still further west in Nebraska, and located at Grand Island.

Desiring to become a farmer and not possessing the necessary capital with which to purchase land, he came to Custer county in the fall of 1880 and took a homestead of 160 acres, in section 14, township 18, range 22. He also secured a tree claim, in another part of the township, but this he later traded for land adjoining his homestead. His first dwelling here was a dugout, in which the family lived two years. Then was erected a sod house in which the family home was maintained till 1903, when the present commodious frame house was erected.

Those were strenuous times for the settlers, and the hardships and privations they endured can hardly be realized by the present generation. One of the greatest drawbacks to the country was the question of water. It was a long way to the spring on Victoria creek and water was scooped from buffalo-wallows or lagoons till a well could be dug. The first well in Dale valley was dug by Mr. Krenz, in the spring of 1881, on the William Couhig homestead. The nearest market or trading posts were Kearney and Grand Island, and the trip to either of these towns required several days. Mr. Krenz, like other early settlers of Custer county, possessed those qualities which made it possible for him to meet and overcome obstacles, and, as the years passed, success crowned his efforts. Thus to-day he and other pioneers who remain are surrounded with the comforts and blessings which they justly deserve and which the present generation ought to appreciate.

Mr. Krenz has been twice married. His first wife, Wilhelmina, he wedded in Germany. To them were born five children, two of whom are deceased, while those living are Mrs. Bertha Eberling, of Davenport, Iowa; Robert, of the same place; and Julius, a resident of New Mexico.

For his second wife Mr. Krenz chose Miss Catherine Katosky, a native of Germany, and she passed away in 1900. She was the mother of eight children: William, Joseph, and Charles are all residents of Custer county; John resides in Grant county, Nebraska; Almon resides on the old home farm; Anna is unmarried and resides in Iowa; Emma is the wife of Fred Hargerden, of Alliance, Nebraska; Catherine is the wife of Tom Murray and they reside at St. Paul, Minnesota.

Mr. Krenz's religious views coincide with the teachings of the Lutheran church, in the faith of which he was reared, and in politics he is Republican.

Almon Krenz, who now owns the old farm, was born February 3, 1881, in a sod house on the Thomas farm, where his parents lived for a time after they first came to the county. He has always made farming his occupation, and the scene of his operations has been the old homestead. For a wife and helpmeet he chose Miss Daisy Winther, and they have three children: Ray, Rena and Thelma.

Carl Rudolph Krenz has lived retired for several years and has reached the venerable comes to but few persons. He has been an eye-witness to the changes that have taken place in Custer county, and in the work of transformation he has contributed his full share. It is only fair to such as he, as well as to their children and their children's children, that their life record be written and given a place in the history of the county in which they spent the best years of their lives.

WILLIAM E. MARTIN.—Down in the Roten valley, seventeen miles southwest of Callaway, in a splendid farming district, is the well equipped farm of the progressive citizen whose name introduces this sketch.

Mr. Martin was born near Hollister, California, and is a son of John and Clara (Wilkins) Martin, the former a native of Wisconsin, and the latter of Iowa. In the family of John Martin were three sons and one daughter. When William E. Martin was but four years old, his father died, and the mother left California, taking the children back to Iowa, where William was sent to live with his uncle, with whom he remained until he was thirteen years of age. He obtained his early education by attending country school in the winter time, and his boyhood work included catching gophers, picking up rock and cutting wood. After he was thirteen years of age he worked on a farm by the month, for which service he received three dollars per month.

After coming to Nebraska, Mr. Martin settled in Nance county, and on the 12th of September, 1899, in Fullerton, that county, he married Miss Nettie Bishop, a very excellent young lady who was well fitted to be the partner of his joys and sorrows. Mrs. Martin was born in Illinois, and is a daughter of John W. and Elizabeth (Gustine) Bishop, the former a native of Shelby county, Indiana. In the Bishop family were five children—Mrs. Nettie Martin, Arthur E., Ella F., Mary L., and Fred E.

In the Martin home to-day are three children—Erma F., who is a young ninth-grade student; Otha O., who has climbed to the eighth grade; and Kenneth A., who stands on the seventh rung of the educational ladder. All are at home and are promising candidates for future usefulness.

Mr. and Mrs. Martin came to Custer county in 1905 and bought the farm known as the Solomon Yoden place, in Roten valley—a property described above as being seventeen miles southwest of Callaway. Mr. Martin farms 110 acres. He has made his money by mixed farming, in which he has turned off a good many hogs and cattle. He gives some attention to dairying and in 1918 he sold four hundred and seventy-four dollars' worth of cream from seven cows. When it comes to handling stock on the farm Mr. Martin has a notion that only the best quality pays, and accordingly he keeps the best that can be procured. He has a pleasant home, a profitable farm, is thrifty and prosperous, and he and his wife enjoy the confidence and respect of their neighbors. Their religious affiliation is with the Methodist Episcopal church.

LESTER D. KIRKPATRICK.—Here is a title-line name widely known in Custer county; here is the story of a young man who is essentially a Custer county product, who is at the present time a very extensive operator in food production, and who has already laid the foundations of an unusually successful career.

Lester D. Kirkpatrick was born in Broken Bow, Nebraska, October 30, 1885, and is the second son of John S. and Isabel (Croft) Kirkpatrick, his father having been a well known early-day lawyer whose residence was in the county-seat town. Lester D. Kirkpatrick is one of a family of seven children—John C., Lester D., Harrison M., Ina B., Ruth, Marie, and Marion. His sister Ina is a law graduate. His youngest brother, Marion, is at the time of this writing, somewhere on the French coast, in the naval service of the United States. John C., the eldest brother, is established on a ranch of 3,000 acres, owned by his father, in Brown county, Nebraska. Harrison M. is a lawyer by profession and is engaged in practice at Idabel, Oklahoma. Ruth is the wife of Franz Jansen and they reside in Kansas City. Marie is the wife of Willard M. Bohart, of Plattsmouth, Missouri.

Lester D. Kirkpatrick left Broken Bow with his parents when his father moved to Lincoln, after having been appointed a commissioner of the supreme court, on the bench of which he served four years. Lester was graduated in the Lincoln high school and also took a course in the Lincoln Business College. In 1904 he enlisted in the coast artillery division of the regular army, stationed at Fort Hunt, Virginia. He served thirteen months and, not liking regular army life, bought his discharge and went to Kansas City, where his father's family was located. There he attended the Kansas City Business College, which gave him an additional educational equipment. When through school he returned to Custer county and took charge of one of his father's farms, about eight miles west of Broken Bow.

March 2, 1907, recorded the marriage of Mr. Kirkpatrick to Gertrude Reinhard, a daughter of John and Mary Reinhard, living near McKinley postoffice in Custer county. An extended reference to this family is found elsewhere in this volume.

The family circle of Mr. and Mrs. Lester D. Kirkpatrick has been increased by the advent of three children — Marion, aged eight; Helen, aged six, and Eugene, aged four (1918). These are bright young children, full of hope and promise. At the present time Mr. Kirkpatrick is operating a ranch which belongs to his father and is located in the Sells valley, seventeen miles south of Callaway. The holdings comprise 1,540 acres, of which 750 are in cultivation and used for crop production. The remainder of the land is used for grazing purposes and has helped to produce army beef, so much needed in connection with the great world war. Aside from his local operations Mr. Kirkpatrick deals in stock, which he buys and sells, and he is considered a "live wire" in the community. He expects the home place to ship out each year at least 200 head of cattle and 100 head of hogs. This makes Mr. Kirkpatrick an extensive producer and a very valuable citizen, especially at this time. In politics, Mr. Kirkpatrick affiliates with the Democratic party. Both he and his wife have a good standing in the community and are rated as "A No. 1" in all progressive movements.

JOSEPH D. HAUENSTINE. — The farmers of the Callaway district seem to be uniformly prosperous and possessed of a common thrift that has distinguished their locality. This story concerns a man who has contributed and is contributing to that reputation.

Joseph D. Hauenstine was born August 10, 1859, in Chatham, Licking county, Ohio. He is a son of Jacob H. and Lucinda (Dull) Hauenstine, who were both natives of Pennsylvania and were very estimable people. The stork served them well and brought to their domicile fourteen children, only five of whom are living at the present time. They are Jacob W., Joseph D. (the subject of this sketch), Mrs. Matilda Bellmire, Mrs. Lucinda Readhead, and Mrs. Ida F. Byler.

During his early life Joseph D. Hauenstine attended the country school and formed studious and industrious habits which have shaped the course of his entire life. His first money was spent for a slate and pencil, and very early in his career he formed a habit — which developed into a hobby — of making scrapbooks out of clippings from newspapers. These books he has preserved through the years, and to-day they show not only his wide range of reading but also the course his mind has taken in all public events. In addition to his scrapbook filing, he has kept a faithful diary, and some day these daily accounts will be very interesting reading. His father, although a cooper by occupation, owned a farm, and here young J. O., as he was familiarly called, put in his first years and began the reading which has made him a well informed man on all subjects.

Mr. Hauenstine came to Nebraska in 1882 and to Custer county in 1886. Here he took a homestead and tree claim. During the drouth period of 1894 he relinquished his homestead to the man who held a mortgage on it, for $350. The farm is now a very valuable one.

August 24, 1892, at Lexington, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Hauenstine to Miss Minerva O. Osborn, who was born in Kentucky, the daughter of David M. and Mary (Gilbert) Osborn, both of whom were natives of the Hoosier state. In the Osborn family were seven children. Aside from Mrs. Hauenstine they were Alwilda Ashley, O. Scott, Wesley, Lizzie Henry, Noah C., and Francis Osborn. The family belonged to the Evangelical church.

Mr. and Mrs. Hauenstine established and have maintained a comfortable home and they have reared a family of five children, all of whom are promising candidates for future usefulness. The children are Florence, Elsie, Edith, Raymond, and Hazel I., all of whom are in school—either at home or in the high school at Callaway, where Miss Edith is pursuing her studies.

The hardships and trials of pioneer days are known to Mr. and Mrs. Hauenstine. They have weathered storms and drouths, and they have surmounted difficulties that would have discouraged less dauntless spirits. They have conquered their difficulties and are to-day well and pleasantly located, surrounded by the rewards of their toil. They own the original tree claim and the total area of their Custer county holdings is 375 acres, beside which Mr. Hauenstine still owns the old homestead of his father in Knox county, Ohio. He and his wife, who has been a true helpmeet, have made their money in farming and stock-raising. They have emphasized dairying and to-day their dairying operations are made more profitable than ever, by the use of an underground silo which is unique in its construction and very profitable as a forage preserver for milch stock and all grades of young cattle.

The Hauenstines are regarded as fine people, and are well esteemed by their neighbors. Mr. Hauenstine exercises a good deal of independence in politics.

CHARLES B. PEARCE is one of the most prominent and prosperous exponents of farm enterprise in the Arnold section of Custer county and is a liberal and progressive citizen who well merits recognition in this publication.

Mr. Pearce claims the fine old Hoosier state as the place of his nativity and is a scion of one of the sterling pioneer families of that commonwealth. He was born in Sullivan county, Indiana, on the 27th of July, 1865, and is a son of Washington Allen Pearce and Susanna (McClure) Pearce, the former of whom was born in Sullivan county, Indiana, in 1813, and the latter of whom was born in Kentucky, in 1821, she having been eight years of age at the time of her parents' removal to Indiana, where she was reared to maturity and where her marriage was solemnized. Washington A. Pearce continued to be identified with agricultural industry in his native state until 1876, when he removed with his family to Missouri, where he passed the remainder of his life, the subject of this review being the youngest of the family of eleven children.

In the public schools of Indiana Charles B. Pearce acquired his early educational discipline and he was about eleven years of age at the time of the family removal to Missouri, where he continued his studies in the public schools, when opportunity afforded, and where also he gained full fellowship with the sturdy work of the home farm.

In 1887, within a short time after attaining to his legal majority, Mr. Pearce, animated by his full share of ambition and self-reliance, made his way to Custer county, Nebraska, where he cast in his lot with the pioneers of that day. Here he pre-empted a quarter-section of land, and the same constituted the nucleus around which he has developed his present large and valuable landed estate, his home ranch to-day comprising a full section of 640 acres, of which 250 acres are maintained under a high state of cultivation, and here Mr. Pearce devotes himself vigorously and successfully to diversified agriculture and stock-raising. He gives special attention to the breeding and growing of hogs, and for several years past two car-loads of hogs have been marketed from this farm each year. On the place Mr. Pearce keeps an average of forty head of cattle and twenty-five head of good horses, while the yards show a fine flock of thoroughbred Rhode Island Red chickens, the poultry exhibit being really one of the attractions of the farm. Enterprising policies and wise management characterize the varied operations of Mr. Pearce, and thus he gains the maximum returns from his well ordered activities as a representative husbandman of Custer county.

The domestic relations of Mr. Pearce had their inception in 1891, when he led to the marriage altar Miss Sylvia Campbell, who was born in Iowa and who came with her mother to Custer county in 1884. Mrs. Pearce has proved the gracious and popular chatelaine of the pleasant home and has contributed greatly to the success of her husband. They have four children, concerning whom the following record is consistently entered, the ages noted being applicable at the opening of the year 1919: Vera, aged twenty-six years, is a Red Cross nurse and at the time of this writing is stationed at Camp Cody, New Mexico. She is a graduate of the training school for nurses that is maintained in connection with St. Luke's hospital in the city of Denver, Colorado, and has been in the Red Cross service for several months. Cecil, aged seventeen years; Gladys, aged thirteen; and Nolan, aged ten, all remain at the parental home and are duly profiting by the advantages of the public schools.

With naught of exaggeration or inconsistency, it may be stated that Mr. and Mrs. Pearce are leaders in their community, where they have been active promoters and supporters of all helpful enterprises. Mr. Pearce has contributed community service from time to time by holding some of the local district or township offices, and at the time of this writing he is giving efficient service as township clerk. He is a successful, progressive farmer who attributes much of his success to a faithful following of the mixed-crop policy in his farm activities. He and his wife hold membership in the Methodist Episcopal church and are popular factors in the best social life of their home community.

JOHN T. MARONEY. — Credit this young farmer of Irish extraction to the Anselmo region. Give Anselmo credit for his thrift and enterprise, and let it be known that Custer county, in common with most other sections of this great country, is deeply indebted to Irish-American blood.

John T. Maroney is a native of Custer county. It was here that he discovered America in 1889. He is the son of Timothy Maroney, a familiar character in Anselmo. In the father's family were two children, John T. and his sister, Mary Knoell, of New Helena. John T. Maroney, himself a native of the county, married a native daughter of the county when, on April 26, 1911, he led to the marriage altar Miss Ora Ross, who was born in the year 1890 and is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Jonas Ross. Since their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Maroney have maintained a representative Custer county home and by provident energy have supplied it with necessities and comforts as occasion required. Three children furnish the household with sunshine and banish lonesomeness. Kenneth, aged six years, Paul, aged four years, and Richard, aged one year (1918), will soon be large enough to assume the management of household affairs. Mr. Maroney and his family live on his father's land, upon which are good improvements and 160 acres of which are in cultivation. He has a good grade of stock, which consists of fifty head of cattle, twenty-one head of horses, and ten head of fine-grade hogs. These form a foundation of the herds Mr. Maroney expects to own when a few more years have come and gone. They constitute the nucleus of a fortune which he anticipates will be large enough to permit his retirement after the strenuous years of middle life are past. He and his wife have lived eight years on the place and are making good in more ways than one. John's early education was in the public schools and later in the Long public school of Omaha, of which he is a graduate. He is independent in politics and stands for anything that is helpful to the community. Speaking of the opportunities in this country for making money, he remarks that when eleven years of age, he made his first money by loading hay, and for this service his employer gave him two dollars, which was almost, if not quite, a man's wages. Mr. and Mrs. Maroney are members of the Catholic church. They are good neighbors and enjoy the confidence of their many friends.

HOMER M. SULLIVAN, of Broken Bow, Nebraska, was born in Davis county, Iowa, May 1, 1857, and is a son of David L. and Rebecca (Morris) Sullivan. He began the study of law in the office of Payne & Eckleberger, at Bloomfield, Iowa. He taught school until 1883, when he was admitted to the bar. In the fall of 1884 he came to Broken Bow and began the practice of his profession with Augustin R. Humphrey, with whom he was associated until 1890. He then formed a partnership with C. L. Gutterson, and this alliance continued until he was appointed judge of the district court, by Governor Holcomb, to fill the vacancy caused by the election of Judge William L. Greene to congress.

In the fall of 1897, Judge Sullivan was elected to fill out the term, and he was re-elected for the full term in 1899. He was county attorney of Custer county for one term, 1887-88.

Judge Sullivan affiliated with the Republican party until 1896, when he allied himself with the Populist party. In November, 1880, he married Miss Ella Turner, of Agency City, Iowa, and five children, four daughters and one son, have been born to them — Ina, Jennie, Lynn, Alma, and Elma.

AUGUST OSTRAND. — A resident of Custer county during a period of thirty-five years, Mr. Ostrand here acquired a homestead on the 9th of June, 1884, since which time he has advanced himself to a position of substantial prominence among the agriculturists of his community, near Mason City, where he is now conducting general farm operations on a half-section of land, with due attention given to diversified agriculture and stock-raising. Mr. Ostrand is a native of Sweden, where he was born January 5, 1850, and he is a son of John R. and Breta (Oleson) Ostrand, who passed their entire lives in their native land.

August Ostrand was educated in the schools of his native country, where also he early learned the lessons of practical industry. In 1872 he came to the United States and found employment in a furnace manufactory at DeKalb, Illinois. He later returned to Sweden, where he remained for some time, and upon coming again to the United States he sought ways and means to lay the foundation for individual independence and success. In 1884 he came to Custer county, Nebraska, and made permanent settlement. He secured in that year a homestead claim near Mason City, and this property he still owns. To the same he has added from time to time, as his financial resources have warranted and his judgment dictated, with the result that he is now the owner of a half-section of land, in addition to other valuable real estate. His residence farm is situated in section 6, township 13, range 18, where he has an attractive residence and other substantial buildings, as well as being provided with modern implements and machinery with which to lighten farm labor and add to the success of his operations. While general farming has been his principal business, Mr Ostrand has been successful also in the raising of cattle and hogs, and each year he ships livestock to the leading markets. He is progressive and energetic and maintains a reputation for integrity in business and for public spirit as a citizen. He is affiliated with the Masonic fraternity and the Modern Woodmen of America, and the religious faith of the family is that of the Presbyterian church.

On the 30th of November, 1879, Mr. Ostrand was united in marriage to Miss Breta Carolina Olsen, and concerning their children the following brief record is available: Constantine, who was born in Sweden, is now engaged in farming in Custer county; Anna is the wife of Harley Johnson, likewise an agriculturist in this county; Lavina is the wife of L. G. Kleckner; John R., at the time of this writing, is with the American Expeditionary Forces in France; Hattie is a popular teacher in the public schools of Mason City; Bettie is the wife of Lee Fisher, a farmer of this county; William and Benjamin remain at the parental home; and Clara is attending the public schools at Mason City.

E. C. HOUSE.—One of the oldest real-estate, loan, and insurance enterprises of Broken Bow is that established in 1886 by E. C. House. The founder was an excellent candidate for a successful real-estate business, for he had formerly had experience in the same line, and the field which he chose as his scene of operations was an advantageous one, both from the town and country standpoints, the while he pursued clean methods and made his word and judgment respected. The result is a business which is not only financially profitable but has also placed the community in a favorable light before those living in adjacent towns and country. The business is now conducted under the title of E. C. House & Son.

E. C. House was born at Moundville, Marquette county, Wisconsin, June 28, 1858, a son of James David and Francis (Turner) House, natives of London, England, where they married and where several of their children were born. Coming to the United States in 1848, the family settled in Wisconsin, where the father became a successful farmer, and where his death occurred in 1865. He was a staunch Republican, and he and his wife were consistent members of the Episcopal church, four of their sons and one daughter having their names registered in the church at St. Johnswood, England. There were ten children in the family, of whom eight are living: Nate J., who is a retired citizen of Canton, South Dakota, served four years and three months as a soldier of the Union during the Civil war; John, who is a retired citizen of Morris, Minnesota, enlisted for one year in the Union army at the outbreak of the Civil war, was wounded in the first battle of Bull Run, where he was taken prisoner, and spent the following eleven months in Libby and Andersonville Prisons before being exchanged and honorably discharged; William is living retired at Arlington, Iowa; Eliza is the wife of George Falkner, a farmer of Glenwood, Minnesota; Julia is the wife of J. E. Cowen, a retired citizen of Fresno, California; Mrs. Anna Bates is a widow and resides at Arlington, Iowa; Emma is the wife of Mr. Broten, who is in the cream-separator business at Grand Forks, Minnesota.

E. C. House received his education in the common schools of Portage City, Wisconsin, and for his first occupation learned the saddlery business, in which he was engaged for some time, subsequently turning his attention to the insurance field. Later he displayed talent as a real-estate operator and insurance salesman, and his business grew to such importance that he subordinated all else to it. In 1886 he came to Broken Bow, where he established himself in the same line, and in more recent years he admitted his son to partnership, under the firm style of E. C. House & Son. The prosperity which has attended this firm has been the direct result of industry and the following out of an honorable policy in conducting a general real-estate, loan, and insurance business. Mr. House is a Royal Arch Mason, and during an early day he held the chairs of senior deacon and junior warden in the chapter. He is a stalwart Republican, and he and Mrs. House, as well as their children, belong to Saint John's church. Protestant Episcopal.

July 2, 1890, Mr. House married Miss Susie I. Cole, who was born at Champaign, Illinois. She is a daughter of W. D. Cole, an agriculturist, who came to Broken Bow in 1888. To Mr. and Mrs. House there have been born two children: Adella is the wife of Harry B. Tierney, a managing chemist with interests at Antioch, Sheridan county, Nebraska; and Nathaniel J., still a bachelor, is junior member of the firm of E. C. House & Son, he being a graduate of the Broken Bow high school, class of 1913. Nathaniel J. House, who was born August 20, 1894, is a blue lodge and chapter Mason, and is one of the energetic and progressive young business men of Broken Bow.

RICHARD BELLIS.—Of the old and honored residents of Custer county, few have combined in greater or more successful degrees the qualities which make for individual success and those which are helpful to their fellow men than has Richard Bellis, prosperous farmer and extensive landholder, and minister of the Church of God. Mr. Bellis has reached the age of eighty-one years and, while he has somewhat relaxed from the strenuous labors of a decade or so ago, he still attends to the daily routine of his farming affairs, and continues to minister to the spiritual needs of his church's people.

Richard Bellis is a native of Wales, born February 14, 1837, his parents being Robert and Hannah (Bill) Bellis, neither of whom ever left their native land. Robert Bellis began life as a butcher, but in later years adopted the vocation of farming. By his first wife he had a family of four children, all deceased, and by his second marriage he had eight children, of whom Richard is the only survivor. Richard Bellis was given his early education in the public schools of Wales, and while his training was not far out of the ordinary his mind was so receptive and retentive that he gained a much better schooling than the majority of his companions with the same advantages. Throughout his life he has continued to be a great reader and keen observer, with the result that today he is an extremely well educated man and a clear and logical thinker. Shortly after his eighteenth birthday he left his home in Wales and came to America. He arrived in New York City February 22, 1855. For one year thereafter he remained in the Empire state, and he then removed to Illinois, where he made his home for two years and was employed as clerk. He came to Nebraska in 1879 and was numbered among the pioneers of Hamilton county, where he bought land and resided for ten years, carrying on farming. It is to be understood that when he came to this country he had little or no capital, that his early struggles were exceedingly hard, and that every dollar he possesses to-day has been gained through his own efforts. When he left Hamilton county, Mr. Bellis came to Custer county and homesteaded a property, and here he has continued to reside to the present time. He erected all the buildings which are now located on his quarter-section, in sections 9 and 39, in addition to which he made all the other improvements which make this property so valuable and productive. Carrying on mixed farming operations in an industrious way and according to modern methods of procedure, he won success such as comes to but few, and he is now able to enjoy the comforts and conveniences which are the rewards of a life of earnest effort, clean living, and probity.

On the 29th of May, 1861, Mr. Bellis wedded Miss Hattie Cornelia Sweezey, who was born in Illinois, and after their marriage they located on a farm near Winnebago, Illinois, where Mr. Bellis continued his active association with farm enterprise for the ensuing sixteen years. Mrs. Bellis passed to the life eternal in January, 1877, secure in the faith of the Church of God. Of the three children of this union only one is living—May, who is the wife of Frank McFarland, a farmer in the vicinity of Newell, Iowa.

In 1881 was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Bellis to Mrs. Nancy J. (Stark) Stine, widow of John Stine, who had served as a soldier in the Civil war, the three children of this union being Tillie J., Ellen May, and La Nora Ann Stine. Mrs. Bellis claims Indiana as the place of her nativity; she is a representative of a sterling pioneer family of the Hoosier state, and is seventy-one years of age.

In 1892 Mr. Bellis was ordained as minister of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, by the Nebraska eldership of the Churches of God in Nebraska. At the time of the present writing he has charge of the Church of God at Berwyn, Custer county. It is interesting to record that Mr. Bellis personally revised this sketch, and that without the aid of glasses. For twenty-six years he has preached locally, having spent eleven years of that time at Weissert, without interruption, and at times during his career of spreading the Gospel he has traveled many miles by team to address the people. The life of Mr. Bellis has been a long, useful and inspiring one, and furnishes a lesson which cannot fail to have a good effect upon the minds of the young—those who are starting life without friends or helpful influences, just as Mr. Bellis did many years ago. His achievements make him deserving of the reverence and esteem in which he is uniformly held in his part of Custer county.

ROBERT McCARTY.—Born and reared on the farm which is now his home, Robert McCarty represents one of the pioneer families of Custer county. September 3, 1890, was the date of his birth and he is a son of Robert D. McCarty, who is a retired farmer residing in Merna and whose life story, as a pioneer in Custer county, will be found elsewhere in this volume.

Robert McCarty married Miss Dora Ellen Thomas, who was likewise born in Custer county. She is a daughter of Charles Thomas, who was only a boy when he came to Custer county and who, when old enough, secured a homestead, his life record being given elsewhere in this history.

Robert McCarty is successfully engaged in farming operations on the old homestead. He and his wife are members of the Catholic church and are prominent in the younger social circles of the community. They have one child, Lucille M., born February 19, 1918.

OLIVER H. MEVIS.—Broken Bow counts on her role of honored and departed citizens none who left behind more numerous or substantial evidences of association with its affairs than did the late Oliver H. Mevis. As a soldier, business man, investor and public-spirited citizen, he came and went among the people of his town from his arrival in 1890 until his death, August 5, 1913, and there remains in his wake an impression of practical usefulness, and of genuine, dependable character—due in part to his sturdy ancestry, but more directly traceable to his untiring zeal and ready recognition of opportunity.

Mr. Mevis was born at Syracuse New York, January 22, 1836, a son of Hiram Mevis. His father was born in one of the eastern states and his mother in Holland. At an early date the family located at Lansing, Michigan, where Oliver H. Mevis secured the advantages to be obtained by attendance in the public schools. He was still a young man when he left Michigan and removed to St. Paul, Minnesota, where he was located at the outbreak of the Civil war. With youthful enthusiasm and patriotism he offered his services to his country, and during the following three years he fought gallantly as a member of Company D, Second Minnesota Volunteer Infantry. His service was crowded with experience, including wounds and capture by the enemy, and was characterized not only by the utmost courage in the face of danger but also by unremitting fidelity to duty. When he received his honorable discharge, Mr. Mevis went to Chicago, where he was united in marriage with Miss Anna Kernan, who was born near Three Rivers, Canada. Mrs. Mevis died, without issue, in 1896. After their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Mevis went to Galesburg, Illinois, where Mr. Mevis founded a dry-goods business, with a small stock of goods. Later he disposed of his interests there and went to Hillsboro, where, with a little larger stock, he engaged in a similar venture and carried on a successful business for a number of years. His advent in Nebraska occurred in 1879, in which year he settled at Fremont, where his business activities continued for eleven years. During all this time he had been constantly pushing further and further ahead on the road to success, and in 1890 he came to Broken Bow and opened a pretentious establishment, which immediately attracted the patronage of the citizens of the community. This was the leading store of its kind and continued to be under Mr. Mevis' capable management and wise and far-sighted direction right up to the time of his death,—and this in spite of the fact that he was an invalid for three or four years preceding his demise. His guiding hand and alert mind were always felt in the conduct of the business which he had founded and which was still growing and expanding when death called him to his final rest. Mr. Mevis started his career with practically nothing, and he worked his way steadily upward until he was one of the substantial men of a community in which there were numerous citizens of independent means. In doing so he never found it necessary to take an unfair advantage of others, and his life record contains no dark pages in regard to disabling others that he might himself go unscathed in the battle for commercial supremacy. He made numerous wise investments, exercising his excellent business judgment and his faith in his community at one and the same time, and among his purchases was a large block at the southeast corner of the Public Square, a property which is still owned by his widow. Mr. Mevis was a faithful member of the Catholic church, to which Mrs. Mevis also belongs.

He was a member of the Knights of Columbus and was a Republican in his political views.

October 27, 1897, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Mevis to Mary Elizabeth Boures, who was born at St. Paul, Minnesota, a daughter of Thomas and Amelia (Kernan) Boures, who were united in marriage at St. Paul, Minnesota, the father having been born at Three Rivers, Canada, and the mother at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.

CANUTE LEE, who is industriously and successfully engaged in farming in the vicinity of Mason City, and whose specialty is the raising of cattle, hogs, and horses, is one of the sons of Norway who have found prosperity in Custer county through the exercise of natural ability, good management, and persistent industry. His entire career has been devoted to the pursuits of agriculture, for from the time of his arrival in this country, as a child of three years, he has always lived on a farm and his interests have always been centered in the pursuits of the soil.

Mr. Lee was born in Norway, July 14, 1852, and is a son of Stephen B. and Ellen Lee, also natives of that country. He was the third in order of birth, the others of the children being: Bruns, who is now retired from active pursuits and makes his home at Los Angeles, California; Nels, who died and is buried at Broken Bow; Martha, who makes her home with her brother at Los Angeles; Andrew and Margaret, who are deceased; and Louis, who met his death at Los Angeles, California.

Canute Lee was about three years old when his parents came to the United States, in 1855, the first residence being in Henry county, Illinois, where the father was engaged in farming for five years. From the Prairie state the family moved to Crawford county, Wisconsin, in 1860, and there the son Canute attended the public schools during and after the period of the Civil war. He was brought up as a farmer, and after a career of only ordinary success in Wisconsin he came to Custer county, Nebraska, and here, in 1889, he purchased his present property. The home of his parents was three miles north of Ansley, where they rounded out long and honorable lives, but Mr. Lee's property is situated near Mason City, being in section 15, township 13, range 18, where he has 160 acres in a good state of cultivation. Mr. Lee has had much success in his experiments in raising cattle, hogs, and horses, and his reputation in this direction has led him to be accounted somewhat of an authority upon the subject. Just as he is progressive in his private affairs, so he is likewise public-spirited and constructive in his citizenship, and his support is never withheld from any worthy measure, whether religious, civic, or educational. His integrity in business dealings has never been questioned, and, all in all, he is a very desirable citizen.

Mr. Lee married Miss Mary C. Nelson, a member of a Custer county agricultural family, and to this union there have been born five children: Ida, who is the wife of Bernard Schrader, a farmer of Custer county; Edward, who married Miss Laura Dewey, of Ansley, and who carries on agricultural operations not far from the home place; Andrew, who married Miss Hulda Porath and who is his father's assistant in operating the farm; Amy, who is deceased; and Eunice, who lives with her parents on their home farm, on Elk creek.

JACOB B. KLUMP.—Among the men who came to Custer county during the early '80s were found a number of men who were veterans of the Civil war and who had also had experience in farming. They were men who were destined to assist in the development and upbuilding of this section. One of these was Jacob B. Klump, who, after many years spent in successful farming operations, is now living in comfortable retirement at Broken Bow.

Mr. Klump was born December 24, 1834, in the kingdom of Wurtemberg, Germany, and he is a son of John M. and Fredericka (Wolf) Klump, who passed their entire lives in that country. There were seventeen children in the family, of whom thirteen grew to maturity, and Jacob B. was the fifth in order of birth. In his native land he had the benefit of eight years of training in the public schools, and during his boyhood and early youth he was employed in his father's mill. In March, 1853, his mother took him before the district court of his home community in order that he might relinquish his citizenship to Germany, and not long thereafter he and his two sisters, Katie and Sophie, came to the United States and joined their uncle, Francis Klump, a farmer of Lake county, Illinois. Jacob B. Klump worked at whatever honorable employment presented itself, and was variously engaged until the Civil war came on, when, in 1861, he joined Company G, Thirty-ninth Illinois Veteran Volunteers, under Colonel Light. He served his term of enlistment, three years, and then re-enlisted for a like period "or for the duration of the war," at Hilton Head, South Carolina, in the same company and regiment. While he participated in every engagement in which his regiment took part, he was of sturdy physique and glowing health, and was incapacitated only twice, when he received slight wounds. His big engagements numbered thirteen or fourteen, and at all times he proved a brave and faithful soldier. Mr. Klump's brother William, who had come later to this country, was a member of the same company and regiment and died at Morris Island, South Carolina, after serving nearly three years. In the Union army, he also had six brothers-in-law, three of whom died of wounds during their first year of service. In January, 1864, Mr. Klump secured a furlough and returned to Jo Daviess county, Illinois, where, on February 29th, he married Miss Jane Parkinson, a daughter of James and Christina (Hoy) Parkinson. He returned to his regiment and continued to serve gallantly, being advanced to sergeant and then to regimental color-bearer, and receiving two honorable discharges from the service, the last one in 1865. At that time he returned to his home in Illinois and purchased eighty acres of land, on which he continued to carry on operations with success until 1883. He then came to Custer county, Nebraska, and located near Cliff postoffice, where his wise management and industrious labor combined to bring him success and enabled him to accumulate a large tract of land. He made numerous improvements on his property, including the sinking of a cistern that held 1,000 barrels of water, and in 1888 he sunk a well 400 feet deep, at a cost of $600. When he reached advanced years he retired from active pursuits and removed to his present home, at Broken Bow, but he is still active and alert, and much of his time is spent in his repair shop, where his natural bent toward mechanics finds expression.

Mr. Klump has been frequently called upon to serve in public positions and his record as an official is an excellent one. Before leaving Illinois, he served sixteen years as justice of the peace, being commissioned by four different governors, and since coming to Custer county he has been justice of the peace eight years and supervisor two years. Mrs. Klump died in 1906, having been the mother of eleven children, of whom nine are living: Sophia is the wife of Fred Bertram, a farmer near King City, Missouri, and she is the mother of six children; Herman R., who is a resident of McPherson county, became the father of six children, of whom three are living; Julia is the wife of James Holliwell, a farmer at Merna, and they have two children; Frederick W., who is a ranchman at Ringgold, McPherson county, married Ethel Butler; Miss Mary is engaged in teaching school at Lincoln; Ruby is the wife of Fred Hackbarth, engaged in farming near Hershey, Lincoln county, and they have four children; Hardy B., who served as a soldier in the Spanish-American war, is now a farmer near Arnold, Custer county; Miss Olive is engaged in teaching in the state of Washington; August E., a farmer in Garfield county, married Lulu Martin and they have three children.

In 1907, at Broken Bow, Mr. Klump was again married, being united with Mrs. Mary Koch, concerning whose four children by a former marriage the following brief record may consistently be entered: Andy married Miss Clara Dale and they have two children; Jacob wedded Miss Lizzie Harpley and they have four children: Oscar enlisted in the government airship service in connection with the nation's participation in the world war and at the time of this writing he is assigned to duty as clerk in the office of the major in government barracks in the state of New York; and Carrie is the wife of Clayton Yohn, their children being four in number.

Mr. Klump is one of the valued and appreciated members of the Broken Bow post of the Grand Army of the Republic, his wife holding membership in the Woman's Relief Corps, and both are members of the Methodist Episcopal church.

FRANK J. McCARTY is one of the younger generation in his native county and has had the good judgment to remain within its borders. Here he owns and operates a farm of 160 acres. Mr. McCarty was born in his present home township, on the 11th of March, 1885, and is a son of Robert D. McCarty, of whom extended mention is made elsewhere in this volume.

While yet a young man at home, Frank J. McCarty began farming independently, by renting land. In 1912 he purchased his present farm, and he has brought his fields to a high state of cultivation, the while he has erected a substantial set of buildings and successfully carries on general farming.

Mr. McCarty married Miss Mary Teahon, who, like her husband, was born in Custer county, and who is a daughter of Patrick Teahon, now deceased. The home of Mr. and Mrs. McCarty has been blessed with two children—Bernadette and Richard. The family are members of the Catholic church and in politics Mr. McCarty is a Democrat.

DANIEL R. ROCKWELL.—The career of Daniel R. Rockwell is an illustration of active and diversified energy, and in its working out it has invaded the fields of agriculture, commerce, and public service. It has been the fortune and privilege of this prominent citizen of Broken Bow to have attained well merited success in each of the avenues of personal endeavor into which his industry has taken him, and at the time of this writing he is giving his country exceptionally efficient service in discharging the responsibilities connected with the office of federal food administrator for Custer county.

Mr. Rockwell was born in Chautauqua county, New York, November 5, 1866. His father, William H. Rockwell, was born in Bradford, Pennsylvania, the family having come from Germany, and settled at Bradford, Pennsylvania, where the grandfather was engaged in business. William H. Rockwell removed from the Pennsylvania home to Chautauqua county, New York, where he was residing at the outbreak of the Civil war. He was a volunteer for the Union service, and for three years fought gallantly with a New York infantry regiment. When he received his honorable discharge he returned to his home, resumed his civilian duties, and made as good a record in the paths of peace as he had in the strenuous energies of the great struggle between the north and south. His political support was given to the Democratic party, and he and his wife, whose maiden name was Adaline Remington, and who was a daughter of Ransom Remington, were consistent members of the Congregational church.

Daniel R. Rockwell entered upon his career at a time when the usual run of boys are still enjoying the advantages of the public schools. He had opportunities for the training of his mind in the district institutions of his neighborhood during the winter months, but he was a lad of only thirteen years when he left the parental roof and went to Benton county, Iowa, where he found employment on the farm of his cousin, W. H. Rockwell. During the next eleven years he remained in that county, his industrious and energetic services always being found available by the farmers there, and careful saving of his earnings enabled him, in 1889, to come to Custer county, Nebraska, and buy a relinquishment claim on timber land near Sargent. Thirteen years of development work brought this land to a high state of cultivation, and during this period Mr. Rockwell added to his holdings from time to time, so that to-day he is the owner of 960 acres of fertile Custer county land, in addition to which he has properties in other counties in Nebraska and in other states. His work at the start was of the hardest kind, but his ability, perseverance and ambition were able to stand any kind of strain, and he had the final satisfaction that comes only to a man who has accomplished something worth while, by himself and for himself. Mr. Rockwell took up his residence at Broken Bow in 1902. He had shown to himself that he was possessed of business ability, and he proceeded during the next five years to demonstrate this same fact to the old Plano Company, for which concern he traveled throughout the surrounding territory, as a salesman of machinery and as a collector. When he resigned his position with that concern, he embarked in a business venture of his own, his line being hardware and furniture, and he brought this business to a point where it was paying large dividends. He has since disposed of his interests in this enterprise, having accepted a very satisfactory offer. When he gave up his business cares, he did so with an absolutely clean slate, his reputation in commercial circles being one of the kind that will stand an acid test.

Mr. Rockwell's business record is not the only thing that gives him the right to be named as one of Broken Bow's first citizens. His public service also has been something far from the ordinary. He was early recognized as a man of ability, stability and worth, and after acting three terms as councilman he was elected mayor of the city. During the two terms that he served as chief municipal executive, the community was given the benefit of splendid administrations; numerous movements of a progressive nature in the way of civic betterment were started, and Broken Bow was the beneficiary in a number of other ways. That his record was clear was evidenced in his appointment to his present position as federal food administrator for Custer county. Mr. Rockwell is a thirty-second degree Mason, and the family attend the Presbyterian church.

November 18, 1884, at Belle Plaine, Iowa, Mr. Rockwell married Miss Almeda Vadike, daughter of J. P. and Mary Jane (Drake) Vadike, well known and honored farming people of this community. Four children were born to this union: Edna I., who is the wife of Edgar B. Osborne, a prosperous farmer of Superior, Wisconsin, with one daughter, Robetta; Ethel I., who is the wife of Thomas

Rector, a railroad man of Superior, Wisconsin, with a daughter, Margarie; Miss Hazel, who resides with her parents at Broken Bow, and is a well known teacher in the public schools; and Melvin, who is still a public-school student.

HARRY R. KNAPP.—So to direct one's affairs that it is possible to retire from the strenuous activities of life while still there are the best years of existence coming, is a reward that comes to but a favored few. Among these may be mentioned the present county clerk of Custer county, Harry R. Knapp, of Broken Bow. He has been a ranchman and business man, has made good in both directions, and now, while in retirement as to business affairs, he is still active and energetic in his community, and has so impressed himself upon the minds of his fellow citizens that it has been recognized that he is of the timber of which good public officials are made. He was elected to the office of county clerk in November, 1918, on the Republican ticket, and he assumed office January 1, 1919.

Mr. Knapp is a Nebraskan by birth, training, education, experience, and inclination. He was born at Wahoo, Saunders county, in November, 1874, a son of John W. and Nancy I. (Tull) Knapp, natives of Hancock county, Illinois. John W. Knapp is a Saunders county farmer whose qualities of character have made his name in his locality synonymous with integrity and stability. He is an Odd Fellow, votes the Republican ticket, and attends the Methodist Episcopal church, in the faith of which he and Mrs. Knapp reared their five children. Three of these children survive: Harry R. is the subject of this review; Wirt E., a well known grain dealer of Saint Louis, Missouri, who married Fay Harris, now deceased, is the father of two children,—Wirt E., Jr., and Laura; and Roy C., a farmer of Kearney, Nebraska, is married and has four children.

Alternating with his work on the home farm, Harry R. Knapp passed his boyhood in attending the local public schools. He had the further advantage of being sent to the high school at Wahoo and a business college at Fremont, but he was no sluggard in his youth, as his industry kept him energetically working and his first money was secured by strenuous labor on a neighboring farm in Saunders county, his emolument being fifty cents a day. He remained on the homestead until he had attained to his majority, at which time he struck out for himself, and his good judgment in business affairs placed him in a position where, in 1907, when he came to Custer county, he was able to purchase 1,000 acres of land, on Ash creek. After eleven years he retired from active participation in business affairs and took up his residence at Broken Bow.

As an intelligent and well informed man, co-ordinating his community's interests with his personal feeling, Mr. Knapp has been a constant observer of what is going on about him. He has been a constructive worker in assisting local movements, and his prominence in this direction led his party to give him the candidacy for the county clerkship. His personal record is one that assures him of good support, and his business career is one of the kind that stands for an A-No. 1 rating. Fraternally, Mr. Knapp belongs to the Masons, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Woodmen. With his family, he holds membership in the Methodist Episcopal church.

Mr. Knapp was married November 4, 1901, at Wahoo, Nebraska, to Miss Edna C. Robinson, daughter of Charles T. and Flora (Spurgeon) Robinson. Mrs. Knapp's parents are well known and honored farming people of Saunders county and prominent members of the Methodist Episcopal church in their community. Mr. Robinson is a Democrat and is affiliated with the Modern Woodmen of America. Mr. and Mrs. Knapp have a bright and interesting little daughter, Glayds M., who is five years old in 1918.

GEORGE W. McRAE.—After thirty years of continuous effort in the vocation of agriculture, George W. McRae retired from his activities in 1913, and since that year has been living quietly at Berwyn. During the time that he was applying himself to his vocation, he demonstrated the possession of marked abilities, and accumulated a competency, while at the same time he won and held the respect of his fellow citizens. Mr. McRae was born in Harrison county, Indiana, January 12, 1852, a son of Daniel B. and Nancy (Wright) McRae.

C. C. McRae, the paternal grandfather of George W., was born in Scotland and was a young man when he immigrated to the United States. He lived at various points, principally in the south, and died in western Tennessee, where he had been engaged in farming. The maternal grandfather was Joseph Wright, who for years carried on farming in Indiana and passed away there. Daniel B. McRae was born on his father's home plantation in South Carolina, where he was educated, and as a youth of twenty years he went to Indiana, where he pre-empted land. He soon showed his capacity for shrewd business dealings, added to his holdings from time to time, and when he died he left an estate which included 160 acres of land, in addition to which he had other valuable investments. Following his demise his widow came to Nebraska, but she lived only a year after her arrival. They were the parents of five children, of whom there are two living: George W.; and J. W., the latter a farmer of Colorado. The parents were faithful members of the Presbyterian church. Politically Daniel B. McRae was a Republican, and during Civil war times he was a staunch Abolitionist and did much to assist the Union cause.

George W. McRae was educated in the district schools of Indiana, and while he was reared on the farm and trained in its pursuits, he also learned in his youth the trade of plasterer, which he followed in connection with his farming activities. Leaving the Hoosier state in 1882, he came to Nebraska and located in York county, but after one year he came to Custer county, where he took up a homestead. This continued to be his home for the next thirty years, or until 1913, when he retired from active labor and removed to his pleasant home at Berwyn. The success which came to Mr. McRae was the result entirely of his own efforts, for at no time in his career did he have to call upon other than his own abilities to attain his objects. He is a Republican in his political views, but, while a good citizen, has not cared for public office. His reputation in business is beyond reproach, and there are many who have reason to thank him for his good advice and counsel in matters of importance. As a fraternalist, Mr. McRae has been affiliated with the Odd Fellows for many years.

In 1881, prior to coming to Nebraska, Mr. McRae was married, in Indiana, to Mrs. Maggie (Walter) Hart, who was born in southern Indiana, a daughter of John Walter, a native of Germany who died in Indiana. To this union there were born three children: Coday married Hazel Norcutt, and has one child, Dorothea Maxine; Flavious resides at home, but at the time of this writing he is in the government war service, as a member of a medical corps stationed at Dunkirk, New York; and Ora Lee is the wife of James Davidson, a farmer of Perwyn, and they have one child, Mary Margaret. By her former marriage, Mrs. McRae is the mother of three children: George H., John W., and Katie (Hart) Davoll.

HENRY L. WILSON.—While he is one of the latest members to join the bar of Custer county, Henry L. Wilson has already obtained a recognized position and standing among the practitioners of this locality, and at Broken Bow, where he established his residence in December, 1916, he has built up a substantial and representative professional business. Mr. Wilson is a native son of Nebraska, and was born at Chadron, Dawes county, September 5, 1886, his parents being John M. and Clara E. (Mitchell) Wilson.

John M. Wilson was born in Scotland and as a lad developed wanderlust that caused him to run away from home and work his passage across the Atlantic to Canada, where he accepted such employment as he could find. His adventurous spirit later led him to Colorado, where, during the early pioneer days, he engaged in hunting and freighting, and he secured his start in this way—principally in what he was able to obtain by his prowess in hunting buffalo. In 1886 he settled down at Crawford, Nebraska, where he established himself in the clothing business, and there he has conducted the leading store of its kind ever since, he being known as one of the foremost merchants of his community. He is a Republican in his political views. In Colorado was solemnized the marriage of John M. Wilson to Clara E. (Mitchell) Williams, and they are the parents of three children: Henry L., Harry (a traveling man with headquarters at Vancouver, Canada), and Ruby.

Henry L. Wilson attended the public schools at Crawford, and after his graduation in the high school, in 1903, he began teaching school, a vocation which he followed for one year. Next he entered the University of Nebraska, and after there continuing his studies two years he was absent for one year, but later he was a student for another half-term. Finally he entered the law department, and in 1911, he was graduated, being immediately admitted to practice. He started his professional labors at Crawford, and in the same year he was appointed city attorney, but in 1914, he removed to Lincoln, where he remained until coming to Broken Bow, in December, 1916. Here he bought the practice and good will of Judge J. R. Dean, and since that time he has been in the enjoyment of a constantly increasing professional business. He has been active in public affairs, and is at present serving Broken Bow as city attorney. In the election of November, 1918, he was the Republican candidate for county attorney, but was defeated. A man of broad learning and sound, practical knowledge of the law, he is rapidly making a name and reputation for himself.

and has already taken long strides toward a leading place in the legal fraternity in Custer county. In politics he supports the cause of the Republican party. Mr. Wilson belongs to the various organizations of his profession and is fraternally affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

On June 21, 1913, Mr. Wilson was united in marriage, at Crawford, to Miss Lena Fafek, who was born at that place, and to this union there has been born one child: Twilla.

CARL SWENSON is a young man of thirty-six years and is a native of Custer county. He is one of the successful young farmers operating in the Burr Oak district of the South Loup river region. His life story for the most part is covered in the following biographical sketch of his father and father's family.

John Swenson, seventy-nine years of age in 1918, is a native of Sweden and forty-nine years ago brought to the United States those industrious and frugal habits common to the people of that north Scandinavian region. His wife, Mary (Peterson) Swenson, is past sixty years of age and possesses all the qualities of the sturdy Swedish race to which she belongs. John Swenson landed in New York, where he remained until he came to Custer county and homesteaded a fine quarter-section of land. He located on his present place thirty-eight years ago. When he reached this country he had practically nothing, and all his possessions of the present day are the direct results of his own toil and savings. Mr. and Mrs. John Swenson became the parents of seven children: Mollie is deceased; Samuel and Carl remain at the parental home; Tilda Amy lives in Custer county; Eddie is at home; Olga continues to reside in this county; and Willie, the youngest, is at home. The father and mother belong to the Presbyterian church.

Carl Swenson, the subject of this sketch, is a farmer and partner on the home place, which to-day consists of the old homestead and three other quarter-sections, which have been purchased, making in all a full section of good land, on which are excellent improvements. The stock raised on this farm is of unusually high grade—the best kind of hogs that select breeding can produce, and red Durham short-horns and Percheron horses that make a fine show for live-stock production.

Carl Swenson is a social member of the Modern Woodmen of America, and is a constituent member of the Presbyterian church. He enjoys the confidence and respect of a large circle of friends and as a progressive son of the west he also has exhibited the sterling characteristics of the hardy race from which he springs.

WILLIE C. SHOEMAKER.—The man whose life history these lines relate lives in the Cumro district, where the soil is productive and where the inhabitants are among the best people of the county.

Mr. Shoemaker is fifty-six years of age (1918), and a native of Porter county, Indiana. His Hoosier blood has stood him in good stead and his industrious traits, inherited from good parentage and imbibed in early years, have borne splendid fruits in Nebraska.

His father, Albert Shoemaker, who was a native of the Buckeye state and who lived to the age of seventy-nine years was a retired farmer at the time of his death, which occurred in Iowa. The mother of the subject of this sketch was Melvina (Maulsby) Shoemaker, who was born in Indiana and who died in that state, when but twenty-two years of age. Born to the union just mentioned were two children, the subject of the sketch and a little sister, Melvina, who died at the age of eighteen months. By the father's second marriage there are four children—Rila, who lives in Muscatine, Iowa; Mrs. Viola Dood, whose husband is an Iowa farmer; Everett, who is a Missouri farmer; and Roy, who lives at Red Oak, Iowa, where he is assistant cashier of the First National Bank.

Albert Shoemaker was a veteran of the Civil war, in which he rendered to the government very valuable service as a valiant soldier of the Union. He was a farmer by occupation and both he and his wife were faithful members of the United Brethren church.

In 1888 Willie C. Shoemaker married Miss Nettie H. Martin, and to bless this union and make happy the parental home have come six children: Bliss is a young man of twenty-eight years (1918) of age and is already embarked upon his successful career as a farmer in Custer county; Ray, aged seventeen, is still on the home farm and is rendering his father valuable assistance; Ross, aged nine years, is a school boy who is still home and who is a candidate for usefulness in future years; Ethel Cherry is married and lives on a farm in custer county; and Lula and Albro are deceased.

In the Shoemaker holdings are 700 acres, well adapted to farming and stock-raising. One quarter-section of this ranch was homesteaded by Mr. Shoemaker. When he was but two years of age his parents removed from Indiana to Iowa, where he grew to young manhood and received his early education. It was there that the foundation of his life and character were laid, in the formative years when human destinies are plastic. He came directly from Iowa to Custer county in 1887, ten years after the organization of the county, when everything connected with the country was young and primitive.

Mr. Shoemaker's stock-raising operations have followed all lines—horses, hogs, and cattle—and in each of these he has been a successful producer. His farm improvements are ample to meet all requirements and make stock-raising profitable. He and his wife now take their ease as compared with the experiences of early days. The slow vehicle of 1887 has been transformed into a modern automobile and this has brought the home farm comparatively close to community centers and larger towns. Mr. Shoemaker is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America and the family is connected with the Presbyterian church.

PETER STRIEDER.—From the time of his arrival in Custer county, in 1898, to the present, Peter Strieder has been demonstrating the possession of qualities of perseverance, industry, and good citizenship, which have combined to win him personal success as an agriculturist and the esteem and friendship of those among whom he has lived and with whom he has been associated. This enterprising and energetic farmer and stock-raiser of section 21, township 71, was born in Germany, June 19, 1860, a son of Andreas and Gertrude (Dhein) Strieder.

The parents of Mr. Strieder passed their entire lives in their native land, where the father was a successful agriculturist and also followed the vocation of milling, being an industrious man and one possessed of unbounded energy and marked ability. He and his wife were faithful members of the Catholic church, and were the parents of four children: Peter, who is the subject of this sketch; Henry, who is a resident of Germany; Gertrude, who married Anton Fier and lives in Germany; and Anna, who is married and likewise lives in Germany. Peter Strieder grew up on the home farm in Germany, where he assisted his father in the daily tasks about the home place and also secured a knowledge of the milling business. He continued to reside under the parental roof until he was twenty-seven years of age. In the time that elapsed between that age and the year of his majority he had harbored longings to try his fortunes across the Atlantic, his imagination having been fired by the tales of opportunities at hand in America. Accordingly, in 1887, he came to the United States and took up his abode in Jackson county, Illinois, where, in order to get a start and to familiarize himself with conditions and the language and customs of the country, he worked about the country among the farmers. Gradually he accumulated a competence, and in 1898 he realized his ambition to become a property owner on his own account, when he came to Custer county and purchased his present home place, a property consisting of 160 acres. This land at that time was not in the best of condition, but Mr. Strieder set about remedying this defect, and he now has one of the fertile, productive and valuable tracts of his locality. He does general farming, being equally at home in all the various branches of agriculture, and has made what is to be considered a very satisfying success. Mr. Strieder has not been active in politics, and upon political questions of the day maintains an independent stand, reserving his right of franchise to vote for the man he considers best qualified for the office. He served as postmaster of Pilot for more than four years. He and the members of his family are faithful and consistent attendants of the Catholic church.

In 1895 Mr. Strieder was united in marriage to Miss Louise Zimmer, and two children have been born to this union: Bruno P., who at the time of this writing is with the American Expeditionary Forces in France; and Gertrude, who remains with her parents.

ORVILLE M. MOUREY.—Among the younger element in the agricultural industry in Custer county, Orville M. Mourey has been numbered since 1912. In that year he came to his present farm, in section 30, in the Mason City community, and here his success has been marked and continued. He is typical of the class of young farmers who are expected to maintain the prestige of this locality during the years to come, and his progress thus far would seem to be indicative of his ability to do his full share in carrying on the work of development and the raising of standards.

Mr. Mourey was born near Miller, Buffalo county, Nebraska, not far from the banks of the South Loup river, March 13, 1891, and is a son of W. R. and Sarah (Dougherty) Mourey. His father, who was a native of the east, migrated to Nebraska in 1883. At that time he was a man of no means, his main capital in fact being found in his ambition and determination, along with a willing industry and an inherent capacity for persistent and continued labor. He took up a homestead in Buffalo county, near the site of what afterward became the town of Miller, and since that time has continued to be engaged in agricultural pursuits, adding to his acreage and to his standing as a business man each year. He is now the owner of 900 acres of good land, all accumulated through legitimate channels of business, and has the greater part of this land under cultivation. He and his wife became the parents of seven children: Orville M., of this notice; Ada, who married Ervin Simmons, a farmer of Buffalo county; Herbert, who lives in Custer county; his twin, who died in infancy, unnamed; and Blanche, Esther, and Melvin, who live with their parents.

Orville M. Mourey received his education in the schools of Buffalo county and grew up on the home farm, his boyhood being passed in much the same manner as other farmers' sons of his day and locality. He commenced farming operations on his own account in Buffalo county, where he met with a measure of success, but in 1912 came to Custer county, where he purchased his present farm of 160 acres. Since then he has been busily engaged in erecting substantial buildings and improving his land with the installation of modern improvements of every character, and the fertility of his land can be testified to by his large crops. He is one of the progressive and constructive men of his community and is always ready to give a trial to any method or experiment that promises to aid in progress and advancement. He has found no time to enter actively into politics, his farming operations having to this writing demanded all of his attention.

Mr. Mourey was married September 18, 1911, to Miss Minnie Esherman, daughter of William and Mary (Shucker) Esherman, farming people of Buffalo county, and to this union there have been born two children: Earl and Mildred, both of whom reside with their parents, and the former of whom is attending school.

ELLIS W. KNIGHT.—Custer county gained a good citizen in 1913, when Ellis W. Knight settled in the Anselmo region.

Mr. Knight began his earthly career June 18, 1889, which makes him still a young man just entering the prime of manhood. He is a son of William and Zelma (Brown) Knight. His father was a native of England and his mother a Wisconsin lady of splendid and homelike qualities. The father came to America with his parents in the days of his youth. They settled near Topeka, Kansas, and later moved to Gage county, Nebraska, where they established a farm home near the town of Adams.

Ellis W. Knight qualified himself for life and all its activities in the public schools and in the University of Nebraska. Five years ago, in 1913, he came to Custer county and became manager and part owner of the Smith & Knight ranch, containing 1,120 acres, and in this partnership arrangement he is an extensive cattle and hog raiser. At present they have 200 head of cattle and 250 hogs.

February 15, 1908, Mr. Knight married Miss Ethel Shrepf, daughter of Emil and Nellie Shrepf, of Lincoln, Nebraska. The father was a native of France and the mother came of English lineage. Mr. and Mrs. Knight are the parents of five children, who are bright, full of life and all candidates for energetic manhood and womanhood. They are: Donald, George, Dorothy, Irene, and Leonard.

Mr. Knight has three brothers: Henry, who is a Custer county farmer; William, who is employed on the Smith & Knight ranch; and Fred, who is at present away from home. On the Smith & Knight ranch managed by the subject of this sketch are good buildings of all kinds, a farm home and every farm and stock accessory, building or shed that could be required. The ranch contains also the present-day accessory of a good garage, and everywhere one sees the evidence of thrift and good management.

The Knights are splendid people, good neighbors, reliable and substantial citizens. In politics the Democratic principles have the preference of Mr. Knight, but independence is not abandoned. He is a member of the Ancient Free & Accepted Masons.

PATRICK TEAHON was one of the early settlers of and lived to see vast changes take place in Custer county. He was born in Ireland and when a boy accompanied his parents to America. His mother died when he was quite small and his father was killed while serving in the Union army in the Civil war. Thrown upon his own resources, young Teahon worked at whatever would give him a living, and in the early '80s he came to Custer county and secured a homestead. There he built a sod house, in which he kept bachelor's hall until his marriage to Mrs. Thomas Griffiths, who was a native of Wales and whose maiden name was Mary Price. She was a girl of eighteen when she came to America to make her home with an aunt. By her marriage to Thomas Griffiths she became the mother of seven children. By her marriage to Thomas Teahon she became the mother of two children — Mary, who married Frank J. McCarty, and Joseph, who operates the home place and makes his home with his mother. It was on this farm that Thomas Teahon was called to his final rest; he passed away January 11, 1918, and in his death the community lost one of its sterling pioneers and substantial citizens.

JAMES D. McCARTY, who owns and operates a fine farm of 160 acres, in section 22, township 18, range 22, is a representative of one of the families of Custer county that has been prominent since pioneer days. He was born in Webster county, Iowa, October 31, 1871, a son of Robert D. and Anna (Downey) McCarty, and he was a lad of nine years when the family came to Custer county and settled on a homestead in this township.

The incidents pertaining to those days and the labor involved in opening up a new farm are quite familiar to him. He remained at home, assisting in the work of the old homestead, until he reached his majority, when he began an independent career as an agriculturist. He operated land as a tenant for a few years, and met with the success that made it possible for him to become the owner of a farm. His present place is equipped with substantial buildings, and general farming is carried on successfully.

In 1899 was solemnized the marriage of James D. McCarty to Miss Anna Sweeney, a daughter of Henry Sweeney, deceased, and Bridget (Harvey) Sweeney, who came to Custer county in 1886 and of whom further mention is made on other pages of this volume. Mr. and Mrs. McCarty are the parents of four daughters, all of whom are still under the parental roof — Lily K., Ruth V., Ferne M., and Estelle A. The family are communicants of the Catholic church and in politics Mr. McCarty is a Democrat. Aside from the duties of presiding over the household Mrs. McCarty has found time to serve two terms as a member of the school board. Mr. and Mrs. McCarty are people of real, genuine worth and are held in high esteem by all who know them.

FLORIAN JACOBS. — The two vocations of agriculture and merchandising are so closely allied that it is not unusual to find an individual person engaged in both lines of endeavor. Such has been the experience of Florian Jacobs, who, after many years of successful effort in farming, turned his attention to merchandising. At the present time he is president of the Co-operative Company, one of the leading business enterprises of Broken Bow.

Mr. Jacobs was born in Hamilton county, Indiana, October 22, 1869, a son of Francis M. and Laura A. (Teal) Jacobs. His grandfather, Sanford Jacobs, was a South Carolinian who became a pioneer in Ohio and later in Indiana, at a very early day, and he died in the latter state. Francis M. Jacobs was born in Adams county, Ohio, in 1842, and as a youth was taken by his parents to Indiana, where he was living at the outbreak of the Civil war. He enlisted in Company B, Thirtieth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, with which regiment he served during the greater part of the war and with which he made an honorable record, while taking part in a number of hard-fought engagements. While with General Sherman on the famous "march to the sea," he was wounded, at Marietta, Georgia, but he recovered. Later he was captured by the enemy, in South Carolina, and for three months was confined in Libby Prison. After being mustered out of the service, at the close of the war, he returned to Indiana, where he married Laura A. Teal, who was born in Sweden, in 1849, and was three years of age when brought by her parents to the United States. Mr. and Mrs. Jacobs settled down to an agricultural career in Indiana, where they remained until 1874, in which year they came west and located in Dawson county, Nebraska, where Mr. Jacobs bought land. In 1875 he moved to the vicinity of Callaway, Custer county, where he remained two years. In 1877 he took up a homestead at New Helena, where he duly perfected his title and where he continued to carry on operations until his death, in 1900. His widow still remains on this old homestead. Mr. Jacobs was a Democrat and a member of the Grand Army of the Republic. He and his wife were the parents of the following children: Florian; Miss Cora, a professional nurse, of Ansley, Nebraska; Jessie L., a well known educator and lecturer, of Tulsa, Oklahoma; Charles S., engaged in the lumber business at Craig, Colorado; Miss May V., a teacher in the schools of Ranchester, Wyoming; Maude V., the wife of S. M. Blue, an accountant and expert in penmanship, of Portland, Oregon; Edna, the wife of H. R. Cutler, a carpenter at New Helena, Nebraska; and Beatrice, the wife of David Williams, a farmer of the same community.

Florian Jacobs was five years of age when brought by his parents to Custer county, and when he was nine years old he attended the first school in the county, in a little log structure which still stands as a landmark of early days. He secured sufficient education to enable him to get a teacher's license, and for several years he was engaged in the instruction of the young, but eventually he turned his attention to farming and stock-raising. He started in a small way, but through industry and persistent effort succeeded in the accumulation of satisfying capital, and in 1903 he moved to a farm seven miles northwest of Broken Bow, where he had 190 acres and carried on extensive operations. Mr. Jacobs continued to center his interests in farming until he became one of the founders, in 1917, of the Co-operative Company, which conducts a general merchandise business, with a capital of $50,000. Of this company he is the president. In his business career he has demonstrated the same ability that he displayed as a farmer and stock-raiser, and his straightforwardness and honorable conduct have but served to further advance his reputation and solidify his popularity.

In 1898 Mr. Jacobs married Miss Hettig M. Taylor, daughter of Miner and Lenore (Stearns) Taylor. Miner Taylor was a native of New York, was a Civil war veteran, and was a pioneer of Custer county, where he settled in 1888. Mr. and Mrs. Jacobs have no children. Mrs. Jacobs is a member of the Christian Science church, and Mr. Jacobs is a Scottish Rite Mason. He is a Republican in politics, and though he prefers business to public matters, he is at all times a loyal citizen and a supporter of public-spirited movements. He is serving at the present time as representative of Custer county in the state legislature.

DARIUS M. AMSBERRY, whose election to the office of mayor of Broken Bow occurred in April, 1918, has in this preferment been accorded one of the many evidences of popular confidence and esteem shown him within a period of more than forty years' residence in Nebraska. Mr. Amsberry has wielded large and beneficial influence in connection with the civic and material development and progress of Custer county, and has been specially prominent in connection with educational matters and the newspaper business in this section of the state. Save for his official services he is now living virtually retired, and as one of the foremost citizens of Custer county, he merits a definite tribute in this history. In the fall of 1918 he was elected secretary of state for Nebraska, the duties of which office he assumed January 1, 1919.

Mr. Amsberry was born near Knoxville, Marion county, Iowa, on the 10th of September, 1851, and is a scion of one of the honored pioneer families of that part of the Hawkeye state. He is a son of William F. and Harriet A. (Brown) Amsberry, both of whom were born and reared in West Virginia, where also their marriage was solemnized. The father was born September 9, 1823, and his death occurred in November, 1887. The mother was born in 1833 and she passed to the life eternal in the year 1898.

William F. Amsberry came to the west and settled in Marion county, Iowa, in 1848. There he became a pioneer farmer, and later he engaged in the lumber business, with incidental operation of a saw mill. In 1879 he came with his family and settled in Custer county, near Mason City. He took up a homestead and developed a productive farm, both he and his wife having passed the residue of their lives in this state and the names of both being here entitled to pioneer distinction. Mr. Amsberry was originally a Democrat in politics, but eventually he transferred his allegiance to the Republican party. He was influential in community affairs as a pioneer in Iowa and there served as justice of the peace. Both he and his wife held membership in the Baptist church. Of their seven children all are living except one: Beatrice, who resides at Mason City, Custer county, is the widow of Hiram T. Kauffman; Darius M., of this review, was the next in order of birth; Madora H. is the wife of George W. Runyan, a retired farmer residing at Broken Bow; Boyd F. is a resident of Anacortes, Washington; Marcena L. is a farmer near Ansley, Custer county, Nebraska; and Kittie is the wife of Lew M. Whitaker, a merchant and stockman at Canton, Sioux county.

The paternal grandparents of the subject of this sketch were William and Polly (Everett) Amsberry, who were born in the state of New York and who thence removed in an early day to West Virginia, the closing years of their lives having been passed in Iowa, where they were pioneer settlers. It may consistently be noted that the family name of the mother of Polly (Everett) Amsberry's mother was Franklin and that she was a cousin of Benjamin Franklin.

Darius M. Amsberry was reared under the conditions and influences that obtained in the pioneer epoch of Iowa history and in his youth he received good educational advantages, including those of Central University, at Pella, Iowa. He was for four years successfully engaged in teaching in the public schools of his native state, and after coming to Nebraska he taught five years in the vicinity of Grand Island. He then came to Custer county and entered a homestead claim near Mason City. He gave his attention to the reclamation and cultivation of this farm for a period of six years, and he then, in 1884, established his home at Broken Bow, the judicial center of the county. In formulating and advancing the work of the public-school system of Custer county Mr. Amsberry played a most prominent part, and for this service alone the county owes him a lasting tribute of honor. He served six years — 1882-88 — as county superintendent of schools, and within this regime he effected the organization of one hundred and sixty school districts in the county. This was at the period when the county was gaining its maximum tide of immigration, settlers coming in caravans and by other primitive mediums of transportation and giving to the social and industrial development of the county a remarkable impetus.

After his retirement from the office of superintendent of schools Mr. Amsberry purchased the plant and business of the Custer County Republican, and for the ensuing twenty years he continued as its editor and publisher. He made this paper a medium for the advancement of the best interests of the county along all lines, and under his administration it continued as the leading newspaper of the county during a long period. In 1906, under the administration of President Roosevelt, he was appointed receiver of the United States land office at Broken Bow, and he was reappointed under the regime of President Taft. In this important office he continued his effective service for a period of nine years and nine months, at the expiration of which time he retired. After selling his newspaper business Mr. Amsberry turned his attention to real-estate operations, and in this connection likewise he proved himself the able and progressive exponent of civic and industrial development and advancement.

Since his election to the office of mayor of Broken Bow, in the spring of 1918, Mr. Amsberry has shown the same loyalty and resourcefulness that have marked his activities in all other fields in which he has served within his long period of residence in Custer county. His able and resolute administration in the office of secretary of state is assured.

In politics Mr. Amsberry is found aligned as a stalwart and able advocate of the principles of the Republican party, he is affiliated with the Masonic fraternity and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and both he and his wife hold membership in the Baptist church.

On the 6th of April, 1875, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Amsberry to Miss Evelyn Greenlee, who was born near Corydon, Wayne county, Iowa, and who is a daughter of Sylvester and Hettie Greenlee, sterling pioneers of Iowa, in which state they continued to reside until their death. In conclusion, is given a brief record concerning the children of Mr. and Mrs. Amsberry: Minnie M. is the wife of James W. Clay, a prosperous farmer near Broken Bow; William S. is a railway employe and resides in the state of Oklahoma; Amy R. is the wife of Carl Foote, a ranchman near Dunning, Blaine county, Nebraska; Lorin W. is identified with newspaper enterprise at Dunning; and Lillie H. is the wife of Wilbur H. Bangs, a ranch operator near Purdum, Blaine county.

WILLIAM H. LEWIS. — The agricultural interests of Custer county find a worthy representative in the subject of this record, who owns and operates a well improved farm near Anselmo.

Mr. Lewis was born in Lafayette county, Wisconsin, August 24, 1860, and is a son of William R. and Elizabeth (Simons) Lewis, the former born in New York state and the latter a native of Boston, Massachusetts. The parents were married in Wisconsin and in 1870 they became early settlers in Sedgwick county, Kansas, but owing to ague and fevers, which were prevalent in that country in the early days, they moved to Missouri, later settling in Iowa. From the Hawkeye state they returned to Kansas and settled in Smith county, where they resided from 1877 to 1900. In 1901 they moved to Colorado, where both passed away at the age of seventy years.

William H. Lewis spent his boyhood days on farms in Wisconsin, Kansas and Iowa and eventually became a farmer on his own account, residing in Smith county, Kansas, for fifteen years. In 1900 he came to Custer county and purchased 160 acres, south of Anselmo. Here he has erected substantial buildings, and he has enlarged his farm by purchasing an additional quarter-section in 1914 and still another quarter-section in 1916. Here he is successfully engaged in diversified agricultural pursuits, and he also owns 640 acres of grazing land, north of Anselmo.

For a companion and helpmeet Mr. Lewis married Miss Ann Brechbuhle, who was born in Switzerland and who accompanied her parents, Fred and Anna Brechbuhle, to the United States when she was five years of age, the family home being established in Smith county, Kansas. Mr. and Mrs. Lewis are the parents of eight children: John and Clarence are married and reside in Anselmo; Ralph is, at the time of this writing, in the service of his country, as a member of the United States army in France; and Frank, Lester, Marie, Jennie, and Doris are at home.

Mr. Lewis is a Democrat in politics and has rendered efficient service as justice of the peace and township clerk. He is one of the substantial men of his community and is well and favorably known.

ALVIN DAILY.—As manager of the Farmers Mercantile Company, Inc., of Anselmo, Mr. Daily is demonstrating his ability as one of the able business men of Custer county, and he also has the distinction of being one of the early settlers of the county.

Mr. Daily is a native of the Empire state, and was born near Hallsville, New York, January 1, 1862, a son of William Grant Daily and Phoebe (Howe) Daily, a record of whom appears on other pages of this volume. Alvin Daily, a record of whom appears on other pages of this volume. Alvin Daily was nine years old when the family moved to Knox county, Illinois, and was with his parents when, two years later, a removal was made to Louisa county, Iowa. He was reared on a farm and educated in the public schools, and when a young man he taught school for a time. At the age of twenty-one years he took up the occupation to which he had been reared, and for a short time he was engaged in farming in Louisa county, Iowa, but in the fall of 1883 he and his brother Leon started for Nebraska with a covered wagon and a team of four horses. They spent one season in Howard county and then came on to Custer county. In section 24, township 20, range 22, Mr. Daily took a homestead which he improved and upon which he resided until he moved to his present location, the northeast quarter of section 16, township 20, range 21. This property he has developed into one of the valuable farms of the community. It is equipped with a fine, modern house, good barns and outbuildings and is one of the finest homes in Custer county. "The Meadows" is the name given to the place and it embraces 400 acres, all under a good state of cultivation.

May 26, 1882, in Louisa county, Iowa, Mr. Daily was united in marriage to Miss Rose Dell Peters, a daughter of Daniel H. and Mary (Lake) Peters, who were natives of Delaware county, Ohio, and who settled in Louisa county, Iowa, in 1881, both being now deceased. Mrs. Daily joined her husband in Custer county soon after he located the homestead, and she shared in all the pioneer experiences incident to the times. Mr. Daily says he wore out three "soddies" before they built their present residence.

Mr. Daily is now manager of the Farmers Mercantile Company, Inc., of Anselmo and still resides on his farm. He has made a success of his affairs and is justly accounted one of the substantial men of his adopted county.

THOMAS TORGERSON.—Two generations of toilers have pinned their faith and lent their practical energy to the farming property now owned and managed by Thomas Torgerson, a tract which lies in the Broken Bow community of Custer county and which has been in the family name since 1886. Its present owner, a man of industry and splendid reputation, was born in Norway, in 1867, and is a son of Lars and Martha Malinda Torgerson.

The parents of Mr. Torgerson were born in Norway and in 1874 immigrated to the United States, the first settlement of the family being in Iowa. There the father secured work in the coal mines, and there the mother's death occurred, following which Lars Torgerson, deciding he was not making sufficient progress, came to Custer county and, in 1886, homesteaded the present property of his son, Thomas. He and his wife were the parents of six children, of whom five are living, but only two are now located in Nebraska: Thomas and Samuel, the latter farming near the Kansas line. Lars Torgerson, who died at the home of his son in Custer county, was a Republican in politics, and his religious faith was that of the Lutheran church.

Thomas Torgerson was but seven years of age when brought by his parents to the United States, and as he was sent to the coal mines to work and to assist in the family support when he was but twelve years old, he was not given any great advantages in an educational way. However, he was bright and alert, has always been a close observer of men and things, and thus he has acquired more thorough and practical knowledge than many men who have had infinitely better opportunities. When he accompanied his father to Nebraska, he turned his attention to farming, and in this vocation he has made a worthy success. His father, while an upright and industrious man, had not been prosperous, having met with several business reverses, which necessitated his putting a mortgage on the homestead, and this had not been cleared off when he died. His son Thomas, who took over the farm, has not only succeeded in making the farm clear of indebtedness, but also has added from time to time to its acreage, until he now owns a full section of land, all under cultivation, and improved with a modern home and substantial and commodious barns and other farm buildings. "Tom" Torgerson, as he is familiarly known, bears the reputation of being a man of his word and one of inflexible integrity. In addition to general farming, he buys and sells horses, and also handles many cattle. He is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America, maintains an independent stand in regard to political questions, and, with Mrs. Torgerson, belongs to the Christian church.

On December 25, 1898, Mr. Torgerson married Miss Maude Cox, who was born in Missouri, and was brought to Custer county in 1885, by her father, Daniel Cox, who homesteaded a property and was engaged in agricultural pursuits until his death. Mr. and Mrs. Torgerson are the parents of four children: Wardie, Nellie, and Blanche are attending the Broken Bow high school, and Martha, at home, is the youngest of the children.

DAVID CHRISTEN may truly be called a self-made man, as his present prosperity has come to him through his own efforts, and his life record exemplifies what may be accomplished by industry and perseverance.

Mr. Christen is a native of Bohemia, where he was born August 20, 1862, and he is a son of Pius and Nellie Christen, who spent their entire lives in Bohemia, the father passing away at the age of seventy-eight years and the mother at the age of sixty-eight years. They were farming people, and they had three sons, all of whom came to America and are now residents of Custer county. The names of these sons are Pius, David, and Frank.

David Christen was reared in his native land and at the age of fourteen years he found employment as waiter in an eating-house. When seventeen years of age he began learning the blacksmith trade, and he followed that trade in the old country until 1885, when he came to America. At Beaman, Grundy county, Iowa, he worked at his trade and at farm labor until 1892, when he came to Custer county, Nebraska, and purchased 160 acres of land, in township 19, range 21. The place was equipped with a sod house and stable, and for two years he resided on this farm. He then purchased the old Dryden farm, in the same neighborhood, and there he successfully carried on agricultural pursuits for several years. That he succeeded is attested by the fact that to-day he is the owner of 1,200 acres of land, which he and a tenant operate on shares. In 1910 Mr. Christen removed to Anselmo, and for one year he here conducted a hardware store. He then built the electric-light plant, which he operated three years. He became vice-president of the Anselmo State Bank and when J. J. Tooley became secretary of the state banking board Mr. Christen succeeded him as cashier. Since that time he has devoted his time to the management of this substantial banking institution.

The Anselmo State Bank was organized July 27, 1903, with a capital of $5,000. Frank Young was president, David Christen vice-president, and J. J. Tooley cashier. Business was conducted in a little frame building on the site of the present quarters. For three years the bank occupied the building where the postoffice is now established, and when the Masonic Temple was erected the bank leased the ground floor, where it is now located. The Anselmo State Bank has had a steady growth and its capital has been increased to $25,000, while it has a surplus of $5,000. The present officers are: Charles G. Sanders, president; J. A. Kellenbarger, vice-president; David Christen, cashier; and E. J. Foley, assistant cashier.

Mr. Christen was united in marriage to Mrs. Lena M. Streb (nee Smith), a native of Springfield, Ohio, and a daughter of Frank Smith. At the time of her marriage to Mr. Christen she was the widow of Roman Streb. In religious faith Mr. and Mrs. Christen are communicants of the Catholic church, and his political views make him a Democrat. Successful in business, public-spirited in citizenship, every worthy cause has the liberal support of Mr. Christen.

WILLIAM G. MILLS.—Custer county has a fine coterie of retired farmers who have worked through the long days of their middle life and are now enjoying a deserved rest, being well provided with the comforts of life, as the result of their toil. William G. Mills is one of these. He was born June 13, 1862, in Madison county, Iowa. His parents, William and Lucinda (Stark) Mills, were staunch, substantial people, and were held in unqualified respect and esteem. The father was a native of Illinois and the mother was born in the Hawkeye state. The father was affiliated with the Masonic fraternity and during the Civil war served as a second lieutenant in Company I, Twenty-first Iowa Volunteer Infantry. Four children compose the family circle of this estimable couple. They are Ira P., William G., Emma L. English, and E. Grant.

When William G. Mills was but three years of age his father yielded to the call of the west and located in Lancaster county, Nebraska Territory, in 1865. Lincoln at that time was not yet on the map. Here the father obtained a homestead farm, and he lived on the place eighteen years. On this pioneer farm the early years of the life of William G. Mills were spent. It was here that he earned his first money and gradually inducted himself into the live-stock business. It was his job to do the family churning, for which his mother paid him one cent an hour. Twenty-five hours of churning thus earned him twenty-five cents, and with this as his part of the investment, he and his brother Ira purchased a pig in partnership. They raised the pig, sold it and bought two pigs. These were finally sold, and with the proceeds they bought two calves. This launched them into the stock business so effectually that they have never been able to get out. Mr. Mills helped on the farm during the summer time, attended public school during the winter time, and finally finished his high-school course and attended the state university, at Lincoln. In 1883 Mr. Mills came with his father and family to Custer county and the father located five miles north of Arnold, which locality has since that time been known as Mills valley. At that time William lacked six weeks of being twenty-one years of age, but with an eye to good business, he selected a homestead and a tree claim, and the day that he was twenty-one found him bright and early in the North Platte land office, ready to make his filing. Thus was laid the foundation of the competency his Custer activities have since secured for him.

Continued bachelorhood had no attractions for Mr. Mills, so, on December 7, 1884, he led to the marriage altar Miss Millie A. Guy, who was born in Lincoln, Nebraska, a daughter of William and Martha (Hall) Guy, the former a native of Pennsylvania and the latter of the District of Columbia. Both parents were members of the Protestant Methodist church. In the Guy family were three children — Dr. Milton P. Guy, Laura A. (deceased), and Millie A. Mills.

Mr. and Mrs. William G. Mills have five children: Guy P., who lives on a farm near Arnold, married Daisy Phiper, and they have two sons. John M., who likewise is a farmer in the Arnold vicinity, married Susie Simms and they have one son and one daughter. Charles S. is farming near Logan. He married Merle Lester, and they have one son. Clarence E. is somewhere in France. He was one of the first graduates of the Arnold school and on the 5th day of September, 1917, he entrained for Camp Funston. He was later made corporal and then promoted to sergeant of Company A, in connection with headquarters business. He was with the American Expeditionary Forces in France at the time the great war came to a close. May is at home with her parents and in the tenth grade of the Arnold schools.

Mr. and Mrs. Mills lived on their land in Mills valley twenty-seven years, during which time he was an extensive producer of hogs, cattle, and horses, but he is inclined to the idea that hogs and horses paid him better than cattle. Before he divided his land among his children he had 1,320 acres, all well improved and in a high state of cultivation. He still owns 500 acres but maintains a splendid home in Arnold, where three acres of ground makes a garden plot or small farm that furnishes him with all the exercise that he cares to take. The family, children and all, belong to the Methodist church. All are well and favorably known in the southern regions of the county.

HIRAM R. BLACK. — Once numbered with the active, progressive men of his day and generation, the subject of this memoir has been called from the scenes of pioneer life to that eternal home where it is believed worth and merit are rewarded. Mr. Black was born January 14, 1859, in Mahaska county, Iowa, and was a son of Samuel Black, a native of Germany. In his father's family there are but two surviving children — Belle Black and Anna Coakley. When Mr. Black was but seven months old his mother died and he was taken by a family named Steward. When nine years of age he went to work on his own account and prepared to face the world for himself. The adventures and hardships of after years had no effect upon his dauntless spirit. He turned his hand to anything he could find to do. He succeeded in getting a liberal education and worked his way slowly to the front.

On the 19th day of April, 1884, in Omaha, Mr. Black was united in marriage to Ernestine (Berndt) Vogel, a young lady who was born May 20, 1857, in Flinsberg, Germany, a daughter of Carl and Christina (Knobloch) Berndt. Both of Mrs. Black's parents were Germans of long ancestral lines. In her father's family were four children — Herman, Mrs. Black, August, and Emma.

Mr. and Mrs. Black established a home of their own and maintained it always upon hospitable lines. They were hard-working people, frugal and provident, and as a result they were always able to obtain the necessities and many of the comforts enjoyed in the western homes of Custer county. Their family circle widened with years, and to-day the family page records the following named children: Edward, the firstborn, is a farmer near Callaway. He married Ella Klein and they have one daughter. They are members of the Church of God. Cora E. Black is a trained nurse, having graduated in the Douglas County Hospital, in Omaha. When not employed in her profession, she makes her home with her mother on the farm three miles east of Arnold. As she is a skilled nurse there is great demand for her services, and she is rarely at home for any considerable period. May F. graduated as a member of the first class in the Arnold high school. She married Clarence Gist, a conductor on the Burlington Railroad, and they live at O'Neill, Nebraska. Iva Black lives at home with her mother. She is also a nurse who received her training in the Douglas County Hospital. Mark R. Black runs his mother's farm.

Mrs. Black has three children by a former marriage. They are Albert Vogel, who married Florence Hoffman and lives on a farm of his own, near Arnold. Theodore Vogel likewise is a farmer near Arnold. He married Ida Ray, and they have five children — three sons and two daughters. They are members of the Baptist church. Bertha is the wife of Thomas Ryan, a farmer and plasterer living near Arnold, and they have three children — two sons and one daughter.

Three years after their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Black came from Council Bluffs, Iowa, to Custer county, where they located on what is known as the East Table, on the Anselmo road. They had to haul water ten miles, and they kept this up for two years. Mrs. Black says that when her husband first came out to see this country and secure land, he told her that it was ten miles down to water and ten miles up and ten miles in any other direction. During their experience of the first two years, she became convinced that this was not an exaggeration. They lived on East Table about three or four years and then moved to the South Loup river, where she has lived ever since. Mr. Black died April 28, 1916. He was a member of the Masons, a charter member of Chapter No. 225. He was one of the prominent pioneers of the county. He helped to develop the county's resources. He and his wife endured the hardships, crossed the rivers, climbed the hills, and outbattled their difficulties. At the time of his death they owned 670 acres of land, and this is still the home of Mrs. Black. For a time they lived in Arnold, where Mrs. Black was postmistress for five years, after which she conducted a shoe store for seven years, while Mr. Black and the children operated the farm. The farm home to-day is the rallying center for the children. Here they delight to gather and here Mrs. Black delights in the homecoming of the children and the grandchildren, to whom she recites the stories of the early days.

ALEXANDER DE LOSH. — Retired from active operations, the subject of this sketch lives in Arnold, where, in a modern home, he enjoys the comforts to which his years of toil entitle him.

Mr. De Losh was born on the 26th day of March, 1858, in St. Lawrence county, New York. In the same county were born his parents, Cornelius and Sophia (Myers) DeLosh, of whose children five are living — William, Julius, Mary A. Green, Alexander, Alma Ewald, and John. Cornelius DeLosh was a farmer by occupation and he moved to Delaware county, Iowa, Iowa, when his son Alexander was seven years of age. In Delaware county the father purchased a farm, and there the youthful days of Alexander were spent. The parents were devoted members of the Methodist church. At the age of ten years Alexander DeLosh earned his first money, by helping a neighbor drive hogs six miles to market. For this service he was given twenty-five cents. During the summers he was employed upon the farm and in the winter months he attended the country schools, where he received a fundamental education that has served him well in all the subsequent transactions of business. Since he was thirteen years of age he has practically made his own way in the world. His first wages were eleven dollars a month, and that was considered an unusual compensation in those times. These excessive wages were paid because Alexander had the reputation of being a "good hand." He did not have the easy time of the present-day farm hand. He did not expect to have the chores done before sundown and the use of an automobile after supper. In fact, the farms in those days were operated on the eight-hour plan — eight hours in the forenoon and eight in the afternoon. By the time he was eighteen years of age Mr.

DeLosh managed to equip himself for farming in an independent way.

December 12, 1878, Mr. DeLosh was united in marriage to Charlotte Whittaker, daughter of Samuel T. and Cynthia A. (Mayne) Whittaker. Mrs. DeLosh belonged to an Iowa family in which were ten children, eight of whom are living at the present time — Socrates, Marius, Jane S., Danford, Meroe Bruce, Mary A. DeLosh, Isabelle Morgan, Charlotte DeLosh, and Ulysses.

Early in the spring of 1885 Mr. and Mrs. DeLosh, urged by the lure of the west, came to Custer county, Nebraska, and located a homestead eleven miles south of Arnold, on the Tallin Table, where they have made their home for thirty consecutive years. Theirs were the experiences of the pioneer days. During the first three years of their residence here, they hauled water eleven miles, then they put down a well to a depth of 306 feet, at a cost of one dollar a foot. After eight months they lost the use of this well and had to haul water for two years more before they were able to put down another well. This shows the real stuff of which the early settlers were made. It took pluck to persevere under such handicaps, but Mr. and Mrs. DeLosh stayed. They put down another well, they "made good," and to-day the original homestead has been increased to 1,280 acres, upon which are two sets of good building improvements. Mr. DeLosh is now able to live retired, and accordingly he has established himself at Arnold, in a comfortable, modern home. He credits farming and stock-raising for all of his accumulations and success. Concerning the children of Mr. and Mrs. DeLosh the following brief data are available: Walter C. married Maud Purcell and became the father of one son and two daughters. He died October 27, 1913. At that time of his death Walter owned a full section of land on the Tallin Table and his widow still resides on the farm. He was a Mason, and was well and favorably known in the community. Isabelle F. is the wife of Martin Holt, a farmer who owns a half-section of land on the Tallin Table, and they have one daughter. George A. is the youngest of the family, and thus it falls to his lot to operate his father's farm. He married Esther Magunsen, and they have one daughter. Alexander DeLosh is a Mason in high standing, having received the thirty-second degree of the Scottish Rite. He has been a member of the school board in district No. 133 for more than twenty-five years, and in many other ways has rendered a public service to the community in which he has lived during these years.

JAMES S. WALLACE. — Bearing a family name that has been one of eminence in the history of Scotland, this well known citizen of Custer county may well take pride in claiming the land of hills and heather as the place of his nativity. Appreciative of the subtle attractions and undeniable opportunities offered in connection with practical journalism, Mr. Wallace has chosen the newspaper profession as his vocation, and the success which he has attained in this field of endeavor is shown forth in his well equipped establishment and the excellent business which he controls as editor and publisher of the Ansley Herald.

Mr. Wallace was born in Berwickshire, Scotland, on the 4th of November, 1884, and is a son of James and Isabelle (McNeish) Wallace, the former of whom passed his entire life in Scotland, where his widow still resides. Of their children John, Henry, and William still maintain their home in Scotland, and thus the subject of this review is the only representative of the immediate family in the United States. William was a gallant young soldier in the English forces on the great battlefields of France during a goodly portion of the time while the great world war was raging. The father was an earnest communicant of the established Church of England, as is also his widow, and in this ancient faith they carefully reared their sons. James Wallace devoted the major part of his active career to the great basic industry of agriculture, and his life was ordered upon the highest plane of integrity and usefulness.

James S. Wallace was reared under the sturdy discipline of the old home farm, and in his youth he was given the best of educational advantages — both in Edinburgh, Scotland, and Northumberland, England. Moved by ambition and a desire to emancipate himself from the life of a farmer, soon after attaining to his legal majority Mr. Wallace decided to leave his native land and try his fortunes in America. In 1906 he crossed the Atlantic and after remaining for a short time in Canada he made his way to Seattle, Washington. Later, in 1911, he came to Nebraska, and at Alliance, Box Butte county, he gained his initial experience in the newspaper and general printing business, through his connection with the Alliance Semi-Weekly Times, with which he continued his association three years.

As an independent newspaper publisher Mr. Wallace made his first venture when he purchased the plant and business of the Gilby Chronicle, at Gilby, North Dakota. He made a great success of this venture, and thus was led to seek a broader and more inviting field of journalistic exploitation. Accordingly, in June, 1918, he came to Ansley and purchased the Ansley Herald. He forthwith placed this paper on an upward climb, and the advancement has continued from that time to the present, with the result that the paper has become a potent influence in public affairs in this part of the county, an effective exponent of local interests, and a vehicle through which communal progress and prosperity are furthered. The Herald now has a circulation of nearly 800 copies weekly and is to be found in the representatives homes throughout the Ansley district of the county. The Herald ably champions the principles and policies of the Republican party and is a local political organ of no insignificant influence, the while it expresses the well fortified political views of its publisher. However, Mr. Wallace endeavors to give to his readers a fair, impartial, and unprejudiced view of all questions of interest, political and otherwise, and his paper merits classification among the model village publications of Nebraska, its columns giving effective summary of the latest news of general character, as well as a chronicle of local events and activities, and terse, well written editorials. The Herald has good support from the merchants and professional men of its community, and it is recognized as a good advertising medium. In connection with the newspaper plant is a well equipped job-printing department, in which first-class job printing of all kinds is executed. Mr. Wallace is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and he and his wife are members of the Christian church in their home village.

In June, 1915, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Wallace to Miss Elda Fern Bacon, who was born at Crab Orchard, Johnson county, Nebraska, and whose father, Royal Bacon, is an extensive landholder in Gage county, this state. Mrs. Wallace acquired her early education in the public schools at Cambridge, Furnas county, and supplemented this by attending Doan College, at Crete. Prior to her marriage she was a successful and popular teacher, as principal in the public schools of Alliance for several years. Russell, the only child of Mr. and Mrs. Wallace, was born November 2, 1917.

EDWARD M. SENNETT. — The interests of the Mason City locality in regard to the industries of farming and stock-raising are worthily and well represented by Edward M. Sennett, who has a well improved property in section 10, township 13, range 18. Coming to Custer county a stranger, in 1904, he soon won the esteem and confidence of those with whom his business brought him into contact, and from that time until the present his popularity and prosperity have steadily increased. Mr. Sennett was born in Washington county, Pennsylvania, August 21, 1857, and is a son of James B. and Ruth (Hall) Sennett.

The parents of Mr. Sennett, Pennsylvanians by birth and agriculturists by predilection and vocation, left their native state when Edward M. was still a small boy and took up their residence in Illinois, where they passed the rest of their lives as industrious farming people, rounding out honorable careers and becoming moderately successful. They were the parents of these children: Edward M., whose name introduces this article; John, who is engaged in farming near Mason City; Frank, who resides in Illinois and is a farmer; Harry and Charlie, who also are Illinois farmers; Mary, who is the wife of John Park, a farmer in Indiana; Lizzie, who is the wife of Patrick O'Connor; and Addie, who is the widow of Del Henderson.

Edward M. Sennett acquired his education in the public schools of Illinois, where he was reared on the home farm, and he remained under the parental roof until after he had attained his majority. He took up farming as a means of livelihood, having had all his training along that line, and after some years spent in the central west he decided to try his fortune in Nebraska, from which state he had received glowing reports. With excellent judgment, he chose Custer county as his stage of residence, and in 1904 he located upon his present property, not far from Mason City, in section 10, township 13, range 18. Since his arrival he has greatly enlarged his holdings and is now the owner of 320 acres, all in a good state of cultivation, with substantial buildings and modern equipment. Mr. Sennett is the fortunate possessor of just those qualities which are essential to success in the business of farming, and, having had much experience in his field of endeavor, he is accounted one of the able and progressive men of his vicinity. Mr. Sennett has not been active in public affairs, save as a good citizen. He and the members of his family belong to the Evangelical church.

In 1881 Mr. Sennett was united in marriage, in Illinois, to Miss Jane Whitman, and to this union there were born six children: George, a widower, who is engaged in farming in Illinois; John, who is deceased; Ed, who is assisting his father in the cultivation of the home acres; James, who married Hazel Hollenbach and is engaged in farming in Custer county; Ralph, who married Clara Jelinek, and also farms in this county; and Lida, who is the wife of Sid Hollenbach, owner of a Custer county farm.

HUBERT LEONARD, who is well known among the representative people of Custer county, is a prosperous general farmer residing on section 28, township 34. Mr. Leonard came to this county with his parents when he was a mere boy, and has lived here ever since. He was born in County Roscommon, Ireland, September 1, 1880, one of a family of ten children born to Hubert and Julia (Freeman) Leonard. Both parents were born in Ireland. They immigrated to the United States in 1888 and immediately came to Nebraska, where the father secured a homestead claim in Custer county, near Anselmo. This he developed and improved. In the spring of 1913 he removed with his family to Anselmo, and there his death occurred in November of the same year. His widow still makes her home in Anselmo. Of the ten children of the family the following are living: Mary is the wife of Thomas Teahon, a farmer living southwest of Anselmo; John, who is a farmer in the same neighborhood, married Lizzie Jacquot; Michael is engaged in the real-estate and insurance business at Anselmo; James G., who is in the abstract business in Broken Bow, married Nellie Reed; Patrick, who is postmaster of Anselmo, married Elsie Ross; Hubert is the immediate subject of this sketch; Bryan, who is a chiropractor practitioner and resides in Kansas, married Libbie Schmitz; and Charles, who is also a chiropractor, lives in Burke, South Dakota, and married Viola Reed. The father of the above family was a faithful member of the Roman Catholic church. In his political views he was a Democrat.

Hubert Leonard has been engaged in farming ever since his period of school attendance ended, and he has the reputation of being very successful in his agricultural undertakings, because of his practical and thorough methods and his sound judgment. Like his father before him, he is a Democrat in politics. He has never accepted any political favors but has served as school director of his district since 1917.

Mr. Leonard was married February 27, 1906, to Eleanore Holliday, who was born in Missouri, August 3, 1885, a daughter of Thomas C. and Catherine (Ray) Holliday, the former of whom was sheriff of Custer county two terms — 1894-1898. Mr. and Mrs. Leonard are members of the Catholic church. They have two children: Pearley, born February 23, 1907; and Violet, born November 1, 1911.

ROLAND ROHDE. — There are not a few instances among the agriculturists of Custer county where the men who are engaged in farming and stock-raising are operating properties upon which they were born and upon which they have passed their entire lives. This is particularly true, and naturally, among the members of the younger generation, many of whom have succeeded their fathers, who were homesteaders here but who have now turned over the responsibilities and labors to younger and stronger shoulders. In the class mentioned is found Roland Rohde, who is a progressive and enterprising young farmer and stock-raiser of township 71, in the Mason City community, and who has already achieved a remarkable success for one who has just passed his majority.

Roland Rohde belongs to a pioneer homesteading family of Custer county, and was born not far from Mason City, in 1897, a son of Albert Rohde, a sketch of whose career will be found elsewhere in this work. There were three sons in the family, and all have grown to be worthy, industrious, and honorable men. Frank, who is, at the time of this writing, with the American Expeditionary Forces fighting in France, was well known in his home county before being called to the colors, was a general favorite among his associates, and belonged to the local Grange and to the Evangelical church at Mason City. Herman, the other brother, is associated with Roland in the cultivation of the farm, and is a young, progressive and energetic farmer, an enthusiastic member of the Grange, the meetings of which he attends regularly, and a staunch Republican.

Roland Rohde was reared on the home farm and received his education in the public schools. Having resided on the home place all his life, he is thoroughly familiar with every detail of its operation and management, and now has a full partnership in the property, which comprises 640 acres, of which 400 acres are devoted to farming. He and his brother have been greatly interested and markedly successful in stock-raising, and in addition to pure-bred horses are engaged in raising Red Polled cattle and pure blooded Poland-China hogs. The property is splendidly equipped with modern buildings and other improvements, including an Overland automobile, a blacksmith shop with a complete set of tools, and a complete threshing machine outfit. Like his brother, Roland Rohde is a Republican. He is still numbered among the eligible bachelors of his native county.

JIM BAKER may well be cited as one of Custer county's old settlers, as forty years have rolled by since he came into the county in which he now owns 200 acres of fine land situated in section 25, within easy distance of Broken Bow. Mr. Baker was born in Iowa, September 5, 1869, and his parents were Thompson and Sarah (Huffman) Baker, who removed from Iowa to York county, Nebraska, in 1872. There were thirteen children in their family, a strong and sturdy stock, and of these the following are living: Frank, who is a farmer near Westerville, Nebraska, married Margaret Gardner; Tina, who is the widow of Charles Hare, lives at Ansley, Nebraska; Walter, who is a farmer in Custer county, married Lulu Nelms; Alice, who is the wife of Frank Hays, a farmer near Westerville; Kate, who is the widow of Austin Daniels, lives near Westerville; Hattie married William Gardner, a farmer, and they live near Morecroft Wyoming; Ralph, who is a traveling salesman, married Veila Lewis, and they reside at Alliance, Nebraska; Wesley N., who is a farmer in Custer county, married Amy Copey; May is the wife of John Dates, a farmer in Custer county; and Maud is the wife of Herbert Hollenbeck, a farmer near Westerville.

Jim Baker was three years old when his parents brought him to York county, Nebraska, and he was about nine years old when he came to Custer county, in the fall of 1878. He obtained his education in the Custer county schools and then learned the blacksmith trade, which he followed in conjunction with farming until 1903, since which time he has devoted himself to agricultural pursuits exclusively, carrying on mixed farming and cattle-raising. He has a valuable, well improved estate.

In May, 1899, Mr. Baker married Miss Lillie Ross, who was born in Illinois, and they have three children: Alice, who was born December 12, 1900; Verla, who was born August 5, 1902; and Roy, who was born June 22, 1904. All of the children remain at the parental home.

Mr. Baker is a Republican in his political views and is a loyal and public-spirited citizen. Wonderful changes have taken place since Mr. Baker came to Custer county, and he has done his part in developing the country.

PAUL J. HAUMONT, justice of the peace and representative citizen of Custer county, has been engaged in agricultural activities here ever since he completed his course of study in the State Agricultural College, at Lincoln. Mr. Haumont was born in Custer county, June 18, 1880. His parents were Edmund and Mary (Severyns) Haumont, both natives of now historic villages of Belgium, where his father was born in 1856 and his mother, April 27, 1848. It chanced that both came to the United States, the mother reaching this country in July, 1875, and the father two years later. To their subsequent marriage three children were born: Paul J., Eddie (deceased), and Sylvia, the one daughter being now the wife of Albert Kleeb, a farmer. Edmund Haumont was an intelligent man and in addition to being a capable farmer in Custer county he also became a citizen of the United States, one loyally interested in political sentiment. He voted first with the temporary Greenback party but afterward, until his death, January 7, 1917, with the Republican party. Both he and his wife were faithful members of the Roman Catholic church.

Paul J. Haumont grew up on his father's farm and attended the country schools. Later he took a course in the Nebraska Agricultural College, at Lincoln, the benefit of which discipline has been amply proved by the success that has attended the intelligent management of his farm, which he devotes to mixed farming and stock-raising. Although he is counted one of the best farmers in this section, he has not given all his time to personal undertakings but, through a hearty interest in the general welfare of his county, has informed himself concerning a good citizen's responsibilities, and has so gained the confidence of his fellow citizens thereby that, although independent in politics, he has been county clerk for four years and a justice of the peace for the same length of time.

Mr. Haumont was married in 1906 to Eva Polkingharn, who is a daughter of Douglas and Eliza (Gerrett) Polkingharn, and they have the following children: Violet, born April 10, 1907; Thomas, born May 4, 1908; Lee, born February 8, 1910; Arthur, born October 25, 1912; Grace, born January 25, 1916.

PETER R. PEDERSON, who has been a resident of Custer county for thirty-three years and is well and favorably known in every direction, is an extensive raiser of fine stock, to which industry he mainly devotes his many acres of well improved land. Mr. Pederson was born in Denmark, February 18, 1861. His parents were S. M. and Anna (Jensen) Pederson, who were people of some consequence in Denmark before coming to America. They were highly esteemed in their own community and were leading members of the Lutheran church.

S. M. Pederson came to the United States in 1869 and in New York he followed his trade of mason and contractor about one year. He then sent for his family and they established their home soon afterward in Oconomowoc, Wisconsin. From that place Mr. Pederson was sent as one of the commissioners assigned to the service of effecting and arranging for a Danish colonization in the Oconomowoc district. From different sections of Denmark the new settlers came in a body, and they became fully assimilated in the civic and industrial life of the Badger state—the founders of families that are to-day numbered among the best and most prosperous in Wisconsin, the while representatives of these families have also become worthily identified with the citizenship of various other states of the Union. The year 1870 was that in which the wife and seven children of Mr. Pederson joined him in New York, and after the removal to Wisconsin he did a considerable amount of building, as a contracting mason, as did he later in Chicago, he having removed to that metropolis in the autumn of 1871. Later he became a resident of Howard county, Nebraska. Concerning the surviving children of this sterling citizen the following brief record is consistently entered at this juncture: Lizzie is the widow of Quinn Kirkpatrick and resides in the city of Seattle, Washington; Minnie is the wife of Jens Jensen, who is engaged in the lumber business at Bellingham, Washington; Peter R. is the immediate subject of this sketch; Mary is the wife of Hans Jensen, a railroad engineer, and they reside at Cheyenne, Wyoming; and Yetta, who is the widow of George Raymond, resides at Everett, Washington.

Peter R. Pederson obtained his educational training in the public schools of Grand Island, Nebraska, and remained in Howard county until 1883. He was a clerk in the postoffice at Grand Island for one year and then spent a year at Carbon, Wyoming. From Wyoming he came to Custer county in 1885, and he has remained here ever since. Here he is to-day the owner of a section of well improved land. He bought a brother's claim and also filed on a claim for himself, and all this land, substantially improved, returns adequate income. His home place is in section 23, township 34.

In 1887 Peter R. Pederson was united in marriage with Emily J. Cudmore, who was born February 12, 1876. Her parents were Edward W. and Sarah J. Cudmore, and they came to Nebraska from Canada, both being natives of Toronto. Concerning the children of Mr. and Mrs. Pederson the following data are available: Soren M., who was born January 19, 1899, entered the United States service in connection with the nation's participation in the great world war. As a member of Company H, Third Engineers Corps, he received training at Camp Humphrey, Virginia, and he was serving in Company C, One-Hundred and Twenty-second Regiment of Engineers, at the time when the war came to a close. Elsie, who was born September 27, 1900, is a student in the Nebraska State Normal School at Kearney. John Clifton, who was born September 7, 1902, died on the 11th of September, 1916. Marmion, who was born July 30, 1904, and Esther, who was born March 7, 1908, remain at the parental home and are attending the public schools.

In politics Mr. Pederson gives his allegiance to the Democratic party, and his religious faith is that of the Lutheran church, his wife being a member of the Methodist Episcopal church

CHESTER SAMS, who is one of Custer county's excellent farmers and whose experience in connection with farm enterprise covers many years, is the owner of well cultivated land in section 24, township 17, in the vicinity of Berwyn.

Chester Sams was born in Bremer county, Iowa, on the 1st of August, 1874, and is the younger of the two children of John L. and Cora R. (Terry) Sams. The death of the mother occurred February 25, 1879 and the elder of her two children is Charles A., who married Miss Irene Carl and who is a prosperous farmer in Custer county. The second marriage of John L. Sams occurred in Polk county, Nebraska, where, on the 30th of December, 1883, he wedded Florence A. Hornback. Two sons were born of this union: Roy B., who married Goldie Sampson, of Custer county, is engaged in farming in this county, and James L., who married Hattie M. Powell, is a farmer near Payette, Idaho. Mrs. Florence A. (Hornback) Sams died October 29, 1907.

In March, 1895, John L. Sams settled on a farm near Weissert, Custer county, and here he and his wife united with the Methodist Episcopal church, with which they continued their identification until 1904, when they transferred their membership to the Church of God.

Chester Sams was young at the time of the family removal to Nebraska, and here he has continuously resided to the present time. He obtained his youthful education in the public schools of Polk county, this state, and throughout his entire active career he has been closely identified with farm enterprise. In his farm operations he is vigorous and progressive and he is one of the valued citizens of the Berwyn vicinity.

On the 29th of March, 1903, was recorded the marriage of Mr. Sams to Miss Sadie Franklin, who was born in Otoe county, Nebraska, May 5, 1882, and who is a daughter of William and Ann (Eve) Franklin, both natives of England. Mr. Franklin died in 1910, at Mason City, Custer county, where his widow still resides. The names and respective dates of birth of the children of Mr. and Mrs. Sams are here entered: Thelma V., February 3, 1904; Rosa M., August 10, 1907; Edith O., November 26, 1913; Esther Ann, February 22, 1915; and John, August 13, 1916. The older children are attending school.

HARVEY B. ANDREWS.—Few of the pioneer residents of Nebraska passed through more thrilling experiences, faced greater hardships, overcame more obstacles, and gained greater results than did the late Harvey B. Andrews, whose death occurred at Anselmo, May 8, 1916. His life was typical of the courageous, persevering spirit which brought about the settlement, civilizing, and development of the West, and his career was one in which he rose from obscurity to prominence and wealth. In the early days, when Custer county was still on the frontier, he drove stage, fought Indians, and shot buffalo and other wild game; later he became a large landholder and one of the most successful ranchmen of the central part of Nebraska, and subsequently he applied his keen business acumen and foresight to the direction of financial and other institutions, to their great and lasting benefit—and in each capacity, in each community, and in each field of endeavor he steadfastly maintained a recognized reputation for integrity and honor of the strictest kind.

Mr. Andrews was a resident of Broken Bow at the time of his death, and a local paper gave the following statement of the passing of this honored pioneer: "In the midst of a cheerful conversation, and while seated at dinner in the home of W. S. Tupper, at Anselmo, Monday at 12:30 P. M., H. B. Andrews, one of Custer county's best known citizens, suddenly ceased to breathe. His death was a decided shock to the community, and though he had been ailing for a year or more, the past six months had shown such marked improvement in his condition that he was thought for the time to be out of danger."

Harvey B. Andrews was born in Alleghany county, Virginia, January 22, 1849, the sixth order of birth in a family of six sons and four daughters. His parents, William and Elizabeth (Oliver) Andrews, also were natives of the Old Dominion, where they were married, reared their children, and passed their entire lives. Of their children four sons and one daughter still live in that state.

Harvey B. Andrews was educated in the public schools and was reared a farmer, remaining under the parental roof until 1874, in March of which year, in company with a party of about nine other youths of his neighborhood, he set out for the west, with the vicinity of New Helena, Nebraska, as his destination. The Union Pacific Railroad carried the little party as far as Kearney, where they hired a team and wagon and, with a driver, continued on their journey through Loup City, Sherman county, and on into the territory of Custer—along the north side of Middle Loup river until reaching a point opposite the mouth of Victoria creek. Blocked by the river, they set about the difficult task of fording the stream, in which the wagon was taken to pieces and floated across and the stronger men carried the weaker ones. It fell to Mr. Andrews' lot to carry across Charles Mathews, who in later years, as county judge of Custer county and one of the best known men in central Nebraska, frequently related the interesting story. After fording the creek, the party continued to follow it along the east side until reaching Victoria Springs, where Messrs. Andrews and Mathews were the only ones of the nine to make a permanent settlement. Mr. Mathews took a pre-emption where the springs gushed out of the creek, while Mr. Andrews selected his claim a little further up-stream, this later becoming the Bowley farm.

In the fall of 1877 Mr. Andrews made a homestead entry in Cedar canyon, this tract covering the principal part of the little cedar forest there, and being very valuable because of the timber. Some of the cabins erected from logs taken from this canyon still stand on Victoria creek. Mr. Andrews and Mr. Mathews, as the original settlers of that neighborhood, in later years exchanged reminiscences of the time when game was plentiful and the Indians hostile. During his residence there Mr. Andrews killed deer and antelope by the hundreds, as well as one buffalo, and for ten years his family had no other kind of meat, while the family residence was first a log house and later a soddy. As early as 1874 Mr. Andrews worked at freighting from Grand Island to Fort Hartseff, the military post above Ord, thus demonstrating the fact that in the new country he was willing to accept any kind of honorable employment that promised sufficient emolument so that he could better his condition. In 1877 he accepted the dangerous position of driving stage in the Black Hills, and he held that post from April 1st to September, at a time when the Indians, on the war-path, frequently followed him. Just before his run the driver of the stage was killed by hostile Indians, and on one occasion Mr. Andrews, with his stage, came upon the mutilated bodies of two men and women who had been massacred by the redskins. It is to be imagined that for many years Mr. Andrews had anything but a friendly feeling toward the Indians. In the early days, in connection with frontier life, he had other experiences which taxed his strength and courage. At the time of the great blizzard of January 12, 1888, still well remembered by the "old-timers," he had been in Broken Bow, and left the train at Anselmo, where he endeavored to get a liveryman to take him home, offering five dollars—a large sum in those days—for the six-mile trip to New Helena. However, no one would venture out in such a storm, and, purchasing a lantern, Mr. Andrews, in the face of remonstrances by the residents of Anselmo, started out along the wire fence. By the time he had reached the end of it, he had convinced himself that he was equal to the task of braving and defeating the storm, and about ten o'clock he reached his home, thoroughly frightening Mrs. Andrews, by his arrival at such an hour on such a night. At the time of the blizzard of October 15, 1880, which continued three days, he had just returned from Dismal river, where he had a large bunch of cattle, but with the early frontiersman's sagacity he had felt the coming of the great storm and had hurried home.

Mr. Andrews was a man who made the most of his opportunities—one whose splendid judgment and foresight and fine business abilities won him success and prominence. He accumulated some 7,000 or 8,000 acres of valuable land, on which he conducted large farming, stock-raising, and ranching operations, and later he entered business and financial circles, in which he gained like success. In the fall of 1911 he and his family left their ranch home at Anselmo and retired to a farm adjoining the eastern suburbs of Broken Bow, and there Mr. Andrews lived quietly until his death. He was originally a Democrat, but later took an independent stand regarding public questions and candidates, but was no office-seeker himself. However, he was always ready to discharge his responsibilities, and for some time served on the county board as supervisor from the Victoria district. He was a leading Mason, being a member of Broken Bow blue lodge, the chapter and commandery, and also being affiliated with Tanager Temple of the Mystic Shrine, at Omaha. With Mrs. Andrews and their daughter, Lilly, he held membership in the Order of the Eastern Star.

On September 29, 1878, Mr. Andrews was united in marriage with Miss Jennie Loughran, daughter of Thomas and Elizabeth (Morrow) Loughran, of Loup City, to whose home Mr. Andrews had made a trip in 1876. Mrs. Andrews' parents were natives of Ireland, and her father immigrated to Canada when he was but fifteen years of age. There he married and there his first wife died. In 1874 he made a trip of inspection to Nebraska, and in 1876 he brought his family here for a permanent residence. He died here in his eighty-sixth year. Mrs. Loughran had been married first in Ireland, and was twenty years of age when she started for Canada with her husband and child, both of whom died soon after landing, of what was known as "ship fever," now supposed by many to be the deadly typhus fever. Although her father sent her money to return to Ireland, she was independent, and was working for a wage of fifty cents per week, saving her money for her passage, when she met and married Mr. Loughran. Later they came to Nebraska, where she passed away some time before the death of her husband. They were the parents of four children: James, who is a farmer of Gates, Nebraska; Mary, who is the widow of W. H. McCowin, of Curtis, Nebraska; Alice, who is the widow of J. L. Vinnedge, of Taylor, this state; and Jennie, who is the widow of the subject of this memoir. Mr. Loughran was a Catholic and Mrs. Loughran a member of the Presbyterian church.

Of the children born to the union of Mr. and Mrs. Andrews, seven survive: Mary is the wife of R. F. Aldrich, living on a farm near Broken Bow; Charles H. is connected with the large real-estate firm of Wood Brothers, at Lincoln, Nebraska; Jennie is the wife of John A. Mack, of New Helena, a farmer; Lilly B. is the wife of Joe M. Downey, a stockman near Anselmo; Alice is the wife of C. Ernest Crouch, a farmer and stock-raiser, and they live with Mrs. Andrews; Fannie is attending school at York; and Stella Minerva is attending school at Broken Bow. Mrs. Andrews still survives her husband and resides at the pleasant and comfortable modern home in the suburbs of Broken Bow, where she always extends a hospitable welcome to her many friends, whether they be of the modern times or of the days of the frontier, when she assisted her husband so ably in his struggle to obtain a foothold in the new country where in later years he was destined to become such an important figure.

FRED H. ARTHUR.—A pronounced study in contrast among the upbuilders of Custer county is presented in the career of Fred H. Arthur. His twentieth century status is represented by the ownership of large tracts of land, and between the laborenslaving and poverty-clouded days of the past and those of the prosperous present, he has encountered many varied and developing experiences, the very existence of which stamps him as a man of courage, initiative, and purpose. Mr. Arthur was born at Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, May 14, 1859, and is a son of Horace and Mary (Green) Arthur.

Homer Arthur, the paternal grandfather of Fred H. Arthur, was born in the state of New York, where he spent the greater part of his life, but finally he moved to Wisconsin, and thereafter to Iowa, where he died at the age of ninety years. He married Miss Fannie Higby, who was related to ex-Governor Bradford of New York and was descended from Revolutionary stock. Horace Arthur was born in Lewis county, New York, in 1828, and there he married Miss Mary Green, who was born in 1830, in that same county, and who was a daughter of James and Hannah Green, the former of whom died in Wisconsin, in 1858, and the latter in 1869, both being natives of the Empire state. Shortly after their marriage, Mr. and Mrs. Horace Arthur went to Wisconsin, making the voyage via the Erie Canal and the Great Lakes to Chicago and thence proceeding by stage coach to Wisconsin. There Mr. Arthur took up government land and engaged in farming. He was making a success of his operations when the Civil war interrupted his peaceful career. As a loyal and patriotic citizen he enlisted as a member of a Wisconsin regiment of volunteer infantry, and he was with his command in camp in Indiana when he was suddenly taken sick with typhoid fever, his death occurring soon after his return to Wisconsin, in 1863. He was a Democrat in politics, and his religious faith was that of the Congregational church, as was also that of Mrs. Arthur, who survived until 1915, and died in Iowa. They were the parents of six children, of whom three are living: Charles M., who is a retired resident of Webster City, Iowa; Fred H., whose name introduces this sketch; and Minnie, who is the widow of Frank Wilson, and is a resident of Webster City, Iowa.

The district schools of Iowa, to which state he was taken after the death of his father, furnished Fred H. Arthur with his early education, this being supplemented by one year's attendance in a business college at Webster City. His life work was then commenced as a farmer in the Hawkeye state. He remained in that state until 1887, when he and his brother went to South Dakota and took up land, remaining there seven years. Following this, Mr. Arthur came to Custer county, where, in 1894, he bought land. He has since added to his holdings until he now has 520 acres in his own property, all well improved, said improvement having been made by himself. In addition to his own land, he is the owner of the property which formerly belonged to his wife's father, and both farms have splendid buildings and other improvements. When he started upon his career he had absolutely nothing to assist him save his own initiative, determination, and resolute purpose, and with these fortifying characteristics and good management he won success. His judgment led him to make a specialty of live-stock for a number of years. This venture turned out prosperously, and a good grade of stock is still raised upon his farms, although alfalfa is the principal product at this time. Mr. Arthur retired from the farm in January, 1917, and since then has been living quietly in his modern residence at Broken Bow.

In the year 1889, at Broken Bow, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Arthur to Miss Alta B. King, a daughter of George W. and Emily (Green) King, natives of the state of New York. Mr. King came with his family to Custer county, Nebraska, in 1886. Here he entered claim to a homestead and set himself vigorously to the developing of a productive farm. Sterling citizens of the county, he and his wife here passed the remainder of their lives. Mr. King died in January, 1908, his wife having passed away July 17, 1890. They became the parents of four children, concerning whom the following brief data may consistently be entered at this juncture: Emma, who was born in the state of New York, July 13, 1849, became the wife of Robert Ledwith, a farmer in Custer county, and her death occurred May 25, 1917. Edgar Howard, who was born January 29, 1852, in Wisconsin, died March 6, 1897. He married Ida Burnham and they had one child, Horace B. Frank E., who was born September 13, 1854, became a locomotive engineer in the service of the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad, died on the 19th of January, 1895. Alta Bell, wife of the subject of this sketch, was born September 28, 1859. Captain George W. King, father of Mrs. Arthur, was one of the gallant sons of the nation who went forth in defense of the Union when the Civil war was precipitated. At the inception of the war he enlisted as a private in Company H, Thirty-second Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and through valiant and efficient service he won consecutive promotion and was captain of his company when the war came to its close. He participated in many engagements, including a number of the important battles marking the progress of the great conflict, and was with the forces of General Sherman on the historic march from Atlanta to the sea.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur have one son, George E., who now has active charge of the father's fine farm property in Custer county. The maiden name of his wife was Frances Shirley, and they have one child — Louise.

Fred H. Arthur is a Republican in politics, and on his party ticket he was elected township assessor, an office of which he was the efficient incumbent during a period of seven consecutive years. He is affiliated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

JACOB M. CASE, who has spent the greater part of his life as a farmer in Custer county, Nebraska, is a representative of a well known and highly respected pioneer family of this section and is a substantial farmer living on section 11, township 17, not far distant from Berwyn. Jacob M. Case was born in Ringgold county, Iowa, August 25, 1874. He is the eldest of four children born to Peter M. and Ellen (Wray) Case. They were natives of Indiana, from which state they moved to Iowa. From the latter state they came to Nebraska and they reached Custer county in October, 1888. They came overland, in pioneer style, and the father bought a relinquishment and developed the property into a fine farm. He now lives retired at Weissert. The mother died in December, 1893, her children all surviving, namely:

Jacob M. is the subject of this review; Luther S. conducts a Salvation Army store in Peoria, Illinois; Arthur G., who is a farmer near Monte Vista, Colorado, married Ida Leck; Guy W. is connected with the Salvation Army unit that has been doing noble work in war-ravaged France.

Jacob M. Case was fourteen years old when he accompanied his parents to Custer county. He had already received a district-school education in his native state. The settlers of thirty years ago in Custer county found many hardships to contend with, but Mr. Case and his father had not expected anything otherwise for a time, and gradually, through their industry and good management, the home property became productive and increasingly valuable. As years passed Mr. Case's younger brothers left the farm for other avenues of usefulness, but he has always remained a farmer and has the reputation of being a very competent one.

Mr. Case was married March 4, 1899, to Hattie W. Perkins, and of their seven children five are living: Daisy B., born February 18, 1900; Everett A., born March 6, 1903; Gladys M., born March 2, 1906; Glenn B., born October 9, 1909; and Donald M., born January 16, 1917. All of the children remain at the parental home. Mr. and Mrs. Case are members of the Methodist Episcopal church. In politics he is a Republican.

ROY B. SAMS, who is a general farmer living on section 14, township 17, Custer county, belongs to a well known pioneer family of the state and one of agricultural importance in Custer county. He was born in Polk county, Nebraska, October 5, 1885, and is a son of John L. and Florence A. (Hornback) Sams. His mother died October 29, 1907. He has one brother, James L., who is a farmer near Payette, Idaho, and two half-brothers by his father's first marriage, these being Charles A. and Chester, both of whom are good farmers and substantial citizens of Custer county. John L. Sams came to Nebraska from Iowa, and eventually he established his residence in Custer county, where, in March, 1895, he settled on a farm near Weissert. There he and his wife united with the Methodist Episcopal church, of which they continued members until 1904, when they transferred their membership to the Church of God.

Roy B. Sams attended the public schools through his boyhood days and then began to learn the practical duties that make up the life of a farmer. His land is cultivated carefully and intelligently and yields abundantly.

Mr. Sams was married September 29, 1910, to Goldie Sampson, a daughter of James and Ida (Tiff) Sampson, the former of whom was born in Denmark, January 24, 1855, and is a sailor. The mother of Mrs. Sams died February 20, 1907. Mr. and Mrs. Sams have two children but only one survives, Lawrence LeRoy, who was born July 1, 1911. Mr. Sams is a Democrat in politics.

WILLIAM T. CLOUSE.—One of the substantial farmers of Custer county is the reliable citizen whose name initiates this paragraph. He came to Custer county in an early day, and experienced all of the hardships and trials incident to pioneer life in the period of the '80s, when the conveniences of the present day were vague dreams of the future.

Mr. Clouse is a native of Pennsylvania, in which state he was born July 24, 1856. His parents were H. V. Clouse and Barbara (Metz) Clouse, whose birth dates from 1811. In the family of H. V. Clouse were ten children: Susan, Herman, and Ella are deceased; Philip lives in Yale, Iowa; Floyd lives in Pennsylvania, the state of the family nativity; William T. is the Custer county citizen around whose career the incidents of these paragraphs cluster; Katy is deceased; Theodore is in Iowa; Davis still clings to Pennsylvania, where he has his home; and Samuel was living in Iowa when last heard from.

During the Civil war the family of H. V. Clouse, lived close to the historic Mason and Dixon Line, and one of the experiences that fell to their lot during those trying years was the burning of their home, an event which the younger members of the family will never forget.

William T. Clouse was married in his native state in 1877, to Sarah Repogle, who is a daughter of David and Rosanna (Zook) Repogle, both of the Keystone state. Mr. and Mrs. Clouse became the parents of nine children, eight of whom are still living: David, resides at Squirrel, Idaho; Henry is located in Sumner, Nebraska; Charles lives in Stapleton, this state; Reuben resides in Eddyville, Dawson county; Rosanna is deceased; Alice is the wife of Horace Austin, a farmer in Custer county; Raymond answered the call of his country and is in the service of the government, as a member of a field-artillery company; Nettie is the wife of Elmer Freeze, a prosperous farmer in Dawson county; and George Washington is attending school in Sumner.

Mr. and Mrs. Clouse came to Nebraska in 1886, and he pre-empted eighty acres in Buffalo county, but later homesteaded in Custer. At the present time the family lands consist of 240 acres well improved and in a high state of cultivation. Upon this land a general farming and stock-raising business is conducted. The home to-day stands in striking contrast with the sod house which was built in the early day and in which Mr. and Mrs. Clouse lived for twenty-one years. During the first years of their residence in Custer county they had to ford the river in order to reach either Ansley or Broken Bow, to which places their produce had to be hauled. At the time Mr. Clouse filed on his claim he made the entire trip to Grand Island and return with nothing to eat. These are only a few of the incidents through which he and his wife passed during the trying times of the early days. The blizzard of January 12, 1880, has left a lasting impression upon their memories. Mr. Clouse went to the schoolhouse that evening for his boys. He left one of the boys at the home of a neighbor, and he and the older son faced the blizzard. After a hard struggle and strenuous battling, they succeeded in reaching their home—a trip both will remember as long as they live. The Clouse family are very excellent people, well rated by their neighbors, and they enjoy the confidence of all who know them. They are connected with the Brethren church.

HARRY WOODRUFF is distinctively a Nebraska product. Here he was born, here he was reared and educated, here he married, and here he has lived his life until the present time. He belongs to a family which is well known in the county and which is highly respected for its contribution to civic and material progress and prosperity.

Mr. Woodruff was born in Hamilton county, Nebraska, September 4, 1872, and in 1876, he came with his father into the pioneer section of Custer county. Here he was educated in the common schools, and here he received the qualification which enables him at the present time to conduct successfully all matters of business pertaining to farm and stock transactions.

He married Miss Fannie Judge, a daughter of James Judge, who came to Nebraska from Illinois. As a result of this union four children were born, all of whom are still living and make up a family circle of which any home might be proud. The first, Mildred, is the wife of Otto Johnson, a farmer who makes his home in Sumner. The second born, Leo, is still at home and assisting in farm operations, Eugene is the contribution of the family's patriotic spirit to the services of the government. He is a member of the Forty-eighth Balloon Corps, stationed at Omaha, at the time of this writing. Frank, the youngest, is attending high school at Broken Bow and is a member of the senior class. When he entered the high school he was the youngest student in the school.

Mr. Woodruff owns 160 acres of well improved land, splendidly equipped for successful farming, and on this he maintains his pleasant farm home. In social circles he has been active and prominent. He is a member of the Royal Highlanders, a fraternal insurance organization very popular in the middle west. He is a member and generous supporter of the Catholic church. He is also a member of the Knights of Columbus, to the war-work of which organization he has always been a liberal contributor.

Speaking of early days, Mr. Woodruff recalls that in the years gone by he hunted deer on the old home place and often stalked wild game in the immediate vicinity of his present home.

The Woodruffs are splendid people, and well merit the high esteem of their friends and neighbors. Custer county is the richer by the life efforts of this estimable family.

JOSEPH KAELIN, whose well improved farm is situated in section 13, township 17, with convenient market facilities at Berwyn, is not a native of the great state of Nebraska, but has been favorably known here for over a quarter of a century. He was born in Switzerland, November 15, 1868, and is a son of Joseph and Mary (Kaelin) Kaelin, who passed their entire lives in Switzerland, and who were faithful members of the Roman Catholic church. The father followed the trade of shoemaker.

Joseph Kaelin was twenty-three years old when he came to the United States with the intention of making this country his future home. He was a well educated young man in his own language and very quickly acquired a working knowledge of the English tongue. He reached Pawnee county, Nebraska, in 1891, and remained there three years. He then came to the neighborhood of Ansley, in Custer county, and has followed farming ever since. In 1901 he bought his present well improved farm and here he is engaged in mixed farming and stock-raising, his persistent industry and thorough methods making his farm enterprise very generally profitable.

Mr. Kaelin was married in January, 1899, to Ida Spoerri, who was born in Switzerland, August 1, 1869, a daughter of Jacob and Annie B. (Keller) Spoerri, neither of whom ever came to America. Mrs. Kaelin has two brothers still living in Switzerland—Carl J. and Jacob J. Her father was a watchmaker by trade, and both he and his wife belonged to the church at Zwingle. Of the six children of Mr. and Mrs. Kaelin five are living, as follows: Emma, born November 23, 1899; Joseph, born June 12, 1901; Frank, born August 23, 1904; George, born October 27, 1908; and Doris, born August 27, 1911. Mr. Kaelin and his family belong to the Catholic church at Ansley. He has never been very active in politics but gives his support to the Republican party.

U. S. HORN.—One of the respected citizens of the South Loup country, prominent throughout his community, is U. S. Horn, whose life achievement is an asset to the history of the county.

Mr. Horn was born in Nemaha county, this state, August 20, 1868, and is a son of John and Harriet (Ralston) Horn. His father, who is still living, was eighty-three years of age on the 4th day of July, 1918. The mother has passed to her reward. John Horn and his wife were the parents of eleven children, and concerning those now living, the following brief record is given: Mrs. Ann (Horn) Green lives in Montana; Mrs. Alice Branstiter is a widow, and she resides at Lomax, Custer county; Charles is a farmer, and resides in the vicinity of his brother, U. S. Horn; U. S. Horn, the fourth of the family group, is the subject of this sketch; John Milton Horn is a Custer county farmer and citizen; Mrs. Elsie (Horn) Sapp lives in Nemaha county; and Orley likewise resides in Nemaha county.

The early years of U. S. Horn were spent in Nemaha county, where he passed through the common schools, and secured a good fundamental education. He was married December 24, 1889, to Miss Fannie Jewell, whose family was prominent in Nemaha county. Mrs. Horn is a native of that county, where her early years were spent and where she had the same opportunities for education as did her husband.

In the family circle of the Horns are six children, all of whom are at home, where they assist in farm work and enjoy the advantages of splendid schools. They are. Claret, Melvin, Blanche, Leo, Floyd, and Clyde.

Mr. and Mrs. Horn came to Custer county too late for pioneer experiences, but not too late to contribute their sterling worth to the citizenship of the county at the present day. It was 1904 when they moved in, bought the place on which they now live and commenced practical farming operations. They had been farmers in Nemaha county and withal were very successful. They succeeded in securing a good foundation and what might be called a splendid start before they sold their Nemaha possessions and repurchased in Custer county. Accordingly they were better fixed when they came to the county than were most of the people who make their home in this central part of the state. But the greatest asset they brought with them was indomitable spirit, good judgment, and industry. With these they commenced their Custer county home. For a time Mr. Horn rented his father's land, and he made it profitable both to himself and his father. The home place to-day is one of the attractive farm properties on the South Loup, with a modern and comfortable house and all else to constitute a well equipped stock and grain farm. All these improvements are the result of the labors of Mr. and Mrs. Horn.

In social affairs Mr. Horn is a prominent Mason and Odd Fellow. Both he and his wife are highly respected citizens and neighbors and have a large circle of friends who delight in the good fortune that has come to them in their western home. Custer's county can well be proud of such citizens.

HARTFORD R. BRACHEAR, who, during a long and successful career, has followed various occupations in several parts of Nebraska, is now a well known resident of Franklin county, although his operations are by no means confined to the borders of that county. During his residence in this state, he has been in turn, and together, blacksmith, farmer, stockman, and auctioneer, and in his several fields his versatility has assisted him to well deserved prosperity. He is a native of Illinois, and was born December 14, 1867, his parents being Aaron R. and Ellen E. (Kelso) Brachear.

Aaron R. Brachear was born February 3, 1840, in Logan county, Illinois, and there grew to manhood and adopted the vocation of farming. With the formation of the Republican party he became an ardent supporter of its principles, and later was an advocate of the cause of freedom for the slaves. He enlisted in 1862, in Company B, One Hundred and Sixth Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and in November, 1863, at Jackson, Tennessee, he was joined by his wife, who was unwilling to be longer separated from him. She traveled with his regiment until the close of the war, acting in the capacity of nurse, and did not leave the service until he had received his honorable discharge, at the close of hostilities, at which time she returned with him to the farm in Illinois. Both had splendid records for bravery and fidelity to duty. In 1870 Aaron R. Brachear decided to try his fortunes in the west, and November 15 of that year, with his wife and two small sons, Montford H., and Hartford R., he started from Taylorville, Illinois, and came to Saline county, Nebraska, traveling overland by the prairie-schooner route and arriving at his destination four weeks later. The family settled on a homestead three miles north of the present site of Friend, Nebraska, where Mr. Brachear became a prominent hog and cattle dealer, following this vocation as a seller on the market for eighteen years. He was widely and favorably known in business circles as a man of integrity, and he and his wife were devout members of the Christian church. Beside their sons they were the parents of a daughter, now Mrs. Laura M. Butcher. For the past twenty years Mrs. Brachear has made her home with her son Hartford R.

Hartford R. Brachear was educated in the public schools and reared to agricultural pursuits. He was brought up in a home which should have satisfied any boy of his years, but, like some other youths, he developed a roving disposition, and when sixteen years old he suddenly took the notion to earn his own living and spend his money as he pleased. With this end in view, he arrived in a railroad camp, looking for employment, and three days later he was not only covered with glory but with various specimens of the insect world, the names of which are seldom mentioned in polite society, but a name for which has been coined by the fighting men in France, who refer to them as "cooties." Needless to say, young Brachear was glad to make his way home, a sadder but wiser young man, and cheerfully to take up the work of the farm, prosaic and lacking in adventure though it might be. In addition to general farming and raising stock, Mr. Brachear carried on a successful blacksmith business for a number of years, and eventually developed inherent powers for the business of auctioneering, one of the difficult vocations which necessitates the possession of peculiar talents. He has followed these three vocations with good success, and at present is the owner of a valuable farm, under stages of development, which is located in the vicinity of Wauneta, Chase county, this state, on the Frenchman river.

Mr. Brachear was married September 7, 1898, at Hastings, Nebraska, to Miss Geneva H. McCartney, daughter of James McCartney, and to this union there have been born four children: Mon. D., who is assisting his father in the development of the farm; Olga B., who is a high school student; Ora Ellen, who is a student in the graded schools; and Opal Ruby, who is the baby of the family. Mr. and Mrs. Brachear are consistent members of the Christian church. He is fraternally identified with the Modern Woodmen of America, and his political support is given to the Democratic party, although he is not a politician and has not cared for public office.

PAUL E. CAVENEE is one of the young farmers of Custer county who has the major part of his career yet before him, and he belongs to that class of young men who are the sturdy and substantial scions of the pioneer generation, and upon whom the burdens of the present day are resting.

Mr. Cavenée was born May 22, 1891, in Custer county, and is in every sense of the word a Custer product. His parents, John E. and Alice (Smith) Cavenée, were pioneers of the late '70s, and the family name has long been familiar throughout the county, in connection with public affairs and general civic and industrial interests.

John E. and Alice (Smith) Cavenée became the parents of two children, and the subject of this sketch is the one surviving. The father was a native of Ohio and he lived in the prairie district of the Buckeye state until the call of the west enticed him to move, and, when once started with his face towards the setting sun, he never stopped until he struck the South Loup country in Custer county. This was in 1878. Mr. Cavenée arrived with practically nothing except energy and determination. To-day the Cavenée holdings comprise 1,040 acres of splendid land, well improved and in a high state of cultivation.

Paul E. Cavenée ran the ordinary gamut of a Custer county youth, save that he had better opportunities for education than are accorded the majority. After finishing the country school he attended the Broken Bow high school and from there went to Kearney, where he took a normal and business course.

In December, 1917, Paul Cavenée married Mrs. Elizabeth Stairs, of Oconto, she being of splendid parentage and being a very estimable, and gracious lady. Mr. Cavenée conducts farming operations on a somewhat extensive scale and is raising all kinds of stock, with which he is making a decided success. His father's farm and also leased land, known as the Campbell place, constitute the ranch property he is operating.

Both Mr. Cavenée and his father are prominent in fraternal circles, the father expending most of his activities in the Knights of Pythias. Paul E. is a member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and in the time-honored Masonic fraternity he has received the thirty-second degree of the Scottish Rite. The family's religious affiliations are with the Presbyterian church.

Opportunity and years are before Mr. and Mrs. Cavenée, and their friends prophesy splendid things for them in the oncoming years.

JOHN R. ALLEN.—Industry, self-reliance, and a capacity for painstaking labor have contributed to the present prosperity of John R. Allen, a well known Custer county farmer, and will doubtless have much to do with his future usefulness and permanent success. For many years a follower of the trade of carpenter, of more recent years he has turned his attention to agricultural pursuits, and at present he is the owner of a fine farm and beautiful home, located two miles northwest of Oconto.

John R. Allen was born in Lincolnshire, England, January 15, 1861, a son of William and Martha (Swan) Allen. The family came to the United States in 1871 and settled in Mahaska county, Iowa, where the father continued to be engaged in farming during the remainder of his life. There were three sons and four daughters in the family, and of these children four still survive: John R., Mrs. Eliza Thompson, William, and Mrs. Mattie Shelby.

When he was a small lad in England, John R. Allen could not be kept in school, as his studies were distasteful to him, and his father, desiring to teach him a lesson, hired him out to a neighbor to do chores, at a wage of three shillings a week. His mother permitted him to keep this money the first week, and the eight-year-old lad immediately spent it for the first knife that he ever owned. It is to be recorded that he lost the knife before sundown of the same day. He was ten years old when the family came to the United States, and grew up in Mahaska county, Iowa, where he completed his education in the public schools and where he worked for some years on his father's farm. He remained under the parental roof until 1880, in which year his mother died, and he left home and began to learn the carpenter's trade, at which he spent two years, during which time he received his board and seventy-five cents a day. He continued to apply himself industriously to the carpenter trade, and in 1905 bought a farm of 240 acres, two miles northwest of Oconto, although he did not locate thereon until 1908. Since the latter year he has been engaged in farming, and he now has a beautiful home, of which he is justly proud, in section 25, township 60. He uses modern methods in his work and his property shows the beneficial results accruing from intelligent management.

On October 19, 1884, at David City, Nebraska, Mr. Allen was united in marriage with Miss Nora Lamunyon, who was born in Michigan, a daughter of Wheeler W. and Nettie (Snedaker) Lamunyon. Twelve children were born to this union: Mary is the wife of Clifford Howell, a railroad man of North Platte, Nebraska, and they have one son; Edward, a farmer of Abbott, Colorado, married Bertha Kobo and has one daughter; Carrie M., the mother of a son by a former marriage, is now the wife of O. B. Dresback, an electrician in Lincoln, Nebraska; Nellie is the wife of John Kolbo, a plumber of North Platte, and they have one daughter; George W., who is at home and engaged in farming his father's property, was placed in Class 1 of the selective draft and made himself ready to respond to the call into the service of his country; Ruth is the wife of Lee N. Bolton, a farmer of Lodi, Nebraska, and they have one son; Bessie is the wife of Thomas B. Waller, freight agent of the Union Pacific Railroad at Kearney; Joseph resides at home and assists his father; Ethel is an eighth-grade student; Frederick W. and Clyde R., are attending school; and Doris is six years of age (1918).

Mr. Allen is independent in his political views, and takes no active part in politics, but is a loyal and public-spirited citizen whose support is never withheld from helpful enterprises and good civic movements.

REV. BRENARD A. SHIVELY. — It is not often that an outsider understands or appreciates the work of the clergy of the United Evangelical church. Fortunately these learned and worthy ministers give but little thought to the criticism or lack of appreciation on the part of the world, resting content with the realization that they have carried out the ideas of their superiors, have done the work of their Master, and have accomplished untold good for the benefit of humanity. One of these unselfish and venerated members of the United Evangelical clergy is Rev. Brenard A. Shively, pastor of the church of this faith at Callaway.

Brenard A. Shively was born January 22, 1881, at Newport, on the Juniata river, in Perry county, Pennsylvania, and is a son of Charles and Catherine (Longacre) Shively, also natives of the Keystone state. The father, now deceased, was for many years a merchant in Pennsylvania, where he had stores at different points. There were five children in the family: Brenard A., Maurice C., Laura (who died single); Mrs. Alice Straup (also deceased); and Miss Mary E.

When still a boy, Brenard A. Shively came into the first money earned by himself, this being gained by picking slate in an anthracite coal-breaker at the mines at Kingston, Pennsylvania. When he was a little older he attended the public schools of Wilkes Barre, and when not engaged at his studies, he was employed in drawing wire in the establishment of the Hazard Manufacturing Company. Later he went to Albright College, at Myers-town, in his native state, where he received his higher education, in preparation for the ministry, and at Hazelton, Pennsylvania, in February, 1902, he was licensed to preach the Gospel, by the Eastern Pennsylvania conference of the United Evangelical church. At that time he came to Humboldt, Nebraska, where he accepted a call to the Cottage church, and after there remaining two years he went to Shelton, Buffalo county, where he remained a like period.

On October 19, 1904, at Dawson, Nebraska, was solemnized the marriage of Rev. Brenard A. Shively, to Miss Bertha R. Heim, who was born at Dawson, daughter of Joseph G. and Rosa Heim, early settlers of Richardson county, where they still reside. Six children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Shively and all reside at the parental home — Mildred A., D. Ray, T. Ruth, Hilda M., Evelyn E., and Charles J.

From Shelton, Buffalo county, Mr. Shively went to Naponee, Franklin county, where he served three years as pastor. He then went to Eustis, Frontier county, where he spent a like period, and eventually he removed to Aurora, the county seat of Hamilton county, where he remained two and one-half years. In September, 1914, he was called to Callaway, where he has since acted as pastor of the Evangelical church, serving also the pulpits at Spring Creek and Brown Valley.

For seven years Mr. Shively held various offices in the State Christian Endeavor Union, and he was transportation manager for that organization to two international and one world's Christian Endeavor conventions. Possessed of no mean literary ability and of the power of expression, he has done much writing in the past, and he is the author of the history of the United Evangelical church in Custer county, which appears in this publication. Mr. Shively is an earnest, zealous, and energetic pastor,—one who is not only possessed of ministerial ability, but is also a practical man of affairs, capable of handling business matters in an expeditious and able manner. He is greatly beloved by the members of his congregation, and has many warm friends among men of all creeds and denominations in the various communities where he has carried on his work.

LEE H. MORRISON.—The life story of Lee H. Morrison runs the common routine of ordinary men who combine thrift, energy, and frugality, together with sterling character, in the composition of their lives.

He was born August 2, 1872, in York county, Nebraska. His father, William F. Morrison, was a prominent man of the community and came of sterling Pennsylvania stock. His mother, Virginia L. (Lichtenberger) Morrison, also came from Pennsylvania, the region of coal and iron. In this family were ten children: Harry L. (deceased), Edmond W., Charles O., Samuel A., Joseph E., Frederick W., Alfred E., Lee H., Dr. George A., and Annie (deceased).

Lee H. Morrison was reared on the farm and made himself generally useful by doing chores and assisting in all kinds of farm work. He had good school opportunities and succeeded in graduating from the Bradshaw high school.

One of the episodes connected with Lee's early life, in which he and his entire family had a thrilling experience on the father's farm, is worth relating. On the 3d day of June, 1890, a funnel-shaped cloud, out from the southwest, was observed to be coming straight toward the village of Bradshaw and in a direct line with the Morrison farm, which was located on the edge of the town. It did not take long for the inmates of the home to realize that danger was near. The windows and doors were first torn out, and this gave a decisive intimation that the house was not a safe refuge. Young Lee and his brother Alfred got hold of their mother, and together they made their way through the blinding dust and flying timbers to the cellar. They reached the cellar about the time that the cyclone picked up the house, which was a large frame building, and then dropped it back again on its foundation. This caprice of the storm was followed by another effort, which this time lifted the house at least twenty feet high and tore it into fragments, scattering the timber and debris to the west and north for a long distance. There were eleven people in the house, and all succeeded in escaping to the cellar. The only one harmed was the hired man, George Forrester, who in some way had his left ear cut off, close to his head. The entire town of Bradshaw was destroyed.

Mr. Morrison's first money, which was not a large amount, was earned while he was still a boy, living near Bradshaw, by herding cattle for the neighbors. After finishing school, which was some time in his eighteenth year, he commenced working for his brother Samuel, who was then conducting a farm-implementation business in Bradshaw. Later young Lee had some experience in the livery business, but this was not financially profitable.

Lee H. Morrison came to the important date of his life October 22, 1899, at which time he married Miss Sadie McMullan a teacher in the Bradshaw high school. The bride's father was Patrick McMullan, an Ohioan by birth, and her mother, Rebecca (Holbrook) McMullan, was an estimable Virginia lady. Mr. and Mrs. Morrison have three children, all at home with their parents.—Harold A., fifteen years of age (1918); Edith, thirteen years of age; and Mabel, eight years old. After the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Morrison they farmed for a year near where they formerly resided, and then, in 1901, they cast in their lot in Custer county. They located four miles east of Callaway, where they operated a farm for one year in partnership with Mr. Morrison's brother Frederick. Then, still retaining his interest in the stock and farm, Lee H. Morrison formed another partnership, with his brother Alfred, and engaged in the hardware and furniture business at Callaway. This last enterprise was short-lived, and in eight months the merchandise stock was sold to Mahan Brothers.

After this Mr. Morrison returned to farming and stock-raising, and he has made the raising of short-horn, pedigreed cattle a specialty. His place is called the Sunnyside Ranch and adjoins the well known Young Ranch on the north. It is about three miles north of the South Loup river and constitutes a fine stock farm. Mr. Morrison is getting well started with a fine herd of well built, blocky Durhams, which will soon make for themselves a reputation throughout the country.

Mr. Morrison stands high in Masonic circles and his wife is a member of the Eastern Star. Both are members of the Christian church.

JOHN REINHARD is a broad-minded Custer county farmer of retiring disposition—one who shrinks from undue publicity but whose story, nevertheless, should be recorded for the benefit of his children and also to demonstrate the advantages America has over most European countries.

John Reinhard was born May 9, 1858, near the great Krupp gun works, at Essen, Germany. His father's name was Frank Reinhard and his mother's maiden name was Gertrude Schluch. Both parents were hard-working people. In their family there were six children, John (the immediate subject of this sketch), Mary Schroeder, Agnes Buttler (deceased), Gertrude Penman, Peter, and Freda (deceased). The father was a coal-miner by occupation, and by practicing strict economy he managed to support the family.

The first money John Reinhard remembers earning was that made by working in the Krupp gun works. The laws of Germany compelled the schooling of children, so young John had the advantage of a fundamental education. He was compelled to remain in school until fourteen years of age, then he began his work in the now celebrated munition factory. This was in 1872, shortly after the Franco-Prussian war. At that time business was booming, and the lad of fourteen made more money than he was thereafter able to make when he had reached the age of eighteen or nineteen years. The particular work to which he was assigned was making molds for large casting, which weighed from five to fifty thousand pounds, from fifty to one hundred men being needed to fill these molds of the largest size. The metal used was Bessemer steel. In this establishment they used steel hammers weighing from two to seven thousand pounds. Mr. Reinhard worked in this establishment a full year, and he then went into the coal mines and worked with his father until he was twenty-three years of age, when his parents immigrated to America. The Reinhard's began their career in America in the year 1881, their first location being the Hocking Valley coal fields of Ohio, where they worked at coal-mining about eighteen months.

During the time he was thus employed in Ohio coal mines, young John Reinhard learned to speak English fairly well, and he made up his mind that he wanted to see something of America. And so, during the next six years, he developed into somewhat of a traveler, working from place to place and covering a good deal of territory. Being used to coal-mining, he first supposed that mining was the only work that he could do. In 1885 he found himself in Nevada, working in a quartz mine, and in 1886 he and an English friend, Fred Hutchinson, entered into partnership and went to Alaska, where they prospected along the Yukon river. They did fairly well, and remained in the territory three summers and two winters. Then, in 1888, they came back to the states, and in 1889, Mr. Reinhard went back to Germany and consummated a romance of early years by marrying Mary Gehrman, a daughter of Frank Gehrman. The young people came to America the same year, and came almost directly to Custer county, Nebraska, where they located in Custer canyon, eight miles northeast of Callaway, in section 35, township 16, range 22. This is still their home place. Their landed possessions now are 560 acres, all of which is splendidly improved, and on which is a beautiful farm home. All the land and improvements have been earned on and from the farm, and Mr. Reinhard votes this a good country.

Mr. and Mrs. Reinhard have reared a splendid family of children, who have developed or are fast developing into representative men and women. They are as follows: Gertrude is the wife of Lester Kirkpatrick, a farmer and ranchman living five miles northeast of Etna postoffice, Custer county, and they have two sons and one daughter. Miss Anna Reinhard, a school-teacher who has qualified herself for her work by a normal course, has taught five terms in Custer county, and she still makes her home at the old homestead place. Frank Reinhard, a bachelor of 22 years, was in Class 1, Division B, of the last selective military draft. He has 800 acres of rented land, near Round Valley, and is farming on his own account. Sophia is the wife of Clarence J. Garrison, a mechanic living in Kearney, Nebraska, where he is employed in a garage. Frederick, a popular young bachelor, is working with his brother Frank on a farm near Round Valley, this county. John, Jr., and Hilda are at the parental home, where they make themselves useful and at the same time are attending school and qualifying themselves for useful American citizenship.

Mr. Reinhard is affiliated with the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and in political matters he is independent and votes for the man rather than the party. He often talks about this country and compares its advantages with those of Germany, his native land. In speaking of the mammoth steam hammers, of 7000 pounds' weight, used in the Essen Krupp gun works, Mr. Reinhard says those hammers were called Fritz and could strike such a blow on the large anvils that it would jar the earth for blocks around. The mechanism was also so perfect that the blow could be struck so gently that it would hardly break an egg, but he declares the blow struck by energetic, ambitious boys here in America will count for more than the blows of those heavy steel hammers.

PHILIP J. STEIGER is a very successful farmer in the Ryno precinct. He was born November 21, 1870, near Augusta, Illinois, and is a son of Jacob and Sophia A. (Snyder) Steiger, both natives of Germany. In the father's family were five children, and Philip J. is the eldest of the four who are still living, the others being John H., Dora B., and Rosa A. All are connected with the United Brethren church. The father and the children are for the most part associated with farm industry.

When he was a very young man Jacob Steiger came to the United States with his older brother, and, like most men from the "Old Country," he was quick to improve the opportunities of the New World.

From his sturdy and worthy parents Philip J. Steiger inherited the characteristics that have made him a successful Custer county farmer and valued citizen. Mr. Steiger remembers that the first money he received was earned by trapping quails, at Huntsville, Illinois. The amount was not large, but in those days, and to a boy of his age, it amounted to almost fabulous wealth. The experience of young Philip were those which commonly fall to the lot of a farmer's son in this country. He attended country school, made the most of his opportunities, and developed a self-reliance that has been one of the assets of his mature years. When Philip Steiger was but twelve years of age, his father came to Hall county, Nebraska, and located three and one-half miles northwest of Wood River. There Philip grew to manhood and there he married Miss Lillian Afflerbaugh, who was born in that county, and who is a daughter of Nathaniel and Leah (Erb) Afflerbaugh. The parents were prominent people in Hall county, and both were natives of Pennsylvania. Their children were eight in number—Mrs. Emma I. Smith, Alva I., Mrs. Ida S. Leach, David G., Mrs. Nora E. Graham, Mrs. Lillian M. Steiger, Ira R., and Jason R.

Mr. and Mrs. Steiger maintain a happy and comfortable home, in which they are blessed with one son, Harold R., a bright lad of ten years (1918).

In 1901, Mr. Steiger moved into the Spring creek region, and purchased a quarter-section of good land, and since that time he has added to his possessions until he has 480 acres of productive and valuable Custer county soil, on which he has a beautiful home and a splendid farm equipment. All this is the product of his own toil and good management. Farming has paid him well. In connection with agricultural enterprise he has indulged extensively in breeding and feeding live stock until the combination of farming and stock-raising has rewarded him with his present possessions.

In social circles Mr. Steiger belongs to the Masonic fraternity and Modern Woodmen of America. His wife is an active member of the Eastern Star, and both are connected with the Evangelical church. Mr. Steiger's political preference is for the Republican party.

LEVI S. EMPFIELD.—The vigorous and progressive population of Custer county is made up largely of successful exponents of the agricultural and live-stock industries. In every part of the county, farmers seem to thrive, and as an able and honored representative of farm enterprise, as well as being one entitled to pioneer honors, Mr. Empfield is specially entitled to consideration in this history.

Levi S. Empfield was born in Beaver Valley, Cambria county, Pennsylvania, and is a son of Jackson B. and Jane (Pittman) Empfield, both of whom likewise were natives of the old Keystone state, their children having been ten in number—Elmer E., Mrs. Salina E. Campbell, McKee P. (deceased), Chalmers G., Levi S., Benjamin F., Laura C. McClure, Burton C., Mrs. Grace D. Owen, and Mrs. Nellie Headley. All of these children were reared to maturity in Custer county, Nebraska, and all became prominent and influential in those things that conserve and represent industry, thrift, and community development.

In the early days large families did not enjoy the advantages and luxuries that mark the present era, and consequently, in order to relieve parental burdens, Levi S. Empfield, when a lad of eleven years, went to live with an old gentleman, with whom he contracted to remain until he was eighteen years of age, his compensation for work on the farm in the meanwhile being his board and clothes, besides which, at the termination of his contract, he was to receive a horse, saddle, and bridle.

The old gentleman had distinct miserly proclivities, was never animated by any measure of generosity, and was very exacting in his relations with his young assistant. After three years young Levi Empfield decided that he had fulfilled as much of his contract as it was possible for him to do, and he accordingly abandoned his work and walked to his father's home, thirty-five miles distant. He made this journey, through a mountainous country, in the month of February, when the trip was made the more difficult by the presence of mud and snow. During the next year, 1886, Mr. Empfield worked on a farm, for six dollars a month, and he carefully saved his earnings. In 1887, in company with his father and his youngest brother, he came to Nebraska, and the other members of the family came later. In Custer county the father homesteaded the land where the old Ryno postoffice was located by him and where he served as postmaster for a period of fifteen years. During a part of this time Elmer E. Empfield, the eldest son, was mail contractor, and Levi S., subject of this sketch, carried the mail from Custer to Redfern postoffice, on the Redfern Table, via Lodi. He made the trips back and forth on horseback, and incidentally forded the South Loup river, both summer and winter. He continued his service on this mail route for two years. In 1894 he left Custer county and went to the state of Washington, where he remained about eighteen months and where he worked for fifty cents a day — and was glad to get even that amount. Thereafter he passed a year in California, and by working from five o'clock in the morning until eight o'clock at night, he finally accumulated a modest sum of money. From California he went to Utah, and there he was employed in the mines and ore mills for two and one-half years, at the expiration of which he returned to Custer county.

In the spring of 1901 Mr. Empfield purchased 320 acres of land and also homesteaded an adjoining tract of eighty acres, on Spring creek, seven miles northeast of Callaway. Here he has since maintained his home. Mr. Empfield began his independent farm operations on a tract of 160 acres, and he is to-day the owner of a well improved landed estate of 560 acres, on which he has a most attractive home and through his association with which, as a vigorous and progressive farmer and stock-grower, he has achieved substantial success. He is liberal and public-spirited as a citizen, is a Republican in politics, and he and his family command the unqualified esteem of the community in which they live.

August 12, 1901, recorded the marriage of

Mr. Empfield to Miss Eva Waddington, who was born in Illinois and who is a daughter of Samuel and Margaret (Oliver) Waddington, her father being now a well known stockman in Custer county. Mr. and Mrs. Empfield have a fine family of five children — Ralph E., Lloyd R., Alice B., Rae W., and Ruby H.

OLIVER D. JAMES was born September 21, 1856, in Park county, Indiana. His father, Samuel R. James, was likewise a native of the Hoosier state, and his mother was Lucinda (Jacks) James, who was a daughter of Pailman Jacks.

In the family of Samuel R. James were five children — Oliver D. James, Stella (James) Barney (deceased), Oscar M. James, Lydia (James) Mobley, and Alva James. Both Mr. and Mrs. James belonged to the Methodist church. Samuel R. James served three years as a soldier in the Civil war. He became a member of the Seventy-first Indiana Volunteer Infantry, which later was made the Sixth Cavalry.

Oliver D. James says that he made his first money when eight years of age by picking blackberries. He invested the money in a pig, but this did not prove a very profitable investment, as the pig died. He worked at home, and went to school in the winter time until he was seventeen years of age, when his father died, and, as he was the oldest of the children, the main burden of supporting his mother and the other children fell to him. In 1882 his mother moved to Putnam county, Missouri, where she resided for two years. Then, with three of her children — Oliver D., Stella, and Alva — she came to Custer county. Oliver and his mother took pre-emptious and a homestead five miles southwest of Callaway, in the spring of 1884. Mr. James claims to have driven the second nail in the first building built in Callaway. The valley in which they settled derived its name from the James family and is still known as the James valley. Mr. James continued to care for his mother until the time of her death, which occurred at his home, December 4, 1916. The loved and devoted mother attained to the ripe old age of eighty-two years, and they were never separated longer than a month or so from the time of his birth until her death.

February 10, 1891, at Trenton, Missouri, was recorded the marriage of Oliver D. James to Hattie E. Campsey, who was born in the state of Iowa, and is a daughter of John Campsey, who was a Pennsylvanian. Her mother, whose maiden name was Priscilla Nelson, was a native of the Buckeye state. Mr. and Mrs. John Campsey had eight children—Mrs. Mary Jane Penn (deceased), Mrs. Margaret Gregg, John C. Campsey, David S. Campsey, Joseph D. Campsey (deceased), Mrs. Martha Rison, Mrs. Hattie E. James, and Mrs. Catharine Newton. The religious faith of this family has long been that of the Methodist church, which has received from the family a loyal and generous support.

Mr. and Mrs. James have one son, Guy C. James, who married Miss Helen Morrison, and is a farmer by occupation, living six miles north of Callaway. Mr. and Mrs. Guy C. James have one son and are prosperous young people.

In 1905 Mr. James sold his 480-acre farm in James valley and moved to Callaway, where he was engaged in the general merchandise business for four years. In 1909 he sold his stock of goods to his brother-in-law, J. D. Campsey, after which he commenced farming operations with his son, on a rented farm. He thus continued about seven years, and then moved back to Callaway, buying sixteen and one-half acres joining the town on the west. He has this small tract in a high state of cultivation and so arranged that the entire area can be irrigated, which enhances its value many times. Mr. James is a breeder of large-boned Duroc-Jersey hogs, and it is safe to say no breeder in Custer county produces better specimens of "auburn-haired" swine than does Mr. James.

In the matter of thrill and excitement, one of Mr. James' early experiences equals any of the "stunts" pulled off by Texas Jack, Little Buckshot or, perhaps, our friend Buffalo Bill. In 1886 he visited his brother in Cheyenne county, forty miles north of Sidney. One day he went with his brother and a neighbor named Dixon, into a big cedar canyon, on a hunting expedition. Dixon shot and crippled a deer, which ran up the side of the canyon on to the table land above. Mr. James in those days was an expert horseman and adept with the lariat rope. He mounted his pony and followed the deer across the level plain, gaining on it at every jump, and after a short and exciting race he was near enough to throw the rope. Then the deer suddenly disappeared—as suddenly as if the ground had opened and swallowed it. It dropped completely out of sight. The pony stopped so abruptly that Mr. James came near to plunging over its head, when he discovered that he was on the brink of another canyon with a precipitous bank of at least 100 feet. The pony stopped so close to the edge of the bank that the dirt under its front feet caved off and fell to the floor of the canyon below.

After recovering from his excitement, Mr. James rode a mile down the bank of the canyon, to a point where he found a trail leading down into the canyon. He then rode back up the floor of the valley and secured the deer.

JAMES D. REAM.—Custer county has no resident more widely known in either private or public life than the progressive farmer and public-spirited citizen whose name initiates this paragraph. Mr. Ream is a native of Newcastle, Pennsylvania, where he was born October 18, 1852. His parents were Benjamin and Elizabeth (Simpson) Ream and his paternal grandfather was John Ream—all influential and respected residents of Lawrence county, Pennsylvania.

Benjamin Ream was born in 1824 and in 1855 moved to Mahaska county, Iowa. Responding to the call of his country, he enlisted in 1861 for three years' service in the Civil war. He was second lieutenant of Company C, Seventh Iowa Volunteer Infantry. At the battle of Belmont, where he had command of his company, he was so severely wounded that he died seven days later. His death occurred at Cairo, Illinois. By trade he was a carpenter and cabinetmaker. Politically he was a Lincoln Republican. Both he and his wife were faithful members of the United Brethren church. His children were John T., Mrs. Anna E. Foster, Mrs. Louisa Thompson, Samuel, and James D.

James D. Ream remained at home with his mother until after he had reached his majority. He recalls the early days of his first introduction into the science of agriculture, when he was paid twenty-five cents a day for dropping corn in a field of long rows which were covered by hoe by a second laborer. No modern machinery made farm labor either light or delightful in those days. He attended school when opportunity presented itself and worked during all the spare time at farming, chopping wood, grubbing out stumps, or quarrying stone, as occasion required. In 1878 he came to Nebraska and bought eighty acres of land near Stromsburg, in Polk county.

In January, 1880, Mr. Ream came to Custer county and selected a homestead and timber claim five miles northwest of where Broken Bow now stands. Neither the town nor the postoffice was yet established when he came, he being the first settler in the little valley where he still resides. It was here that the real career of the man began. He here found an opportunity for the development of that resourceful character and that public spirit which have given him a state-wide reputation as an enterprising, tireless worker along agricultural and educational lines. He was among the very first in the state to recognize that our little, inefficient rural-school districts were a positive hindrance to the establishment of adequate schools and ideal rural-life conditions, and if the future years bring enlarged or consolidated districts and adequate schools, with school buildings of such size and construction as will serve as community social and educational centers, thus providing an opportunity for the development of ideal rural-life conditions, he will be entitled to a fair share of the credit. He saw the opportunities of the west; he saw the possibilities of the agricultural development of Custer county; and likewise he saw the need of a community life that would help develop the latent social instincts and inspire the ambitions of the rising generation. He gave himself to the double task. He developed his farm. He experimented with many kinds of grain and trees. He became a careful student of agriculture and horticulture, and discovered some facts in relation to the Cedar apple fungus not previously known to the scientists.

In this connection it may consistently be stated that Mr. Ream was virtually deprived of the distinction that should be his in the matter of the discovery that it requires two years for the fungus to make its complete cycle from cedar apple to the cedar leaf and return again to the cedar tree to be there matured and made ready for a second onslaught, scientists having previously supposed that this complete cycle was completed in one year. A report of this discovery by Mr. Ream was published in the Custer County Chief, a year prior to the time when the botanist at the University of Nebraska effected the publication of the discovery in the Smithsonian Report. It may further be noted that at one time Mr. Ream had in Custer county the finest bearing-orchard in this section of the state. From lack of time properly to care for this orchard, it finally outgrew the supply of moisture and thus top-killed.

As a result of the investigations and experiments of Mr. Ream in methods of farming, his crops are usually above normal, and his farm is to-day one of the most attractive of the central west. The evergreen windbreaks, consisting of cedar and Black Hills spruce, are exceptionally fine. No distinguished visitor ever comes to Broken Bow with a desire to see what the country can produce, without being taken to the Ream farm, where he sees a practical demonstration of what thrift, and skill, when applied in harmony with nature's laws, have been able to accomplish. His improvements are of the first order, and stand as a splendid monument to the profits of agriculture as conducted by Mr. Ream. He has been an able and consistent advocate of everything that would tend to better the social, educational, and material conditions of the community and the state. He helped organize the Nebraska Farmers Congress and the State Corn Improvers Association, and has served several years as master of the Nebraska State Grange. The Grange work furnished an ideal field of labor for him, as the Grange brings the people of the rural community together in a social way, which not only contributes entertainment but also stimulates the latent ambitions of the young people and inspires them to greater activities in all the commendable avenues of life's endeavors. It was this work that gave him the clear vision of the inefficiency of our school system, and the determination to correct it.

Politically, Mr. Ream is not classed as a partisan. He is, on the contrary, inclined to be independent and nonpartisan. Yet he is generally popular and has been the recipient of political honors at the hands of his fellow citizens. In 1901 he served in the lower house of the state legislature and made an honorable record. He has served also as county commissioner, making a splendid record for himself and serving to the best interests of the county. He has filled many minor offices in the local community and precinct. In farmers' institutes, held for the purpose of promoting agriculture and horticulture, Mr. Ream has always been active, and his addresses, papers, and advice have not only been much sought but have also been very valuable to the public generally. Progressive in spirit, born with an ability to lead, he stands in the first rank of public promoters and is willing and able to lead in every progressive movement that contributes to the public welfare. For seven years he was president of the Custer County Agricultural Society; he was the leading factor in the organization of the Farmers' Institute held at Broken Bow and for twenty-one years was chairman of the local organization. He has also been efficiently connected with the state board of agriculture, having served several years as a member of that body. He is widely known throughout the state as an agriculturist and horticulturist, and his name ranks high in agricultural and grange circles, as well in all farmers' movements.

February 11, 1883, in Mahaska county,

JAMES D. REAM

MRS. JAMES D. REAM

Iowa, Mr. Ream was joined in holy wedlock to Miss Anna E. Seevers, a daughter of Frank and Elizabeth Seevers. Further mention of Mrs. Ream's family is made in the sketch of Robert M. Seevers, on other pages of this volume. After their marriage Mr. and Mrs. Ream established, and have since maintained, an ideal home, to which every convenience and comfort of modern life has been contributed.

Mrs. Ream has proved herself a veritable helpmeet in all the activities of their married life, she having borne her full share of the trials of home-building in a sod house, and the privations and hardships generally due to pioneer life. Much of the credit is due to her for the the flowers that have bloomed so profusely in the door yard, and the order and neatness in which the grounds of the home have been kept.

To Mr. and Mrs. Ream the years have brought three children, all of whom are now grown to maturity and bid fair to continue the public services of their parents. The children are: Fred H., who is in business in Kansas City, Glen C., who resides at Broken Bow, and Loy G., who is pursuing a course in the University of Nebraska, at Lincoln.

PAUL G. KOLBO.—This begins the story of another young farmer of the Kolbo family. Mr. Kolbo, who is located near Lodi, is a farmer of careful and frugal habits, and he enjoys a splendid reputation in his community. He was born April 5, 1885, in Custer county, and is, therefore, in every sense of the term a Custer county product. He is a son of Oliver and Anna K. (Lee) Kolbo, who are mentioned elsewhere in the biographical department of this volume, and who became the parents of nine children—Melvin, Hilmer, Paul G., Julia, Olson, Oscar, Selmer, Rudolph, and Tim. Rudolph is in the service of his country, and at the time of this writing, he is somewhere in France. Oliver Kolbo came to Custer county at an early date and has always been counted as one of the pioneer spirits who did much to develop the resources of the county.

Young Paul Kolbo made his first money by carrying water to the harvest hands. He and his father and brothers farmed on a very extensive scale, and the labor of every member of the family was required to conduct the operations and make them profitable. Thus, early in life, Paul formed the industrious habits that have enabled him to make good in every farming or stock-raising undertaking with which he has identified himself.

Like most farm boys, his services were demanded on the farm, but he ran the gamut of the common schools and received a fundamental education which places him at ease in all business transactions requiring judgment, and business acumen.

On the 24th of December, 1898, Mr. Kolbo married Miss Laurina Simonson, at Broken Bow. Mrs. Kolbo also is a native of Custer county, and this makes the entire household of Paul G. Kolbo a Custer county family. Mrs. Kolbo's parental home was in Rose valley. She is a daughter of James M. Simonson, who by occupation was a shoemaker, and who for some time followed his vocation in the city of Broken Bow. The maiden name of his wife was Anna C. Jensen, and both were born in Denmark; they are estimable people. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Simonson are eight in number—Peter J., Mrs. Mary J. Cunningham, Simon P., Mrs. Christina Cramer, Hans P., Julle, Mrs. Laurina Kolbo, and Mrs. Carrie M. Cantrell.

Mr. and Mrs. Kolbo have a happy and pleasant home, in which four children have come to share the blessings of their parental care, but one, the eldest, James O., has been taken from the parents into that heavenly home where he awaits the final reunion that time will bring. The living children are Pauline L., and Paul L. who are twins, six years of age, and the youngest, Jerold R., is a sweet little lad of two years, the pet of the home and the one who largely rules the affairs of the Kolbo household.

Mr. Kolbo, aside from being a painstaking and careful farmer, is a stock-raiser of no mean reputation. He likes stock, is counted a good hand with stock, knows how to handle it and succeeds in keeping his stock in good condition. He is a member of the Woodmen of the World, in which he takes a prominent part. Religiously the home is divided between the Methodists and the Lutherans, but so long as strict integrity and Christian character are concerned, denominationalism counts for little. Mr. Kolbo generally votes the Republican ticket.

ROSCOE R. BANGS is a veteran of the Civil war who has had experiences in the field of agriculture and merchandising, and whose successful and well directed operations have served to make him one of the leading business citizens of Broken Bow, where his activities have been centered since 1915. Mr. Bangs is one of the few men furnished this community by the state of Maine, for he was born there, at Farmington, March 18, 1843.

WALTER A.

a son of Richard and Isabelle (Clayton) Bangs.

Richard Bangs was born in October, 1809, at Gorham, Maine, and passed his life in the peaceful pursuits of farming. He died on his farm, in 1888, after an honorable and useful career. He was a Democrat but never entered actively into politics, preferring to give himself wholly to his farming operations, in which he was considered a successful man for his day. Mrs. Bangs, who was born at Farmington, Maine, in September, 1809, died in 1872, having become the mother of six children, of whom three still survive: Mrs. Anna C. Sprague, a widow residing at Farmington, Maine; Roscoe R., subject of this review; and Mrs. Annette B. Kendall, who resides at Springfield, Massachusetts, and whose husband is a fruit-grower and the owner of a chicken ranch.

Roscoe R. Bangs attended the public schools of Farmington and began life on the home farm. The peaceful routine of his life was interrupted by the outbreak of the Civil war, however, and September 5, 1862, he enlisted in Company L, First Maine Cavalry, with which he served two years and nine months, being a member of the Army of the Potomac and participating in such important engagements as Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg. He took part in the battle of the Wilderness, went with his company and took part in the engagement at Cold Harbor, and with his regiment participated in each consecutive battle in which it was involved up to the time when victory crowned the Union arms. He established a splendid record for bravery and faithful performance of duty, and when the war was closed and peace declared he returned to his home in Maine. His life was changed, however, and his views as well, and he soon left the parental home and went to Hartford, Connecticut, where for four years he was employed in a belt factory. While living there, in 1869, he married Miss Mary Baisley, who was born in Connecticut, and shortly after this event he returned to Maine and engaged in the clothing business. In this he continued with a measure of success for seven years, and thereafter he spent five years as the proprietor of a general store. Feeling that he could better his fortunes in the west, in 1882 Mr. Bangs came to Nebraska, and located at Ashland, where for one season he was the occupant of a farm. He also spent a like period in a shoe store, but in 1884, he came to Custer county, where he took up a homestead and proved up on it, and for four years thereafter continued to engage in farming. Eventually he rented his farm, although he continued to live in the country, and finally he sold the property. Later he was in business at Wescott, and subsequently at Comstock, for thirteen years, and in April, 1915, he came to Broken Bow, where he established himself as the proprietor of a modern furniture business. While he is a practical newcomer to this community, he possesses the necessary business attributes and qualities and has already gained the confidence and patronage that go to make for success in a mercantile venture. He has been found a man of sound integrity, and the business done by his store has shown a consistent advancement.

Mr. and Mrs. Bangs became the parents of six children: Twins who were born in 1875 both died in infancy; Carrie J. is deceased; Georgia B. is the wife of Howard Savage, an insurance man of Everett, Washington; Lottie B. is the wife of E. C. Wescott, an automobile man of Chicago; and Ralph B. is on a ranch in Cherry county, Nebraska. Mrs. Bangs, who died in 1905, was a member of the Congregational church at Comstock, although she had formerly been a member of the South Baptist church of Hartford, Connecticut. Mr. Bangs is a Mason, and is a popular comrade of the Grand Army of the Republic, being past commander of C. C. Washburn Post, No. 98. The military honors of the family are being well upheld by two of his grandsons, Clarence J. Forte, and Roscoe E. Savage, who have been gallant young soldiers of the United States Army in connection with the nation's participation in the great world war. He is a Republican and interested in politics and public affairs, but his only official position has been that of town clerk.

WALTER WOOD. — A rancher and stockman whose field of operation is in the pioneer region of the South Loup river is Walter Wood. He is thirty-nine years of age, and is a descendant in the first generation from the pioneer, Joshua Wood, who was chosen as Custer county's first sheriff and was one of the early characters in pioneer days; further mention of his career is made in the life sketch of his son Frank, elsewhere in this volume, as well as in his personal sketch, which is accompanied by an excellent portrait of this sterling pioneer.

Walter Wood was born in 1879, in the Wood river district. February 18, 1918, he was united in marriage to Edna Downey, a very excellent young lady who by birth and life-residence is entirely a Custerite.

Walter Wood is the manager of part of the Wood ranch, on which stock-raising on a large scale is conducted by him and his brother Frank. His cattle herds average about 900 head of high-grade Herefords, but of course the number fluctuates accordingly as sales are made. From 100 to 160 hogs are produced each year, which adds to the food stuff of the country very materially. A splendid Percheron stallion heads the stables, from which are produced fine horses. The farm is well improved, with stock-raising prominently featured. All kinds of farm machinery, and a splendid automobile contribute their share to making operations profitable and extensive. Mr. Wood and his wife are a splendid couple in good standing in the community and are rated always in the first class.

It might be said that no better stock-judge or ranch manager than Mr. Wood is to be found in the stock or ranch business to-day. Like his brother, he patriotically responds to all war appeals and is an ardent supporter of the government. The dependence of the country is upon such food-producers as the Woods Brothers.

JOHN HOTHEM, who is one of the sterling pioneers of the district about the town of Sumner and whose well improved farm estate lies across the line in Dawson county, has been closely and worthily identified with the civic and industrial development and progress of this favored part of the state and is specially entitled to recognition in this history.

Mr. Hothem was born in Ohio, and is a son of John and Christena (Bremer) Hothem, the former of whom attained to the patriarchal age of eighty-eight years and the latter of whom passed away at the age of seventy-eight years, they having become the parents of seven children, three of whom are living—the subject of this review and two of his sisters. Valentine died at the age of seventy-two years and Michael was seventy-one years of age at the time of his death; Catherine died at the age of eighty-two years, and Elizabeth at the age of eighty years. The two surviving daughters, in 1918, are Mary, aged seventy years, and Margaret, aged sixty-eight years. In 1840 John Hothem, Sr., immigrated to America from his native Germany, and he settled in the state of Ohio, where he became a substantial citizen and where his son John was born, as noted above.

He whose name introduces this article was reared in Ohio, where he received the advantages of the common schools, and as a young man his ambition prompted him to seek his fortunes in the progressive west. After leaving Ohio he was a resident of Indiana for a period of six years, and the ensuing six years he passed in the state of Iowa. In 1879 he came from the Hawkeye state to Nebraska, in company with Wilson Hewett, whom he accompanied to Custer county, Mr. Hewett's name being prominently identified with the pioneer annals of this county. Mr. Hothem states that when he and Mr. Hewett were making their initial trip into Custer county and were proceeding up the course of Muddy creek, they became stranded, on account of lack of water for themselves and their teams, but they finally extricated themselves from this difficulty. Mr. Hothem has been actively associated with farm enterprise during the major part of the time since he came to this section of Nebraska, and he has won prosperity through earnest and well directed endeavors. He endured his full share of the hardships that marked the pioneer days, and he pressed forward to the goal of independence and definite success, all that he has in the line of worldly possessions to-day having been accumulated by him since he established his residence in this part of the state. When he arrived in Custer county he was fortified in the possession of two horses and a wagon, but his available cash was represented in the sum of only twenty dollars. He has been a productive worker and the passing years have brought to him a worthy success. He is affiliated with the Masonic fraternity, including the Order of the Eastern Star.

In 1885 was recorded the marriage of Mr. Hothem to Miss Wilhelmina Lahm, and they have eight children: Jacob continues to reside in Custer county; Etta, Elizabeth, and Anna remain at the parental home; Wesley is out working for himself but still remains in Custer county; and Fern, William, and Minnie remain with their parents.

HARVEY S. WATERBURY, who has been a successful participant in both agricultural and mercantile lines at Berwyn and the surrounding vicinity for a number of years, is one of the contributions of the state of Indiana to the citizenship of Custer county. Mr. Waterbury was born at Logansport, Indiana, September 24, 1858, and is a son of Harvey M. and Louie (Calloway) Waterbury.

Harvey N. Waterbury, the paternal grandfather of Harvey S., was born at Waterbury, Connecticut, and at an early date removed to Michigan, where he passed the remainder of his life and where his death occurred when he was in advanced years. The maternal grandfather was Timothy Calloway, who was born near Dover Bay, Delaware, and after his marriage he settled in Ohio, shortly following which he lost his wife, who had borne the maiden name of Jennie Olcar. Subsequently he became one of the early settlers of Indiana, and there his death occurred when he was seventy-seven years of age. Harvey M. Waterbury was born near the city of Kalamazoo, Michigan, in 1835, and as a young man he went to Indiana, where he met and married Louie Calloway, who was born at Lake Sicott, Indiana, in 1837. He was a farmer by vocation, was an energetic man who was making his mark in the world, and was a sincere member of the Christian church. He had been a strong Republican, and when the Civil war came on, it found him one with intense Union sympathies, so that at length he broke home ties, left his wife and five children, and enlisted in the Fifty-fourth Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Infantry. He met a soldier's death on the field of battle, during the second day's fighting in the siege of Vicksburg. Of the five children, Harvey S. is the only survivor. Later, Mrs. Waterbury, who died January 2, 1906, became the wife of John Robison, and they became the parents of seven children, of whom three survive: Mrs. May Harrington, whose husband is now a photographer at Logansport, Indiana; Mrs. Ruth Tiner, whose husband is identified with a laundry-machinery manufacturing company at Cincinnati, Ohio; and John, a farmer in the vicinity of Logansport, Indiana.

Harvey S. Waterbury received a limited education in the public schools of Burnettsville, Indiana, and when he was sixteen years of age he left the home of his guardian, after which he worked for farmers in the neighborhood until he had attained to his legal majority. At the age of twenty-one years he came to Nebraska and located in Howard county, where he found employment by the month, as a farm hand. About one year later, July 12, 1880, Mr. Waterbury came to Custer county and took up a homestead, his first vote being cast that fall, for James A. Garfield for president. In 1881 he further strengthened his position by forming a home of his own—through his marriage to Miss Carrie Sigourney, who was born near Sandusky, Ohio. Seven children came to this union, of whom six are living: Louie, who is the wife of Charles Betts, a farmer of Chappell, Nebraska; Jessie, who is the wife of Charles Wolford, a very successful jeweler at Gothenburg, Nebraska; Ray, who is in business at Litchfield, this state, the maiden name of his wife having been Mayme Garnett;

Lottie who is the wife of W. L. McCandless, cashier of the Berwyn State Bank; Harvey, who is his father's associate in the store business, and who married Ada Stark; and Veva Ruth, who is the wife of L. G. DeValt, connected with the State Bank of Berwyn.

In 1894, after about fourteen years of successful farming operations, Mr. Waterbury turned his attention to mercantile lines, and during the period that has followed he has built up a large, representative and lucrative business. He has also been interested in a blacksmithing business, and in each avenue of activity his abilities have served to bring him a full meed of prosperity. He bears the reputation of being a man of the strictest integrity, and this is evidenced by the confidence in which he is held by his associates and the public in general. A Republican in his political sympathies, he has always taken an interest in public matters, and has rendered his community valuable service in the offices of clerk and assessor. He belongs to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and has not only been through the chairs of the local lodge but also those of the grand lodge, at Broken Bow. Both his sons are Masons, Ray having received the thirty-second degree of the Scottish Rite. Mr. Waterbury and the members of his family belong to the Methodist Episcopal church, and all have been earnest and generous supporters of all movements which have been made for better citizenship, better morality, and better education.

NORMAN E. BOYD is one of the pushing, energetic, and enterprising business men of Broken Bow, where he has built up a prosperous trade in the automobile-repair and general electrical business. Born in Dewitt county, Illinois, February 13, 1881, he is a son of Frank and Minerva (Waller) Boyd, and a grandson of David Boyd. Frank Boyd was an Illinois farmer until 1905, when he disposed of his interests in that state and came to Broken Bow, where he was variously employed for five years, then entering the city waterworks department, with which he has been identified for eight years. Mrs. Boyd died in Missouri, in 1896, leaving only one son, the subject of this review.

Norman E. Boyd was educated in the public schools of Illinois, and as a youth was engaged principally in assisting his father on the home farm. However, he had a natural bent toward mechanics and gradually mastered the trade of electrician, to which he devoted his attention for some years as a journeyman, both in Illinois and after coming to Custer county. Realizing the opportunities offered by the growing automobile business, with Harry Hildebrandt as a partner, he established himself in business at Eighth and K Streets, Broken Bow, where he does a general automobile electrical-repair business, a special feature of which is the vulcanizing of old automobile tire casings, which process prolongs their life thousands of miles. He runs a battery, as a Willard service station, and now has an excellent patronage, not only among the people of Broken Bow but also among those who visit from other parts of the state, his accurate and expeditious workmanship and his natural courtesy and consideration having combined to make customers as well as friends. At the time of this writing Mr. Boyd's partner, Mr. Hildebrandt, is in the army, at Fort Funston, but retains his interest in the business.

Mr. Boyd was married in August, 1904, at Broken Bow, to Miss Minnie Boots, daughter of C. S. Boots, a Custer county farmer, and she died December 8, 1913, leaving two children: Frank and Iva K., who are attending the Broken Bow public schools. Mr. Boyd was again married, March 2, 1914, when he wedded Miss Mattie Gross, daughter of Charles and Mary (Gunn) Gross. Two children have been born to them: Paul and Lillian. Mr. and Mrs. Boyd are members of the Methodist Episcopal church.

WILLIAM C. SCHAPER.—While he is one of the younger members of the legal fraternity of Broken Bow, the fact of his youth seems in no way to have affected the success of William C. Schaper, who is already accounted one of the rapidly rising attorneys of Custer county. Experiences have been numerous and varied in the life of Mr. Schaper, who was born October 4, 1890, at Mason City, Nebraska, a son of Henry E. and Louisa (Trobbe) Schaper, and a grandson of Chris Schaper.

Henry E. Schaper was born near Hanover, Germany, and came to the United States as a lad of fourteen years, locating at DeWitt, Nebraska. In 1888 he homesteaded southwest of Mason City, and in 1902 he went to Mason City, where he established himself in a mercantile business. There his career was rounded out. He was an Odd Fellow, was a Democrat in political belief, and he and Mrs. Schaper, who was born at Malvern, Iowa, were members of the Baptist church. William C. Schaper spent his boyhood on the home farm, and his first money was earned by pitching hay for a neighbor. He has a keen recollection of how they praised his efforts, how his boyish pride caused him to outdo himself in the work accomplished, and how his strenuous labors incapacitated him for further work for a week. He attended the country schools until he was twelve years of age, at which time his father moved to Mason City, and there the youth divided his time between clerking in his father's store and going to the public school. However, he did not feel that he was getting proper educational advantages, and when he was sixteen years of age he ran away from home and went to Grand Island. He arrived at his destination with just twelve cents in his pocket, but, nothing daunted, sought and found work, and he was able to make his way through school by laboring industriously as a clerk in a shoe store, waiting on tables in a restaurant, and whatever other honorable employment presented itself or that he could ferret out. During the second year, Mr. Schaper secured a pass on a hog train going through to Seattle, Washington, a trip on which he was accompanied by a chum, Emory Runyan. The men in charge of the stock became drunk and remained so during the entire trip, and the two youths were not only compelled to unload the hogs at Alliance, Billings, and Spokane, but had to carry the feed from the cars to the stock yard, because of the fear of being left afoot and alone a long way from home. On reaching Spokane, young Runyan stopped off to see an uncle, but Mr. Schaper went on to Seattle, where he received a pass back as far as Billings. There he worked a week, earning just enough money to buy from a traveler a pass to Broken Bow, and after going two days without food he was extremely glad to get back to Custer county. He again began working his way through school and eventually finished a five-year course at Grand Island, during which time he attended two inter-collegiate oratorical meets, one at Orleans and one at Hastings, as a member of the staff of the Volant, the college newspaper, with which he was connected actively during the greater part of his college career. In the fall of 1911 Mr. Schaper entered the Nebraska State University, at Lincoln, where he took the full course in the law department and was graduated June 10, 1914, with his degree of Bachelor of Laws. He was admitted to the bar by the supreme court on the day of his graduation and to the federal courts on the same day.

One week after his graduation Mr. Schaper was married, at Wahoo, Nebraska, to Shirley M. Shires, a daughter of Millard Shires, and started for his home town of Mason City, where he arrived without a dollar. He engaged in the practice of law there and was soon in sound financial circumstances, continuing at Mason City until October, 1916, when he came to Broken Bow. Here he has since carried on a general practice and has steadily advanced in patronage, in public confidence and in the ranks of his calling. He has been connected with much important litigation, and his success in several prominent cases has demonstrated his possession of marked talents. He belongs to the various organizations of his profession, is an active member of the Public Service Club, and is a Woodman, a Royal Highlander, a Mason, and a Shriner. His political inclinations cause him to support the Democratic party, and he and Mrs. Schaper hold membership in the Baptist church. They are the parents of two children: Carlos E. and Lucile.

DEWITT BOWLEY.—Among the young men of moral and material worth whose energetic labors are contributing to the business prestige of Broken Bow, one who is making rapid progress in the commercial world is Dewitt Bowley, who for several years has been the proprietor of a furniture business and also has other interests. He was born at New Helena, Nebraska, October 21, 1890, and is a son of William O. and Minerva (Hudleston) Bowley.

William O. Bowley was born in West Virginia and was an early immigrant to Custer county, settling in the vicinity of New Helena, where he established a home among the pioneers. He was a man of small capital when he came and this was soon swallowed up, his early experiences and those of his wife, particularly during the hard winter of 1880 and spring of 1881, including all the hardships and privations coincident with pioneer life on the western plains. He was compelled to haul his necessities of life from Grand Island and Kearney, and his wheat was laboriously ground in a coffee-mill, but his was the kind of courage that but grows stronger under adversity, and eventually he became one of the county's successful men and accumulated a large amount of property. He died, highly respected, April 6, 1913, at Anselmo, and his widow is now a resident of Merna, this county. There were six children in the family, as follows: James, the owner of two farms near Sargent, married Grace Rush, and has three sons and two daughters; Gallie is a farmer and stock-raiser near New Helena, and his wife is Josie, whose parents were from Virginia; John, who is engaged in farming and stock-raising on the old homestead, near

New Helena, married Ethel Smith, a daughter of Moses Smith, and has had three daughters; Oscar, who is a Custer county farmer, married Ora Flemmings and they have five daughters and one son; Annie is the wife of Bert Garrison, a farmer near New Helena, and they have two daughters and one son; and Dewitt is the subject of this sketch.

Dewitt Bowley attended the public schools in the vicinity of his home, and divided his boyhood and youth between working on the home place, for his brothers, or on the farms of the neighbors. He remained on the home farm until he reached his majority, at which time he entered upon his own career, his energies for a time being devoted to farming. In 1915, however, he became proprietor of a furniture business, which he has since built up to satisfying proportions, and in connection therewith he is conducting a rooming house. He is one of the alert and progressive young men of Broken Bow and is bringing himself rapidly forward by the exercise of industry and good management.

Mr. Bowley was married June 3, 1914, at Broken Bow, to Miss Grace Pernie, daughter of David and Eva (Albertson) Pernie, who for some years were engaged in agricultural pursuits near Anselmo but are now living in retirement at Broken Bow. Mr. Pernie is a member of the Odd Fellows lodge and is a Republican in his political views. He and his wife had seven children: Blanche, Clark, Grace, Ethel, Myrtle, Lucille, Eva, and William. Mr. and Mrs. Bowley are the parents of one son, William, born in 1915.

Fraternally, Mr. Bowley is affiliated with the Modern Brotherhood of America, in which he has numerous friends. He maintains an independent stand upon political questions.

FRANK DEVINE, who was born in 1872, is a son of John A. and Bridget A. (Sharp) Devine, very excellent people, of Irish extraction, who have given to this country the splendid contribution of their life effort and a family of children who are numbered among our best citizens. In the family of John A. Devine were eight children: Charles, the first son, lives in Illinois; the second son is Frank, the subject of this sketch; the third, James, is a banker and prominent citizen of Oconto, Custer county; Joseph, the fourth born, is a young farmer living with his mother and his brother Frank on the home place, where he assists in the farming operations; John, the youngest son, is a dentist by profession and is living at Cheyenne, Wyoming; Martha is the widow of Joseph P. Berry and maintains her residence at Oconto, this county; Anna is the wife of James Noon, of Joliet, Illinois; and Mary, who has been popular and successful as a school teacher, resides at the old home, with her mother and two brothers.

As indicated above, Frank and Joseph Devine and their mother live on the old home place, and here the father died about nine years ago. The brothers are doing a general farming and stock-raising business, to which they devote the most of their time. They are energetic men of good judgment and of that business ability which insures success to every venture they undertake.

They have been very patriotic and ardent supporters of the government in the crisis entailed by the great world war. They responded liberally to every call and were glad to render whatever assistance lay in their power.

They are members of the Knights of Columbus, and to the splendid war work done by this organization, as well as the Red Cross and the Young Men's Christian Association, they have made their contributions. They are also substantial supporting members of the Catholic church.

MRS. ALBERT GUNDY.—Several of the valuable and highly improved farms of Custer county are owned and operated by women, and most of these are widows of former agriculturists, while most of them became well versed in the science of tilling the soil by reason of having assisted their respective husbands during their years of industrious labor. Under this classification is to be placed Mrs. Gundy, whose farm, six miles southeast of Broken Bow, comprises a tract of 160 acres, with good improvements. This property is owned by Mrs. Gundy, who has resided here for more than nine years.

The late Albert Gundy was born near the city of Berlin, Germany, September 25, 1832, and was a son of Frederick and Minnie Gundy, who brought their family to the United States in 1839 and settled in Ohio. Later they went to Illinois, where they engaged in agricultural pursuits, and where both parents passed away in the faith of the Lutheran church. They gave three sons to the Union cause during the Civil war—Fred, William, and Ed., the first-named of whom fell on the battlefield of Gettysburg.

Albert Gundy received his education in the public schools of Ohio, and as a young man he engaged in independent farming operations in Illinois. He was an industrious man, with good, practical ideas, and did not lack the courage to adopt modern methods, so that he made a success of his operations. In 1892 he moved to Iowa, where he had just begun to repeat his Illinois success when he was called by death, April 22, 1894. Following his demise Mrs. Gundy disposed of the home farm in Iowa and came to Custer county, where she purchased 160 acres of land six miles southeast of Broken Bow, this place being her present home. Here she has developed a splendid farm, one of the most valuable in this part of the county, with substantial buildings and modern improvements of every character. She has numerous friends in the community, attracted to her by her many fine qualities of mind and heart, and she belongs to the Catholic church, attending services at St. Joseph's church, Broken Bow.

Mrs. Gundy, who married Mr. Gundy in 1869, bore the maiden name of Mary Lerette, and she was born in Illinois, a daughter of Louis and Eliza (Delill) Lerette, the former a native of France and the latter of Canada. There were eleven children in the Lerette family, of whom four survive—Mrs. Catherine Jones, of Chicago; Mrs. Margaret Fingure, of Joliet, Illinois; Nicholas, a retired farmer of Hancock, Iowa; and Mrs. Gundy. Of the thirteen children born to Mr. and Mrs. Gundy, ten attained to maturity: Henry, an Iowa farmer; Jessie, deceased wife of Louis Range, of Joliet, Illinois; Frank, farming in Custer county; Fred, a mail carrier at Minden, Iowa; May, the wife of Will Booth, a farmer near Broken Bow; Maggie, the wife of George Allard, proprietor of a garage at Crookston, Nebraska; Kate, the wife of Frank Coulter, of Custer county; Lewis, a carpenter of Lincoln; Lucy, the wife of James Roucis, a railroad man of Lincoln; and Andrew and George, at home, and assisting their mother in conducting the home farm.

HENRY SWEENEY.—In this brief memoir is given the life record of one of Custer county's early settlers—a man who contributed his full share to the upbuilding of his community.

Henry Sweeney was born in Roscommon county, Ireland, and when a young man of about eighteen years, having heard favorable reports concerning the opportunities to be found in America, he left his native land, and came to the United States, where he first found employment in New Jersey. It seems that he was not disappointed in the prospects which confronted him, for he sent for his parents and had them join him, he making a home for them as long as they lived. They were Thomas and Ellen (Henry) Sweeney, and both passed away in New Jersey.

Henry Sweeney then went further west, and in Livingston county, Illinois, he established a home. There he married Bridget Harvey, who was born in County Leitrim, Ireland, August 24, 1840, a daughter of Daniel and Catherine (McGuire) Harvey, both of whom lived and died in their native land. Bridget Harvey was a girl of sixteen years when she came to America, with friends and neighbors who settled at Dwight, Illinois, where she met her future husband. The young couple continued to reside in Illinois until 1886, when they came to Custer county, Nebraska, and located in section 16, township 18, range 22. This being school land, it was not open for settlement, but Mr. Sweeney purchased 480 acres of it as soon as it was on the market for sale. Pioneer conditions were still in evidence on every hand, and a sod house served as the family home for many years. In 1908 Mr. Sweeney made arrangements to provide better quarters for the family, and the large frame house which adorns the place was erected that year. But the husband and father was not long permitted to enjoy the new home, as he was called from the scene of earthly activities in November of that year. His widow still makes her home on the old farm and is one of the Custer county pioneer women who shared in its pioneer hardships and who has been spared to view the changes that have taken place and share in the joys and pleasures of the present day. She became the mother of ten children: Thomas met accidental death at the age of nineteen years, in a sand bank caving at Ulysses, Nebraska; Catherine is the wife of Owen Gray, of Seward Nebraska; Harry is married and resides in Wyoming; George is a farmer of Custer county; Alice died at the age of four years and seven months; Arthur is a resident of Anselmo; Amrose resides at Merna; Ann is the wife of James D. McCarty; William lives at Merna; and Edward J. owns and operates the old home farm. The family are communicants of the Catholic church and are held in the highest respect.

JAMES FARRITOR.—Among the pioneers of Custer county who still reside within its borders mention should be made of James Farritor, who for thirty-eight years has been a resident of the county.

Mr. Farritor is a native of the Emerald Isle, born in County Kerry, Ireland, May 25, 1834. He was a babe in arms, only five weeks old, when his parents, John and Nora (Fitzgerald) Farritor emigrated from Ireland to the United States. They first settled in Boston, later living at Worcester, Massachusetts, then in Connecticut, and from the latter state they removed to Tioga county, Pennsylvania, where they spent the remainder of their lives.

James Farritor spent his boyhood days in the different places where his parents lived and when a young man he became a coal miner. He was still a young man when he went to Streator, Illinois, where he followed mining until 1880. In that year he came to Nebraska and secured a homestead on Victoria creek, Custer county. But few families were to be found in the county when he took up his residence here, and the work of development had only been begun. He built a sod house, began the task of conquering the wilderness, and in due time was planting and harvesting. Here he followed agricultural pursuits for many years. In the early days Kearney was the nearest trading and milling point, and Mr. Farritor made many trips there to get wheat ground and to secure provisions for the family.

At Elmira, New York, Mr. Farritor was united in marriage to Miss Ann McDonald, a native of Ireland, and she became one of Custer county's noble pioneer women. They became the parents of five children, as follows: The firstborn, a daughter, is now a Sister of Charity in a Catholic convent in Kansas; Mrs. H. G. Clark, Mrs. Joseph Moroney; and Mrs. Homer Hickman all reside in Custer county; and Julia, is deceased.

Mr. Farritor makes his home with Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Moroney, his wife having passed away. He is one of the venerable pioneers of Custer county and has reached the age of eighty-four years. He has been an eye-witness of the vast changes that have taken place in this section of Nebraska, and delights in recounting the experiences of those early days.

EDWARD J. SWEENEY.—The subject of this record is a worthy representative of the agricultural interests of Custer county, within whose borders he has resided since he was five years of age.

Edward James Sweeney was born in Butler county, Nebraska, March 16, 1880, and is a son of Henry and Bridget (Harvey) Sweeney, a record of whom appears on other pages of this volume. Reared on the farm, he wisely chose as a vocation the occupation with which he was familiar, and he is to-day the owner of 320 acres of the old home place. It is one of the best improved farmsteads in the township, the buildings having been put here by his honored father.

Mr. Sweeney married Miss Delia Kaelin, a native of Custer county, and they are the proud parents of twin children, a boy and a girl, named Helen Eileen, and Henry Edward.

The family are members of the Catholic church and Mr. Sweeney votes the Democratic ticket. He is a progressive and up-to-date farmer, as well as a representative of one of the early families of Custer county.

GEORGE W. TRUEMAN is consistently given pioneer honors in Custer county, within whose borders he has maintained his residence for more than thirty years. He reclaimed and developed one of the excellent farms of the county and as an energetic and progressive business man he is now manager of the general merchandise store at Georgetown, where he also holds the office of post-master.

Mr. Trueman was born in Pennsylvania, in the year 1857, and is a son of John George Trueman and Caroline (Coleman) Trueman, who were folk of sterling character and who reared their children in such a way as admirably to fit them for the duties and responsibilities of later years. Of the four children the following brief record may consistently be entered: David L. is a resident of Camus Valley, Oregon; Martha is the wife of William Rollins and they reside on their farm north of Sumner, Dawson county; George W., of this review, was the next in order of birth; and William lives in Dawson county.

George W. Trueman acquired his early education in his native state and supplemented this by attending school after the family removal to Illinois, in which latter state he was reared to adult age. He continued his residence in Illinois until 1886, when he came with his family to Nebraska and established his permanent home in Custer county. Here he entered claim to a homestead of 160 acres, and in its development, improvement, and diversified activities he showed characteristic energy, thrift, and good judgment, with the result that he made the property one of the well equipped and valuable farms of the county. That the homestead was recently sold for $4,000 gives tangible evidence of the fact that the property had received the best of management on the part of Mr. Trueman, who had incidentally made a record for vigorous and effective enterprise in connection with agricultural and live-stock industry. He now has full charge of the general store of Georgetown, as representative of the owner, H. S. Clouse. In his present field of enterprise he is meeting with the same gratifying success that attended his activities as a farmer, the while his personal hold upon popular confidence and esteem inures to the success of the business with which he is now identified. In politics Mr. Trueman upholds the basic principles for which the Republican party stands sponsor, but he is not constrained by partisan dictates to the extent of feeling it necessary to vote for candidates who do not appeal to his judgment, even if they are advanced by his own party. He holds membership in the Christian church, of which his wife likewise was a devoted adherent, her death having occurred in 1897.

The year 1882 recorded the marriage of Mr. Trueman to Miss Mary Helen Hope, and the four children of this union are living: Carrie is the wife of Byron Morgan, of Custer county; John William conducts a garage and blacksmith shop at Cumro, this county; Martha is the wife of Dell Mason, their home being in Custer county; and Arthur S. resides at Fort Collins, Colorado.

JOHN TEAHON.—As we write of the early settlers of Custer county, giving each his meed of praise, the name of John Teahon should have a place in the front rank.

John Teahon is a native of the Emerald Isle, born in County Kerry, Ireland, where the days of his boyhood and youth were passed. In 1880, when a young man of twenty-one years, he came to America, and for one year he resided in Halifax. In 1881 he came west to Nebraska, and in the month of July, 1882, he drove a team and wagon to Custer county, where he pre-empted the northwest quarter of section 17, township 18, range 22. When asked if "Uncle Sam" had made any improvements, Mr. Teahon answered as only an Irishman could do, "No, that was left for your Uncle John to do."

Not a house was in sight in the valley on the west, and North Platte and Kearney were the nearest trading points when Mr. Teahon took up his residence here. He shared in all the trials and hardships of the pioneer days, but has been faithful to duty and has contributed his share toward the betterment of conditions.

At Milford, Massachusetts, Mr. Teahon married Miss Mary Ellen Teahon, a native of that place, and following is a brief record concerning their children: Mary E. and Lizzie were given special advantages in business education, the former taking first prize in a contest given by the Remington Typewriter Company, and she now has a position at Grand Island, while her sister holds a similar position in Montana; Ella, John, Jr., William, Michael, and Maurice are all at home. The family are members of the Catholic church. When asked his political views, Mr. Teahon replied, "Put it in your book just as I tell it," and, pointing to a knoll where he slept under a wagon the first night after he came here, he said, "I have never missed an election and never voted a straight ticket."

Mr. Teahon has rendered valuable aid in promoting those measures that have had to do with the upbuilding of his part of the county. He is a friend of the public school and has always advocated the employment of efficient instructors, realizing that the boys and girls of to-day are to be the men and women of the future. He gave his time and influence to help establish rural free delivery in his community, sacrificed his own convenience to benefit the majority, and did all in his power to make possible the present system of parcel post service.

Mr. Teahon is possessed of an unusual amount of real Irish wit, is genial and optimistic, is well posted on current events, and is a fluent conversationalist. He is the owner of 240 acres of land, and what he has achieved is the result of his own and his family's hard work and good judgment.

Patrick and Elizabeth (O'Donohue) Teahon, parents of the subject of this sketch, were sent for by their son, and they spent their last days with their children in Custer county.

EDWIN A. BUTLER, a veteran business man of Ansley, who has constantly been connected with the mercantile interests of this place for thirty-two years, is accounted one of his community's progressive citizens and a prominent factor in the automobile industry as represented in Custer county. He entered his present business, as proprietor of a garage, after a quarter of a century's connection with the implement trade, and in his present field of endeavor he has equaled and added to the reputation which he gained in his former line.

Edwin Adams Butler was born on a farm in Knox county, Illinois, August 31, 1859, a son of Matthew and Louisa (Drake) Butler. His father, a native of Gardner, Maine, went as a young man to Ohio, where he was united in marriage with Miss Louisa Drake, who was born in the city of Cincinnati, and shortly after their union they moved to Illinois. There Mr. Butler was able to purchase good government land for one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre, and on the home farm in Illinois Mrs. Butler passed away in 1862. Her husband continued to follow farming there with success until 1878, when he came to Seward, Nebraska, and bought land at seven dollars an acre. He became the owner of valuable farming land and much town property, and at the time of his death, which occurred in 1898, he was accounted one of his county's well-to-do citizens. He was a Republican in his political affiliation and wielded some influence in party circles, and his religious connection was with the Congregational church. He and Mrs. Butler were representative of the best element in community life. They were parents of six children: Samuel, who is a well known realty operator of Lincoln, Nebraska; Allen, who is engaged in the jewelry business at Ansley, Custer county; Edwin A., whose name introduces this sketch; and three who are deceased.

Edwin A. Butler received his early education in the public and district schools of Illinois, and when he was nineteen years of age he accompanied his father to Seward, Nebraska, where he gained his first knowledge of the implement business. For four or five years he was engaged in that business on his own account, at Seward, but in 1886 he removed to Ansley, where he established the business that he conducted for twenty-five years, with constantly increasing success. Mr. Butler displayed excellent ability in the handling of his affairs, which placed him among the town's leading business citizens, and in addition to this he traveled for six years for the International Harvester Company, in selling its widely known products. In 1913, recognizing an opportunity, he opened a modern garage at Ansley, and began doing a large business, not only with the automobilists of Ansley and the surrounding towns and countryside, but also with those traveling through this region from distant points. From the start he has handled Ford cars and various accessories, in addition to which he has done a large business in general repairing. By 1917 his business had grown to such proportions that he was obliged to secure larger quarters and better accommodations, and accordingly he built his present establishment, a building, modern in every way, and fifty by forty feet in dimensions. Mr. Butler is a man of the highest and strictest integrity—one whose reputation for solidity and sterling character has been built up through years of straightforward business transactions. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, the Odd Fellows, and the Modern Woodmen, is a Republican in politics, and has served efficiently and conscientiously as a member of the town board.

In 1882 Mr. Butler married Miss Clara Anderson, who was born in Pennsylvania, a daughter of Lewis Anderson, who settled, at a very early date, in Seward county, Nebraska, where he was a very successful farmer, and at his death left a handsome estate. Five children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Butler, namely: Alice, who is the wife of Charles Chandler, engaged in the drug business at Ansley; Grace, who is the wife of Fred Maulick, engaged in the meat-market business at this place; Della, who is the wife of Ray Lockhart, of Broken Bow, who entered the United States army in June, 1918; Harry, who is engaged in the automobile business with his father, and is a thirty-second degree Mason; and Edwin, who resides with his parents and attends school. Mrs. Butler is a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal church.

JOHN STAAB.—The financial stability and personal influence of John Staab, one of the foremost farmers and large landholders of Custer county, are the result of patient application to merchandising and farming, prudent investments, and industry and perseverance in whatever undertakings have occupied his attention. Mr. Staab was born in Dane county, Wisconsin, June 11, 1859, and is a son of Liborius and Louisa Pauline (Marold) Staab, both natives of Germany.

The parents of Mr. Staab were both young people when they immigrated to the United States, and they met and were married in Dane county, Wisconsin. In his native land the father had been a cabinetmaker, and in Wisconsin he followed carpentry and baking as occupations, but in 1870 he came to Platte county, Nebraska, where he secured a homestead and engaged in farming, a vocation which he followed during the rest of his life. He was a successful, self-made man and had the esteem and regard of his associates and neighbors in each of the communities in which he lived. He was reared as a Catholic, but later adopted the faith of the Lutheran church. Mr. and Mrs. Staab were the parents of nine children, of whom seven are living: Charles, who is living retired in the state of Washington; John, who is the subject of this sketch; Adam, who is a ranchman of Cherry county, Nebraska; Louis, who conducts a meat market at Chicago, Illinois; Will, who is a dairyman in the state of Washington; Theodore, who is a turner by trade and at present employed at Chicago; and Otto, who drew a section of land in Arthur county, Nebraska, and has since purchased a like acreage.

The educational advantages of John Staab were limited in his youth to attendance at district schools of Dane county, Wisconsin, and Platte county, Nebraska, during three months of the year, and in the latter state he was forced to travel twelve miles to attend school. However, he has done much to educate himself, having been a close observer and a great reader, and he is now well informed in regard to a wide range of important subjects. As a youth he secured a position clerking in a general store at Columbus, Nebraska, and subsequently he ran a herd of cattle and hauled freight for a distance of twenty-six miles, his various activities combining to give him a start in life. His first property was secured in Platte county, when he traded a pair of ponies for a tract of eighty acres of land, and later he engaged in the general-store business at Lee, Nebraska, where he made a success of his undertaking, by reason of his ability and good management. In 1895 he secured another Platte county farm, on which he installed his family, and in 1898 he disposed of his store business at Lee, increasing his Platte county holdings to 200 acres and living on his farm there for about five years more. In 1903 Mr. Staab came to Custer county and bought 1,480 acres of land, and he gave his supervision to this property for another year before he returned to Platte county, where he sold his property, after which he brought his family back to Custer county. Here he has since resided and here he later added eighty acres to his holdings. There were no improvements on the Custer county property at the time of his arrival, but he at once began building operations, and he now has six complete sets of buildings, including residences, barns, and other structures. His sons now own their own places—land their father bought when he came here—and are doing well. Mr. Staab has always carried on general farming and has engaged in stock-raising, and his operations have been uniformly successful. A man of varied interests and keen and active mind, he has been more or less prominent in public affairs. In early life he was a Democrat, leaving that party to join the Populist movement and subsequently returning to the Democratic organization. At this time he is greatly interested in the work of the Non-Partisan League.

While residing at Lee, he was for a number of years a trustee of that town and was township clerk of Sherman township in Platte county. Since coming to Custer county he has been chairman of the township board of Berwyn town several years and a member of the school board during a long period. His official record is one which has been characterized by conscientious attention to duty and the same kind of energy and intelligent direction of affairs that have been noted in the handling of his personal enterprises.

In 1882 Mr. Staab married Miss Elizabeth Mayer, who was born in Schuylkill county, Pennsylvania, a daughter of Enoch and Rachel (Yoder) Mayer, the former born in 1831, in Northumberland county, Pennsylvania, and the latter in 1838, in Schuylkill county, that state. The marriage of the parents was solemnized in the Keystone state, and in 1868 they removed to Iowa, where Mr. Mayer purchased a homestead. He continued operations thereon until 1908, when he removed to Tipton, Iowa, and since then he has lived in retirement and in the devoted companionship of his wife. He is a son of John Mayer, a native of Pennsylvania. Mr. Mayer is a Democrat, and he and his wife are members of the German Reformed church. Their eight children are all living, but Mrs. Staab is the only one residing in Nebraska.

Mr. and Mrs. Staab are the parents of twelve children: John E., of Ansley; Aaron Clark, farming near his father's home; Anna, the wife of Harry J. Newman, a farmer at Guelph, North Dakota; George Enoch, farming near his father's home; Ida, the wife of Wesley Harris, operating one of Mr. Staab's farms; Arthur L., farming near his father's property; Madia A., the wife of Ray Hawk, a farmer near Ansley; Walter, his father's assistant on the home farm; and Reuben, Irena, Carlisle, and Zelma, all at home. The family belongs to the Baptist church.

ARCHIE L. LOWRY.—One of the newcomers who constitutes a valuable asset and has made Custer county the benefactor by his advance is Archie L. Lowry, who is a native of Hall county, Nebraska, in which county he was born September 4, 1884. He is a son of Clarence N. and Maggie (Dufford) Lowry. The father was born in Indiana, but the mother comes from the rugged hills of Pennsylvania. The father came to Nebraska when but seven years of age, with his widowed mother, and they made a home near Peru, Nemaha county. In 1871 they moved to Hall county and settled near Doniphan, where the mother still resides.

Archie L. Lowry is a member of a family of seven children, and has two brothers and four sisters. Robert and Roland are substantial Hall county farmers. Della is the wife of M. J. Meserall, of Doniphan. Of the other children it may be recorded that Nettie is the wife of Thomas Herr, of Doniphan; Gertrude is the wife of Vern Crawford.

Archie L. Lowry was united in marriage, April 9, 1905, to Eva Gray, a fine young woman of Hall county, she being a daughter of Eugene and Ella (Hudson) Gray. Mr. and Mrs. Lowry have two children, Malcolm and Eva Jean, bright youngsters who contribute to the joy and satisfaction of the home.

Mr. and Mrs. Lowry came to Custer county in 1914 and bought land in section 25, township 20, range 21, north, and they are now the owners of 400 good acres, on which are fair buildings, a good farm home and everything to indicate without announcement that the owner is one of the prosperous farmers and ranchmen of the county.

In politics Mr. Lowry is a Republican, and fraternally he is a Mason and an Odd Fellow. Custer county has room for and can afford to pay a premium for more families like the Lowrys.

ENNIS SCOTT.—Custer county has had few citizens of finer fiber or more sterling worth than the late Ennis Scott, whose field of operation was the community northeast of Anselmo, where are located the farm he developed and the fine country home which he erected for himself and his family, and in which he expected to spend the years of his retirement.

Mr. Scott was born June 28, 1855, in Whiteside county, Illinois. His father was Edwin Scott and his mother Mary (Scott) Scott, both natives of the Buckeye state. An incident in the family history of Mrs. Scott is so remarkable that it is worthy of record in this column. Her parents moved from Ohio to Illinois in an early day, and to make the trip the father built a house-boat, loaded into it all his worldly goods and a family of thirteen children, and floated leisurely down the Ohio river to the Mississippi river, then up the Mississippi to Rock river, thence up the Rock river to Como, Illinois, which is near Sterling, that state. This was long before railroads were built, and the house-boat constituted an easy and economical mode of travel.

Ennis Scott availed himself of public-school advantages, by which he qualified himself for useful citizenship and such public service as he was called upon to render. His life occupation by his own choosing was farming, in which he made a striking success. In 1884 he yielded to the call of the west and arrived in Antelope county, Nebraska, where he remained only a short time. In the fall of the same year he settled in Custer county, where he homesteaded 160 acres in section 26, township 20, range 22. His wife remained in Antelope county and continued teaching school, in order to supply the sinews of war by which the western claim could be improved and the primitive home established.

December 30, 1877, the same year in which Custer county was organized, was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Scott to Miss Charity D. White, a daughter of Humphrey K. and Mary (Bumgardner) White. Her father, descended from an old English line, was born in 1798, in Virginia, and he died in Ohio, in 1883. The mother was born in Maine, in 1818, and she passed away in the same state and in the same year as her husband.

Mr. and Mrs. Ennis Scott established an almost ideal home, into which were born, in the course of years, four children, two of whom died in infancy, the other two are sons: Stanley B., who was born July 27, 1886, is now farming in Custer county; and Leon E., who was born June 11, 1894, is with his mother on the home place, but was in the draft for military service in the world war. It was arranged that when Leon was called to the service Stanley would take charge of the old home farm and conduct the extensive farming operations that his father maintained all through his active years.

In coming from Antelope county into Custer, Mr. and Mrs. Scott hauled their goods in a covered wagon, which was drawn by an ox team. They experienced many hardships, but their indomitable will conquered all obstacles.

Mr. Scott died July 9, 1916, having just completed a fine country home and having added to the farm equipment all necessary outbuildings, barns, and sheds. He and his good wife expected to pass their declining years in ease and comfort. They had passed the years of toil, they had reached the hilltop from which the prospect was pleasing and the road much easier, but the end of life had come to Mr. Scott.

Mr. Scott was one of the most enterprising men in Custer county. He believed in public improvements for the community and comfort for his family, and both of these he did all in his power to provide. A generous spirit, Custer county is the richer for the years of his residence within its confines. He was a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and in politics was a stalwart and leading Republican. Mrs. Scott continues to reside in the beautiful home, surrounded by all the blessings and comforts of life except the companionship of the worthy husband whose life fortunes she shared so many years.

GEORGE E. RICHTMYER. — The community of Ansley records upon its roll of departed and honored citizens none who left behind more substantial and valued evidences of association with its affairs than the late George E. Richtmyer. As a banker, farmer, and stock-raiser, politician, and public-spirited citizen, he came and went among the people of the vicinity of Ansley from the time of his arrival in Custer county, in 1883, until the close of his life, October 1, 1917, and in connection with memories of him there remains an impression of practical usefulness and genuine, dependable character, traceable to his untiring zeal, persevering industry and ready recognition of opportunity.

Mr. Richtmyer was a native of the state of New York, where he was born in 1850, a son of William and Mary (Francher) Richtmyer. The family originated in Holland, and was early founded in New York state, where, at Gilboa, Schoharie county, William Richtmyer was born. He was a machinist and wagonmaker, trades which he followed for a number of years, but eventually he turned his attention to farming and completed his career as a tiller of the soil in his native state.

George E. Richtmyer was educated in the public schools, completing his studies in the high school at Windham, following which he entered upon his career as a school-teacher. However, he did not find the desired financial success in this field, and finally he concluded to try his fortune in the west—in the new country opening up in central Nebraska. Accordingly, he became a pioneer of Custer county, where, in 1883, he located on a homestead. He proved up on his claim, adding to his income by teaching in the pioneer country schools during the short winter terms. When he had established ownership of his land, he returned to New York, and in March, 1889, he there married Miss Sophia Decker, who was born in Schoharie county, New York, a daughter of George and Elizabeth (Vandevort) Decker, who spent their lives in New York, the former being a native of Conesville and the latter of Gilboa. There were six children in the Decker family, of whom three survive: Elida D., the widow of William Berner, a farmer of Jefferson, New York; Sophia, now Mrs. Richtmyer; and Louie, the wife of John E. Martin, a farmer of Jefferson, New York.

Returning to Custer county with his bride, Mr. Richtmyer settled down to the business of cultivating and improving his property, and in the passing years became one of the leading and substantial men of his community, his management of his affairs being governed by an inherent ability, and his perseverance and industry being particularly strong points in his character. He became interested in public affairs, first as a Republican, but when the Populist movement suddenly became an important factor in national affairs, he joined that organization. In 1892 he was appointed deputy county clerk. In 1896 he was elected clerk of Custer county, by a large majority. While he traveled out of Omaha for almost two years, his main interests were confined to Custer county, and he had the utmost faith and confidence in this section. In 1903 he turned his attention to financial matters, by becoming the chief organizer of the Farmers State Bank of Ansley, of which he became cashier. Later he was president of this institution, the affairs of which he directed wisely and well, in a conservative though progressive manner, and he was president of this bank at the time of his death. The death of Mr. Richtmyer occurred October 1, 1917, and was of tragic order—he was run over by a wagon when he was returning to Ansley from a visit to the old homestead, and he did not recover from the injuries he received in this deplorable accident. He left many behind to mourn him—those who had known him best and who recognized his superior qualities of mind and heart. At the time of his death the Ansley Herald said: "He was the soul of honor and his friends and friendships once made were always sacred to him."

Mr. and Mrs. Richtmyer had one son: Louis D., who was born in 1890, and who was educated at Wesleyan University, Lincoln; the Nebraska State University; and Wentworth Institute, Boston, Massachusetts. In the last named institution he was graduated in 1915. Since the demise of his father, he has been operating the old homestead upon which his revered father first located in 1883. Mrs. Richtmyer, who survives her husband and resides in her pleasant home at Ansley, has in this community a wide circle of friends, and she is a member of the Christian Science church of Boston.

G. THOMAS HARTSON. — In this paragraph is an exhibition of young blood on the farm—blood that is as red and vigorous and floats as much iron as the blood that welled in the veins of the hardy pioneers forty years ago. There is an old and hackneyed phrase that "blood will tell," and it is probably true, but blood finds no better opportunity for telling than on a Custer county farm under present day conditions. Tom Hartson was born May 2, 1889, twenty-nine years ago, by which it is noted that he is on the morning side of thirty. For family history see sketch of James B. Hartson.

December 18, 1912, recorded the marriage of Mr. Hartson to Minnie Butcher, a young lady born and reared in this county, possessed of all the western graces that always impart life and vigor without taking toll of womanly virtues or gracious characteristics. The young people are now engaged in making their start. They have one child, Fern, four years of age—old enough and bright enough to direct the affairs of the household and to keep the fond parents dancing in attendance.

The farm operated by Mr. Hartson is rented from his father and consists of 160 acres of well cultivated land, with good buildings and general equipment. Tom Hartson owns his own implements and horse power, has a good line of live stock, and chances for success are very largely in his favor. He milks five cows and gives much care and attention to the profitable details of the farming game. He has been fifteen years a resident of the county, and within another fifteen years, with like diligence and economy, he and his good wife will have a comfortable home, "fronting on easy street."

Mrs. Hartson belongs to the Christian church. In politics Tom is independent. He votes the ticket as it suits his fancy, and no political boss cracks the lash above his back. A young family like this is part of the assets that insure the future prosperity of the county.

ALMER E. SPENCER. — One of the substantial men of the present day in Custer county is Almer E. Spencer, who has survived the many hardships the early settlers here had to contend with, and the story of his experiences is very interesting, as throwing a light upon the sturdy pioneers of 1880. He was born in Bremer county, Iowa, a son of Josiah W. and Margaret (Greenwood) Spencer, the latter of whom resides with her son Almer

E., of this review. Josiah W. Spencer served three years as a soldier in the Civil war, and at one time was captured by the enemy and incarcerated for three weeks in the prison pen at Andersonville, Georgia. His seven children all survive, namely: Almer E. is the immediate subject of this sketch; Addalaska G., who was born February 14, 1873, and who is a farmer near Broken Bow, married Sarah Story; Josiah L., who was born May 8, 1875, and who is a retired farmer living in Broken Bow, married Dora Mottinger; Alta, who was born November 14, 1877, is the wife of Rev. John W. Pirnie, pastor of the Church of God at Broken Bow; Katie F., who was born September 25, 1880, is the wife of John Holland, a farmer near Westerville; Lula D., who was born October 30, 1885, is the wife of Aaron Story, a farmer near Farley, Iowa; and Thomas L., who was born December 6, 1887, resides at home. Mr. Spencer brought his family to Valley county, Nebraska, in 1879, and in the following year homesteaded in Custer county. In order to secure provisions Mr. Spencer had to make a trip to Grand Island, leaving the family alone, and, with Indians still in the neighborhood and wild animals not entirely eliminated, Mrs. Spencer found many causes for anxiety. She relates that on one occasion when he was away, the children went out to gather wood and one of the sudden blizzards of snow came on and they were snowbound the entire night in the schoolhouse. Josiah W. Spencer was one of the venerable and honored pioneer citizens of Custer county at the time of his death, which occurred in February, 1908.

Almer E. Spencer accompanied his parents to Custer county in 1880 and still lives on his father's old homestead, where he carries on mixed farming and stock-raising, the former disadvantages of this section having been largely overcome by improved methods. July 1, 1894, he married Miss Carrie Bishop, who is a daughter of George and Emily (Hipsher) Bishop. Mrs. Spencer was the fourth in order of birth of her parents' family of children, the others being: Addie is the wife of Alfred Crowther, a fruit farmer in Tulare county, California; Charles, who also is a fruit farmer in Tulare county, married Mary Govier; David, who owns a fruit ranch in the above county, married Belle Sidwell; Nellie is the wife of Oscar Lindgren, a farmer in Hamilton county, Nebraska; and Nettie. Mr. and Mrs. Spencer have five children: Ralph, who was born August 8, 1895, and who is a farmer in Custer county, married Elsie Pirnie; Lela, who was born August 8, 1897, is the wife of John Piper, a farmer in Custer county; Almer was born July 30, 1903; George was born September 10, 1907; and Alvin was born January 18, 1910. The three youngest children are all at home. Mr. Spencer is affiliated with the Berwyn camp of the Modern Woodmen of America.

AXEL E. ANDERSON, who is a farmer and stockman in Custer county, is also a public official and is well and favorably known. Mr. Anderson was born in the city of Stockholm, Sweden, March 29, 1870, one of a family of three children born to Augustus and Tilda (Larson) Anderson. The parents of Mr. Anderson came to the United States and in the spring of 1880 settled in Polk county, Nebraska, where the mother died thirty days afterward and the father some years later. Two of their three children are living — Axel E. and John E., the latter of whom married Alma Almberg, their home being at Stromsberg, Nebraska.

Axel E. Anderson obtained his early education in the public schools of Polk county, Nebraska, and supplemented this discipline by a course in a business college at Bushnell, Illinois. He then spent a year in Minnesota and from there went to Decatur, Illinois. From that place he came, in 1906, to Custer county, Nebraska, and this has been his home ever since. He owns a half-section of land, which is well improved and favorably located, and his industries include general farming and stock-raising.

Mr. Anderson was united in marriage, in December, 1898, to Jessie M. Hart, the eldest daughter of Sunderland and Mary (Briscoe) Hart, of Decatur, Illinois, where Mr. Hart was a retired farmer. Mrs. Anderson has two sisters and one brother — Lucy, who is the wife of Charles P. Maxwell, a musician, at Decatur, Illinois; Edith, who lives with her sister; and Edward C., who is a business man of Jennings, Louisiana. Mr. and Mrs. Anderson have two children: Earl H., born December 15, 1899; and Horace W., born June 13, 1901. Both sons are at home and attending the Broken Bow high school. Mr. Anderson is somewhat prominent in Republican politics and for the past two years has been treasurer of Garfield township. He belongs to the Odd Fellows and the Modern Woodmen of America, still holding membership in Illinois.

JOHN GOVIER. — A practical representative of the agricultural interests of the Broken Bow community of Custer county is found in the person of John Govier, who has an exceptionally well developed property, located in section 20, township 18, which has been his home since 1885. Mr. Govier, during the thirty-three and more years that he has carried on operations here has accomplished several objects, in that he has established a good home, contributed a prosperous farm to the development of the county, and established himself in a firm position as a substantial and esteemed citizen, thereby reaching a goal that many men might well envy.

John Govier was born near Wolverhampton, England, August 7, 1850, a son of James and Ann (Osborn) Govier. His parents came to the United States in 1864 and settled in the vicinity of Boscobel, Wisconsin, where James Govier was engaged in farming during a period of many years. He was a man of industry, held the good will and respect of his neighbors and the confidence of his associates, and was a staunch Republican in his political views. He and his wife were faithful members of the Church of God and died in Custer county, Nebraska, in that faith. They were the parents of thirteen children, of whom seven are living: John, who is the subject of this notice; Thomas, who is single and lives in Canada, where he follows farming; Charles, who married Addie Atkins, and is a farmer of the vicinity of Weissert, Nebraska; James, who is single and resides at Ansley, Nebraska; Annie, who is a resident of the locality of Knob, California; Albert, who married Margaret Mitcheson, and lives at Ansley; and Mary, who is the wife of Charles Bishop and makes her home in California.

John Govier was a lad when he accompanied his parents to the United States, and when he reached manhood he adopted the vocation of farming, in which he has been engaged ever since. After some years of operation in Wisconsin, during which he achieved only a measure of success, in 1885 he came to Nebraska, and on March 31st of that year he secured a homestead in section 20, township 18, Custer county. He has since resided on the same property, engaged in general farming and the raising of live stock, and has met with marked success in his efforts, being the owner of fine buildings, up-to-date equipment and a fine grade of stock. He maintains a high standing in the community, and while he has not been particularly active in local affairs, he has always shown his public spirit when measures of an important character have called for the support of progressive citizens.

Mr. Govier was married March 1, 1877, to Miss Rebecca M. Beamer, a daughter of John and Nancy M. (McKee) Beamer. To Mr.

and Mrs. Beamer there were born seven children, of whom five are living: Nancy J., of Broken Bow, is the widow of the late John Truitt; Angeline C. married Thomas Cook and lives on a farm near Cromwell, Iowa; Clark, who married Sadie Allen, is engaged in farming in Missouri; Hannah is the wife of James Derickson, a carpenter of Broken Bow; Rebecca M. is the wife of John Govier, of this sketch; and Ira Hopkins, a son of a later marriage of Mrs. Beamer, is a half-brother of Mrs. Govier. To Mr. and Mrs. Govier have been born eight children, and of these six survive: Harry E., who married Sadie Smith, is a farmer in the Round valley community of Custer county; Clarence E., who also farms in Round valley, married Coralee Govert; Mabel L. is the wife of Miller Peterson, a farmer near Weissert; Lulu P. is the wife of Alfred Larson, a farmer near Broken Bow; Thomas W. W., who married Emma Johnson, is a farmer of Round valley; and Nellie E. B. is single and resides with her parents. Mr. and Mrs. Govier also have an adopted son, Joseph T. Govier, who was born May 30, 1915.

WILLIAM T. S. LINE. — One of the best stock farms to be found in the southern part of Custer county figures as the home and the stage of the activities of Mr. Line, who is one of the progressive and representative citizens of the county. He claims Indiana as the place of his nativity and he celebrated his fifty-third birth anniversary in 1918. His wife, whose maiden name was Carrie Irene Spellmeyer, was born in the state of Illinois and is fifty-four years of age at the time of this writing. Mr. Line is a member of a family of eight children. Four of his brothers are living, and one of the number is a Nebraskan — Marshall Line, who resides near Burwell, Garfield county. Two brothers and one sister are deceased.

Concerning the children of Mr. and Mrs. Line brief record may consistently be entered at this juncture: Arthur and Ren S. are both associated with the work and management of their father's North ranch; Ivan J. remains at home and contributes his quota to the ranch operations; Claude represents the family and his native county as one of the gallant young men who became members of the national military forces when the country became involved in the great European war, and he was stationed at Camp Funston, Kansas, at the time when the war came to a close; Laura Lomas is living at home; Eva and Dennis B. are students in the high school at Eddyville, Dawson county, a place not far distant from the home ranch; and Blanche also is attending the public schools of that village.

The Line landed estate comprises 1,600 broad acres, and 400 acres are maintained in a splendid state of cultivation. Mr. Line came into possession of this fine property by purchase. The permanent improvements are of excellent order and the property constitutes one of the best and most profitable stock farms in Custer county. The farm machinery is of the most modern and approved type and in itself constitutes a splendid asset, the while its utilization, as well as the general appearance of the farm, clearly indicates the progressiveness and good judgment of the owner of this valuable landed estate.

In the past years Mr. Line has bought cattle and fattened them for the market, and he has made the enterprise profitable, as has he also that of raising and handling hogs. However, in later years Mr. Line has given special attention to the dairy department of his farm activities, and at the present time he maintains a fine herd of thirty-five milch cows. The prevailing high prices for dairy products have made dairying very profitable to Mr. Line, especially during the period of the great world war, and he has been progressive in the handling of all details of this line of enterprise.

Mr. Line was reared and educated principally in Illinois, to which state his parents removed when he was about twelve years of age, and there he continued to maintain his home until 1884, when he became a pioneer settler in Dawson county, Nebraska, whence he later came to Custer county. He remained in this county about five years and then returned to Dawson county, but he has owned and resided upon his present Custer county farm since 1896, this being one of the best properties in the fertile region in the southern part of Custer county. The Line family is one of prominence and influence in this community and its members enjoy unqualified popular confidence and esteem.

ALBERT BAYNE. — "The responsibilities of present-day activities rest heavily upon the men and women living. Albert Bayne, who lives down in the Georgetown section of the South Loup, belongs to this class, and is a man who is well able to share the responsibility and discharge individually all obligations, public and private, resting upon him. He was one of the homesteaders of 1886, and has been since that time one of the improvers, contributing to county development in his modest yet appreciable way.

He is a son of Lee George Bayne and Lyza (Richmond) Bayne, both of whom were natives of Ohio, in which state both of them passed from the activities of this world. The subject whom these lines concern passed his early days in the Buckeye state, where public-school opportunities were afforded, and there he qualified himself for good citizenship and for business transactions as they arise to-day in general country life.

In the home established by Mr. and Mrs. Bayne six children have been born: Hattie Johnson, who lives on a farm in Dawson county; Mattie, who died in Iowa, several years ago; Charlie, who is a Dawson county farmer; Jennie Line, who lives near Burwell, on a farm; Harry, who is the youngest, and who is married and living on a farm near O'Neill, Nebraska, his one child being but twenty months old at the time of this writing, in the autumn of 1918.

On the homestead where the Baynes live are to be found fairly good improvements, which meet the requirements of the operations as Mr. Bayne conducts them. He has been, withal, a successful farmer and stockman, and merits the good reputation he sustains in the immediate circle of his acquaintance.

LINCOLN G. SELL. — This title line introduces a man with a history, a man who has gone through various and varied experiences in the western country, and who to-day is one of the constituents of community enterprise and country prosperity. Mr. Sell was born in the state of Michigan, December 24, 1869, and is a son of John G. and Sylvia (Smith) Sell. In his father's family were three children, the other two being Mrs. Anna Robertson and Mrs. Minnie Hudson.

Lincoln G. Sell received his early education in his native state, where he attended the public schools and supported himself in the meantime by cutting cordwood. It was probably here that he learned to "saw wood," a characteristic which has stood him in good stead during all his life.

On the 10th day of December, 1901, the matrimonial career of Mr. Sell began, when he led to the marriage altar Miss Annie Mutchie, a splendid young lady of Lexington, Nebraska. Mr. and Mrs. Sell became the parents of five children, all of whom are living and doing honor to their parents — Maggie, Mabel, Francis, Peter, and Charles. All of the children are still at home and are engaged in useful service in connection with the household and the farm.

Mr. Sell arrived in Nebraska November 10, 1887, about one month prior to his eighteenth birthday anniversary. Like most of the settlers, his parents came with little of this world's goods and some of the hardest experiences of the pioneer days fell to their lot, the father having taken up a homestead. The father froze to death, fifteen years ago, in a canyon north of the Sells home place, and this tragedy shocked and grieved the entire community. Lincoln G. then took a homestead and to-day he has a half-section of well improved land.

Concerning his early life, Mr. Sells says that in 1890 he went into McPherson county, where he stayed a short time, and later he engaged in railroading. From there he went to Omaha, where he was employed for a time in the Union Stockyards, which yards he helped to build. While working there he contracted typhoid fever, and he came home. After recovering he returned to Omaha and went into the army, with which he participated in one of the engagements during the Indian trouble. His company took an active part in the battle of Wounded Knee, on December 27th. After leaving the army he returned to McPherson county, where he ran wild horses for a time. In this enterprise he had the misfortune to have his left hand badly crippled. While in McPherson county at that time he took hay contracts and put up a large amount of prairie hay. He then moved back to his home, where he has since resided and where he enjoys the comforts of farm life under most favorable circumstances. He belongs to the Republican party, to whose principles he has long given a faithful adherence.

ROBERT B. WALKER.—More than a quarter of a century's connection with the banking interests of Mason City, during which time he has risen from a clerkship to the presidency of the Mason City Banking Company, has made Robert B. Walker one of the best known figures in financial circles of central Nebraska. He is a native of Canada, and was born January 29, 1867, a son of Robert and Margaret (Baird) Walker.

Robert Walker, the paternal grandfather of Robert B. Walker, was born in Ireland, and was a young man when he immigrated to Canada with his wife and infant children, the rest of his life being passed in farming in that dominion. John Baird, the maternal grandfather of Mr. Walker, was likewise a native of the Emerald Isle and was an early settler and farmer of Canada. Robert Walker, father of Robert B. Walker, was born in Ireland, and was a child when taken by his parents to Canada, where he was reared and educated. Following his marriage to Margaret Baird, a native of Canada, he continued farming in that country until 1884, when he came to Custer county, Nebraska, and secured a homestead. He was an agriculturist on that property for some years, then moving to Gibbon, Buffalo county, where he established himself in the hardware business, with his son. He is now retired, at the age of eighty years. He has been a Mason for many years and he and Mrs. Walker are members of the Presbyterian church. They have had ten children, of whom two reside in Custer county: John, who is a supervisor of Custer county and engaged in farming near Mason City; and Robert B., who is the subject of this review.

Robert B. Walker was educated in the public schools of Canada and was seventeen years of age when he accompanied his parents to Custer county. For two years he lived and farmed on the family homestead, but in 1886 he came to Mason City, where he clerked for two years, and then was variously employed until entering the Bank of Mason City, in the capacity of bookkeeper. From that time to the present he has been identified with banking matters, always advancing, and to-day he is president of the Mason City Banking Company, one of the strong institutions of this part of the state, with a capital of $25,000, surplus of $5,000, and average deposits of $275,000. Mr. Walker is considered one of the capable, careful, and conservative bankers of Custer county, and is a man whose personal integrity and probity have done much to conserve the interests of his institution and to gain and hold the confidence of the public. He is a Republican in his political views, and is well known in Masonry, having attained Scottish Rite degrees, having been master of his lodge at Mason City, and holding membership as a noble of the Mystic Shrine. As a citizen he has been public-spirited and constructive in his assistance of worthy movements for the general welfare.

October 22, 1891, recorded the marriage of Mr. Walker to Miss Maude Hill, who was born in Wisconsin, daughter of L. B. Hill, who came to Mason City in 1888 and for a time was the incumbent of the postmastership. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Walker: Harold, twenty-six years of age, is a graduate of the medical department of the University of Nebraska, at Omaha, and enlisted in the United States Medical Reserve, in which connection he has been assigned to the general hospital at Kansas City, as a medical interne; Mildred, a graduate of Kearney Normal school, is now a teacher in the public schools of Mason City; Marion resides at home and is a high-school student; and Paul, aged seven years, is attending school. The family belongs to the Baptist church.

CARL HOLCOMB, who is favorably known in business circles of Broken Bow as one of the proprietors of Holcomb Brothers' garage, has resided in Custer county practically all of his life, and in his career he has demonstrated the possession of abilities of a superior order. This enterprising business man was born November 20, 1882, in Gibson county, Indiana, a son of Monroe C. and Amanda (Vickers) Holcomb. His father migrated from Indiana to Grand Island in 1883, and about 1885 homesteaded northeast of Broken Bow, in what is known as the Holcomb neighborhood, there passing the remaining years of his active life. His death occurred at Broken Bow, January 13, 1900, and Mrs. Holcomb survived until February 11, 1912. They were faithful members of the Baptist church, and parents of three sons: Carl, Floyd, and Ray.

At the time of the death of their father, the Holcomb brothers inherited the old homestead, which is now being operated by the youngest of the three, Ray, a skilled and thorough agriculturist who is securing excellent results. In addition the brothers own 640 acres of land adjoining, and have the best of equipment and buildings—three complete sets of improvements. Ray Holcomb is a Democrat, affiliates with the Woodmen, and has numerous warm and appreciative friends. Floyd Holcomb, who is now a member of the firm of Holcomb Brothers, proprietors of the garage at Broken Bow, was brought up as a farmer and that was his vocation until entering business life, in 1918. He is a member of the Baptist church and votes the Democratic ticket, while his fraternal relations are with the Masons, the Odd Fellows, and the Woodmen. He is accounted an alert and hustling business man whose standing has been gained through marked ability and individual effort. Mr. Holcomb married Ruby Baker, and they have four children: Margaret, Monroe, Donald, and Gifford.

Carl Holcomb was brought up on the home farm, assisting his father during the summer months and attending the district schools in the country in the winter terms, and his first money was earned by plowing corn with an old "walking" cultivator, for Mr. John Smalley. After his father's death, he remained on the homestead and continued his activities as a farmer until 1918, in which year he and his brother Floyd bought the garage at Broken Bow, from Martin & Son, located the first block east of the Farmers' co-operative store. An excellent business has been developed, and in addition to conducting a general agency for Dodge Brothers cars, a general line of repair work is done and all manner of tires and accessories are handled. Mr. Holcomb has firmly established himself as a reputable man of business, of much ability, and of strict integrity. While residing in the country he was called upon to fill public offices, being school director for six years and township clerk two years, and he discharged his duties in an entirely satisfactory and efficient manner. He belongs to the Odd Fellows and the Woodmen, and he and Mrs. Holcomb are members of the Baptist church.

Mr. Holcomb was married March 22, 1906, near Broken Bow, to Miss Rose Triplett, a daughter of Clark S. and Ruth (Holman) Triplett, farming people of Custer county. Mr. Triplett was a Democrat and he and his wife belonged to the United Brethren church. They had the following children: Inman, John, Jesse, Earl, Rose, Ida, Ada, Maud, and Goldie. Mr. and Mrs. Holcomb have one son: Carl, Jr.

SAMUEL T. KEARNEY.—Down in the south part of the county, so far that Sumner is the nearest town, on a farm of 240 acres, is the home domicile of Samuel Tilden Kearney, who was born in Greene county, Illinois, in 1873. His wife, Lizzie (Boyer) Kearney, was born in the same year, in the Buckeye state. The father of Mr. Kearney was Henry C. Kearney, who was born on the high seas, and who departed this life in the sixty-eighth year of his age. The mother was Mary Ann (Jones) Kearney, a native of Greene county, Illinois, and she was sixty-one years of age at the time of her death. In the family of the senior Kearney were five children: W. T., who lives near Lomax; Frances Orr, who is living at Sigourney, Iowa; Samuel T., who is the subject of this sketch; Mrs. Anna Wellett, of Sheridan, Wyoming; and Nettie Boyer, of Aitkin, Minnesota.

In the family of Samuel T. Kearney are four bright children, who do credit to himself and his wife and make happy and enjoyable their farm home: Esther Viola and Adah Hazel are both attending the high school at Overton, Nebraska; and Mary and Merle are attending school at Sumner.

The Kearney place consists of 240 acres of good land, and the farm is well improved, 100 acres being under cultivation and very productive. All kinds of farm machinery, out-buildings, etc., make up the farm equipment. Stock-raising is one of the sources of profit and income followed by Mr. Kearney. The development of the place has been brought about under many difficulties and early-day experiences. Lumber for the buildings was freighted in the early days from Kearney. Sumner is the nearest town. The spring wagon and the lumber wagon of the early day are no longer used as the vehicles of conveyance, but the family ride in a motor car and are farming with modern-day implements.

Mr. Kearney is a member of the Modern Woodmen of America, in which order he takes a prominent part. The family stand high is the community and are worthy of the rating accorded them.

CHARLES E. SHEPPARD.—The life of Charles E. Sheppard, of Broken Bow, is an illustration of the possible control over early limitations and the wise utilization of ordinary opportunities. His career has been identified with Custer county from 1889, since which year he has engaged in several business ventures, but for the past seventeen years he has been proprietor of the elevator of the Central Granaries Company. Mr. Sheppard was born January 19, 1851, near Springfield, Illinois, a son of Franklin Bullock. He was about one year old when his parents died, within a month of one another, and he was adopted by and taken into the home of Ira S. and Marjorie (Van Vleet) Sheppard.

Ira S. Sheppard was born in the state of New York, and as a young man removed to Minnesota, where he was engaged in the boot and shoe business until reaching the age of thirty-five years, when he turned his attention to farming. He was a member of the Masonic fraternity and was a strict Prohibitionist. He died in 1917, Mrs. Sheppard passing away in October, 1908, both in Moon Lake township. Their own children were a daughter who died when young; and Joseph P., Cyrus R., Prosper E., Benjamin F., and Fred.

Charles E. Sheppard was sent to the district schools in Minnesota, and spent the summer months in working on his foster father's farm. He remembers well the first money he ever made, the sum of ten cents, which was given him for handing bundles of wheat on a stack to Elder Kern, a Methodist Episcopal minister. The incident remained in his memory because of something that followed. In the evening, with the other youngsters, he went out to the old log barn to look at some newly-arrived puppies, and when the jealous and irritable mother dog charged him he nearly lost his hard-earned dime as he fled to safety. Mr. Sheppard remained on the home place until he was twenty-two years of age, and then founded a home of his own when he married, April 18, 1873, at Linden, Minnesota, Miss Mary E. Warner, daughter of Captain Luther and Jennie (Goodwin) Warner. Her father was a native of New York and was captain of a canal boat, and her mother was born in England. Mr. and Mrs. Sheppard became the parents of eight children, of whom five are living. Franklin Luther, the eldest son, is a member of the Broken Bow grocery firm of Sheppard & Burk, located in the Dierks Block, and is a Mason and Highlander, a Republican in politics, and a member of the Episcopal church. He was first married to Grace Kennedy, daughter of Charles Kennedy, and they had one child, Stella. Mr. Sheppard married, second, Marion Vanderburg, and they have a son, J. Luther. Charles A. Sheppard, second son of Charles E., follows the trade of mason at Broken Bow, and is a Republican. He married Mary Carr, daughter of George Carr, a pioneer farmer of Custer county, and they have two sons and three daughters. Mabel, the elder daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Sheppard, is the wife of John Myrick, a farmer in the vicinity of Sherman, Pennsylvania, and has three daughters. R. J. Sheppard, youngest son of Charles E., is a musician of Beloit, Kansas, and is a Republican voter. He married Eva McCall. Pearl, the youngest child of Charles E. and Mrs. Sheppard, is a graduate nurse from Green Gables Sanitarium, Lincoln, as is her husband, George Minor, and for the past several years they have been conducting the Broken Bow Hospital. They are members of the Episcopal church and Mr. Minor is a Republican.

Charles E. Sheppard came to Custer county in 1889 and took up his residence at Broken Bow, where he embarked in the ice business. This he conducted for seven years, when he disposed of his interests and for some time thereafter applied himself to carpentry, a trade which he had mastered in his youth, but in 1901 he became the manager of the elevator known at Broken Bow as the Central Granaries Company, of which he has made a substantial success. He is one of the progressive business men of his community and a citizen who supports actively and generously all movements which promise advancement.

PETER W. MULLEN.—The qualities of adaptability, common sense, persistence, and good judgment have prevailed in the energetic life of Peter W. Mullen, winning for him enviable rank in business circles of Broken Bow, where since 1908 he has been a member of the firm of Mullen Brothers, operators in real estate, loans, and insurance. Mr. Mullen is a product of the agricultural region of Harrison county, Iowa, having been born at Missouri Valley, July 6, 1878, a son of Peter R. and Ellen M. (Rourke) Mullen. His parents were natives of Dubuque county, Iowa, and his grandparents on both sides were born in Ireland.

Peter R. Mullen passed his entire life as an agriculturist in Iowa, where he was known in several communities as a capable and industrious man, a stanch member of the Democratic party and a faithful Catholic. He died January 16, 1918, at Missouri Valley, Iowa, where his widow still resides, in the home of her son-in-law, Frank McBride. There were nine children in the family, as follows: John is deceased; James P., a ranchman of Broken Bow, Democrat and Catholic, married Rose Sweeney, daughter of Michael Sweeney, and has had five children, of whom four are living—James, Joseph, Charles, and Thomas; Peter W. is the immediate subject of this review; Mary A., who died in November, 1916, was the wife of George P. Sweeney, owner of a garage at Neola, Iowa, and a member of the Catholic church and the Knights of Columbus, with four children—Francis, Ellen, James, and Eileen; Charles M., a Custer county farmer, Democrat voter, Catholic, and a member of the Knights of Columbus, married Catherine Ryan, daughter of Edward Ryan, and has five children—Loretta, Catherine, Bernard, Carmelita, and Joseph; Ellen M., wife of John J. Ryan, a farmer of Broken Bow, Catholic, Democrat, and Knight of Columbus, has five children—Leona, Celestine, Joseph, Ellen, and Richard; Catherine is a member of the Dominican Sisters at Omaha; Genevieve, wife of Frank McBride, of Missouri Valley, in the United States post-office department, a Democrat, and member of the Knights of Columbus, has two children—Geraldine and Lucille; and Cecelia is the wife of John Doyle, a farmer near Neola, Iowa, a Democrat, Catholic, and Knight of Columbus, with one child—Clair.

Peter W. Mullen received his education in the public schools of Harrison county, and until he was thirty years of age he worked on his father's farm with his brother Charles. When he was a lad his father was greatly troubled by gophers. In order to stimulate his sons' energy in getting rid of these pests he made them an offer of three cents for each animal, and in case its head possessed gray hairs the reward was five cents. It is to be supposed that a thorough search was made on each little rodent by the sharp-eyed youths, to see that no gray hairs escaped them. While residing in Iowa Mr. Mullen took some interest in real-estate matters, but this was only as a side line, and it was not until he came to Broken Bow, in November, 1908, that he engaged in the business seriously. Here he joined his brother James, who had preceded him by about one year, and the firm of Mullen Brothers, real estate, loans, and insurance, was formed, the business having since been developed to large and important proportions. The brothers have won universal confidence and respect because of their straightforward manner of conducting their transactions, and their business standing is excellent.

On October 5, 1909, Peter W. Mullen was married, at Missouri Valley, Iowa, to Miss Anastasia J. Ryan, daughter of John and Julia (Senat) Ryan, farming people of that community and devout members of the Catholic church. Mr. Ryan was a Democrat and belonged to the Knights of Columbus. In the Ryan family there were the following children: Edward, Richard, Timothy, Mary, Patrick, James, Bridget, Malachi, Margaret, Johanna, and Anastasia. Mr. and Mrs. Mullen are the parents of four children: Angela, born in 1910; Patricia, born in 1912; Mary, born in 1914; and John, born in 1916.

EUGENE J. BOBLITS.—In Eugene J. Boblits, one of Custer county's best known citizens, is found a leader in the cattle industry on the South Loup river, and he is also an honored veteran of the great Civil war. Mr. Boblits was born December 21, 1846, in Frederick county, Maryland. His father, Jacob Boblits, was likewise born in Frederick county, where he became a man of considerable prominence. He was influential in the Masonic fraternity, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Knights of Pythias; was an elder in the Moravian church, and was a tanner by occupation. He married Josephine Gernand, who was a daughter of Jacob Gernand, a weaver, and of the eight children born to them the following are living: Eugene J. is the subject of this review; Alice is the widow of Eugene Willard, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and she has four children; and Ida is the wife of Henry C. Stuckey, a retired ranchman now residing at Lexington, Nebraska, and they have three sons and two daughters.

Eugene J. Boblits lived at home and assisted his father until July 7, 1862, when he enlisted for service in the Civil war, entering Company H, One Hundred and Twenty-fifth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry. He was so severely wounded at the battle of Antietam, September 17, 1862, that he was confined in a hospital for three months, at the expiration of which he was honorably discharged, December 8, 1862. Of his bravery and the quality of his service no better testimony can be produced than the following lines, which may be found on page 74 of the history of the regiment: "In the retreat from the said West Woods, the regimental colors of the One Hundred and Twenty-fifth were saved through bravery worthy of special mention. The color sergeant, George A. Simpson, was shot down and instantly killed, and five of the color guard went down. Then Eugene Boblits, of Company H, rescued and carried them for some distance, and when he was badly wounded, he threw them to Sergeant Walter W. Greenland, of Company C (afterward adjutant general), from whom Captain Wallace received them and carried them to the rear of the battery we were ordered to support. In the meanwhile men were falling thick and fast, like leaves in autumn, and out of the 150,000 soldiers engaged on both sides in this great battle, 40,000 men were killed and wounded between sunup and sundown."

Home care and nursing brought about Mr. Boblits' partial recovery, so that, in 1863, he was able to enter Millwood Academy, at Shad Gap, Huntington county, Pennsylvania, where he continued for three years and completed his education. By that time he had so far recovered from his wounds that he was able to learn the tanning business under his father, and he became so expert that he was engaged by James B. Reese to operate the latter's large steam tannery at New Creek, West Virginia, where he remained for four years. In the meanwhile he married, and in 1874, with his father's assistance, he went into the cattle business on the South Loup river, having come to Custer county in the fall of 1873. He has witnessed many changes in this field of enterprise, as in every other industry, during these forty-four years, but he has always maintained that Nebraska is the natural stage for cattle-raising. Mr. Boblits has tender recollections of his childhood home and of his loving parents, who taught him habits of industry and instilled ideas of thrift. He tells an amusing story of what was probably his first business transaction, when he was yet a little boy. His mother prevailed upon him to keep the cow-yard clean, and encouraged him by the payment of three cents a week. He carefully saved his pennies until he had accumulated eighty-five cents, when, unknown to his mother, he planned to spend his entire fortune on a valentine for a little neighbor maiden and awaited the coming of the good saint's day to purchase and send the heart missive. It was but a short time before this that his dear mother came to him and, patting him on the shoulder as good mothers do, she said to his dismay: "Eugene, you have been a good little boy and I am going to take your saved-up pennies and put enough more with them to buy you a pair of red-top boots with copper toes."

Mr. Boblits was married October 3, 1871, to Mrs. Harriet E. McNeill, of New Creek, West Virginia. She had one daughter by her first marriage, and this daughter is now Mrs. Jennie B. Allcar, a resident of Keyser, West Virginia. Mrs. Boblits' maiden name was Harriet E. Duling. Her father, William A. Duling, was born near Bull Run, Virginia, and before the Civil war, was a slave-owner and planter. Her mother, Harriet (Cluter) Duling, was a native of Hampshire county, West Virginia. Mr. and Mrs. Boblits have three children—James J., who operates the home ranch, four and one-half miles north of Oconto; Mary J., who is at home; and Harriet A., who is the wife of Frank A. Tierney, a ranchman near Oconto.

FLOYD HOLCOMB.—In the thriving community of Broken Bow, one of the live and enterprising business men is Floyd Holcomb, who, with his brother, Carl Holcomb, is actively engaged in the conducting of an automobile garage. He has been a resident of Custer county since 1885, in which year he came to this community from his birthplace, Hamilton county, Nebraska, where he was born November 9, 1874, a son of John Monroe Holcomb and Amanda (Vickers) Holcomb. There were three sons in the family: Carl, Floyd, and Ray, of whom the last-named is looking after the brothers' large and valuable agricultural interests in Custer county.

Floyd Holcomb started to attend the district schools of Custer county, he having been still a boy when he accompanied his parents to Custer county, in 1885, the family settling nine miles northeast of Broken Bow, in a locality which subsequently became known as the Holcomb neighborhood. He earned his first money working for his father, with whom he remained until the latter's death, in 1900, when he removed to other land, which he and his brothers had purchased. In 1917 Mr. Holcomb and his brother Carl decided to enter business at Broken Bow, and accordingly they here bought the old Martin garage, which they have since conducted with great success. Mr. Holcomb is known as a business man of superior ability, and in addition to executive capacity possesses much mechanical skill and ingenuity. He is interested in fraternal affairs, being a member of the Masons, the Odd Fellows, and the Woodmen, and his political faith is that of the Democratic party. He and his family belong to the Baptist church.

Mr. Holcomb was married, May 16, 1908, to Miss Ruby Baker, daughter of Rolland T. and Margaret J. (McClain) Baker, former farming people of this county and now retired residents of Broken Bow. To this union there have been born four children: Marguerite T., John M., Donald R., and Gifford F.

RASMUS ANDERSON.—The career of Rasmus Anderson, a pioneer of Custer county, and now one of the successful business men of Broken Bow, has been one in which interesting incidents have occurred from his early boyhood, and in which he has worked his way from obscurity to prominence and from poverty to affluence. He is a native son of Denmark, and was born July 11, 1863, his parents being Niels and Marie (Rasmussen) Anderson, natives of that country.

Mr. Anderson's father was a sea captain who owned his own vessel and did a general commercial business, both at home and abroad, frequently conveying cargoes of grain to England, where he would take on coal as cargo for the return trip. Mr. Anderson vividly remembers one trip which he took with his father when he was about twelve years old, to Iceland, carrying a load of provisions and returning with wool and woolen goods. He was very greatly interested in the Hekla geyser, near Mount Hekla and the famous volcano of that name, the geyser throwing a stream some fifty feet in height. The return journey was delayed through various reasons and it was not until late in the fall that the sturdy little vessel again put to sea, so that it was twice necessary on its voyage to run out into the Gulf Stream, where the warm waters would melt the great cakes of ice that had formed on the vessel's sides and threatened to sink it. There were eight children in the Anderson family, of whom seven are living, five in Denmark, and Mr. Anderson and one sister in the United States. This sister is now Mrs. Marie Winters and resides at Norman, Nebraska.

Rasmus Anderson received a public-school education, and when a lad of seven years began to think of going to foreign lands, eagerly listening to the stories of the sailors from whom he occasionally secured employment at cleaning their nets and knocking the barnacles from the bottoms of their boats. He was but seventeen years of age when he left the parental roof and shipped on a three-masted schooner, "The Sun," bound for England, with a cargo of barley. When he arrived in the latter country, stories that he heard in America fired his imagination with a desire to visit this country, and March 10, 1880, he embarked on a tramp steamer, "The Marathon," and set sail for the United States. As it was still early in the spring the sea was rough and the weather stormy, but after a voyage of twenty-two days the steamer made port at New York city and young Anderson thereafter arrived in Boston with only five cents in his pocket. In addition to this financial handicap, he had no working knowledge of the English language, but he soon secured employment in helping to unload cargoes from the incoming vessels, and he continued to be thus employed until he had enough money to buy a ticket to Niles, Michigan. There he obtained work on a farm and remained for a few months, following which he moved on to Omaha, Nebraska, and was given free transportation to Grand Island, to work with a surface gang on the Union Pacific Railroad. After one day's work he graduated from that position, for which he had little liking after his blankets had been stolen by some of the gang, and he accordingly made his way to a farm in Hamilton county, where he worked for a short period. In 1883 Mr. Anderson came to Custer county and settled on a homestead in the Dutchman's valley, six miles east of Broken Bow, where he made his real start toward success.

On May 13, 1886, about three years after his arrival, Mr. Anderson was married, at the home of the bride's parents, near Berwyn, to Louisa E. Barnes, daughter of Peter M. and Eunice (Rodan) Barnes, farming people, the former a native of Ohio and the latter of Kentucky. Mr. and Mrs. Barnes had three sons and three daughters. They were devout members of the Methodist church, and Mr. Barnes was a Republican. Mr. Anderson remained on his farm about fifteen years, and each year he was increasingly successful as a farmer and stock-raiser. Eventually he became interested in real estate, and finally he moved to Broken Bow, to devote all of his time to this business, in which he has made a marked success. His office is located over the postoffice, he being the owner of the building, in addition to which he has various other interests and holdings. He has an excellent reputation in business circles, as he has also as a citizen. He is a member of the Masons and is a Republican in politics.

Mr. and Mrs. Anderson have had six children, as follows: Ray R., a graduate of Broken Bow High school and Broken Bow Commercial College, is now municipal-court judge and United States commissioner at Billings, Montana; Nels M. is a salesman of automobile accessories, at Portland, Oregon; Omer K., who is a resident of Broken Bow, and who is a salesman for Swift & Company, of Omaha, married Anna Eddy, and has one son, Omer K., Jr.; Lee I. is a student at the Bailey Sanitarium, Lincoln; Eunice I. is a teacher in the public schools of Broken Bow; and Florence is the wife of Lieutenant Warde Cousin, a member of the United States Tank Corps, stationed with his regiment at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, at the time of this writing.

GUY E. LIVERMORE.—The life of a professional or literary man seldom exhibits any of those exciting or striking incidents that seize upon public feeling and fix attention upon himself. His character is generally made up of the aggregate of the qualities and qualifications he may possess and as these may be elicited by the exercise of the duties of his vocation or the particular profession to which he may belong. Guy E. Livermore, editor of the Sargent Leader, may not form an exception to this general rule, but since maturity his life has been one of constant professional duty, and the distinction he has attained in the journalistic circles of Custer county is evidence enough that these qualities have not been planted on barren soil.

Mr. Livermore was born in Ringgold county, Iowa, October 17, 1875, and is a son of M. F. and Sophia E. (Hatch) Livermore. His father was born in Louisa county, Iowa, where he was united in marriage with Sophia E. Hatch, born near Canton, Ohio, in 1854. In his native state, where he was born in 1850, Mr. Livermore followed farming and school teaching in the vicinity of Mount Ayr until 1879, in which year he moved to Kansas, where he engaged in farming a homestead for four years. The buffaloes had disappeared from the plains of Kansas a number of years previously, but Mr. Livermore added to his income through the former presence of this noble animal, by collecting bones from the prairies and hauling them forty miles to market. In 1883 he came to Custer county and settled on a homestead, and here he continued to be engaged in farming until his death, in 1892. He and Mrs. Livermore were the parents of seven children: Guy E., whose name initiates this article; Weldon, of Sargent; Floy, who is engaged in teaching school in Custer county; Mrs. R. W. Hicks, whose husband is a Sargent druggist; Mrs. Rae Hicks, whose husband has the star mail route from Ansley to Sargent; Fay, who is farming near Burwell; and Harrison B., who, as a member of the national army, in France, and in a medical corps at the time of this writing. Mrs. Livermore, who is a resident of Sargent, belongs to the Christian church, and her husband held the faith of the Methodist Episcopal church. He was a Republican in politics and served on the county board of supervisors about 1886 or 1887.

Guy E. Livermore attended the graded schools of Sargent and the high school at Broken Bow, graduating from the latter, in 1900, as a valedictorian of his class. He began teaching in 1894, and continued to be thus engaged for twenty-two years, being one of the best known and most popular teachers in Custer county. In 1908 he took a course in the University of Nebraska, attending summer school courses. He made good advancement in his profession, and during the last eight years of his pedagogic labors he was principal of the school at Comstock, which, during his regime, increased from three to six rooms. He was a general favorite with pupils, teachers, and his other co-workers, and was acknowledged a man of particular efficiency in his field. In 1916 Mr. Livermore turned his attention from this kind of educational work to another field, the instruction of the public through the columns of a newspaper. He purchased the Sargent Leader, which now has a circulation of nearly 1000 copies in Custer county and which has been a success under his management. It is bright, clean, enterprising and wholesome, and it has made many lasting friends among the reading public, being also well deserving of the support it receives as an advertising medium. In connection with the paper Mr. Livermore conducts an up-to-date job printing office.

September 1, 1908 Mr. Livermore was united in marriage to Miss Mary E. Miller, daughter of the Hon. E. Miller, who represented his district in the state legislature. Mr.

Miller was a pioneer farmer of Sargent and was a well known real-estate man, but he is now living a retired life at Hastings, Nebraska. Of the seven children born to Mr. and Mrs. Livermore, four are living — Leland C., nine years of age (1918); Clarice, six years old; Roscoe, aged four years; and Wanda, two and one-half years of age. The family belongs to the Methodist Episcopal church. Mr. Livermore is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in which he has passed the official chairs, and in politics he is independent.

CLARK H. FENSTERMACHER, M. D.
— Standing among the highest in his profession in Custer county, and enjoying a not less exalted position in the estimation of his friends, whose name is legion, Dr. Clark H. Fenstermacher, of Sargent, is likewise deserving of more than passing mention because of his accomplishments in the field of surgery. He is a native of Cass county, Michigan, and was born March 2, 1873, a son of C. A. and Margaret (Hill) Fenstermacher.

C. A. Fenstermacher was born in Pennsylvania, where he was educated and reared as a farmer, a vocation which he adopted and followed in Michigan. He was married in Cass county, that state, to which his wife had come as a young woman, from her native New Jersey, and there Mr. Fenstermacher continued to be engaged in agricultural pursuits until his retirement, several years prior to his death. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, to which his widow, who is a resident of Michigan, also belongs. They were the parents of five children: Dr. C. C. is engaged in practicing medicine; Dr. Clark H. is the subject of this notice; Abbie is the wife of Clarence Metcalf, an implement dealer of Sargent, Nebraska; Maggie, twin of Abbie, is single and is a resident of Michigan; and Verna is a teacher in the public schools of that state.

Dr. Clark H. Fenstermacher received his early education in the public schools of Michigan and spent his boyhood on the home farm. An agricultural life, however, did not appeal to him and after some preparation he entered the University of Louisville, Kentucky, from which he was duly graduated in 1900, in which year he began practice at Sargent. He has continued here with constantly increasing success, and now has a large and lucrative practice of a general character, although he specializes to some extent in surgery, a branch in which he has met with particularly gratifying success. He has given much study and thought to this department of his profession, has kept fully abreast of the great advancements being constantly made, and perhaps no practitioner in Custer county has had more experience in this direction. For a number of years he has been local surgeon for the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad at Sargent. He holds membership in the various medical organizations, and is affiliated with the local lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. His political beliefs cause him to maintain an independent stand in regard to public matters. Gifted with a love for his chosen profession, quick of intuition, and generous and sympathetic in his work, he has won the respect and esteem of the citizens of Sargent, and by his courteous manner and genial nature, as well as acknowledged ability, has won an enviable practice and surrounded himself with a circle of warm friends.

Dr. Fenstermacher was united in marriage in November, 1913, at Sargent, to Miss Olive Griffith, who was born in Custer county, a daughter of George Griffith, who is engaged in farming near Callaway, this county. Dr. and Mrs. Fenstermacher are the parents of one child, Inez.

ALLIE L. MORGAN.— Down on the South Loup, on the same quarter-section upon which is located the Cumro store and post-office, in a region noted for its pioneers, lives one of the staunch, reliable characters who helped to make the history of the early day. This was none other than Allie Levi Morgan, who was born in Aurora, Illinois, in 1858.

He is a son of Levi and Sarah (Satterfield) Morgan. Levi Morgan served as a member of an Illinois regiment during the Civil war, and, like many another gallant soldier of the Union, he came home but to die—a martyr to a noble cause.

Allie L. Morgan came to Nebraska in 1879, from Aurora, Illinois. He landed at Lexington and made his way into Custer county in 1880. Here, one year later, he homesteaded on the South Loup—the place he now owns and upon which he maintains his splendid farm home, which is known throughout the south part of the county as the "Pioneer's Rest." During those early days, he worked first on one ranch and then on another, sometimes for L. D. George and sometimes for John George, sometimes for Andy Pancake. But no matter where his operations were exerted, he made good and managed to cultivate his own land, put on substantial improvements, cultivate a tree claim and keep things going; and all this without much to start on. When he filed on his tree claim, it took every cent he had in the world.

In 1882 Mr. Morgan was united in marriage to Miss Cora George, a member of the widely known George family, and she did well her part in making the home and accumulating their possessions. A lady of refinement and a splendid mother, she bequeathed her characteristics to her children and leaves in her home the monument of her life. She died in August, 1918, at the age of fifty-eight years. During her life time she and her husband maintained an open, hospitable home, characteristic of the South Loup country. Their union was blessed by the birth of three sons: Byron is married and lives on the home place; Ne G. operates the Cumro store and is the community postmaster; Fletcher is married and also lives on the home place. During his life time Mr. Morgan has been connoisseur of Indian relics, and he has on hand to-day a larger and perhaps more valuable collection than any other collector of relics in the county. Many of the arrowheads, spearheads, stone knives, battle-axes, stone hammers, etc., described and illustrated in the historical pages of this volume, belong to him. These he has preserved at great pains and much expense, and some day his collection will be a great asset to some museum or historical society. Historians of the state are indebted to Mr. Morgan for much valuable information gleaned from the relics he has collected.

The Morgans are highly esteemed in the community, are promoters of all progressive movements and, withal, are influential citizens. During her lifetime, Mrs. Morgan was a member of the Baptist church.

Anent the experiences through which Mr. and Mrs. Morgan passed, we submit the following lines, written by Mr. Morgan himself, and addressed to his wife. These lines describe the passing of the old sod house in which their children were born and where so many experiences incidental to pioneer times took place.

Well, Cora, I've torn down the old sod house, and as I pause a moment to rest,
My thoughts go wandering backward to the early days in the west.

Full twenty years and five have passed away since I felled the giant tree
That helped to build the cabin and make a home for you and me.

Don't you remember, we were sweethearts then?
Our paths were still untrod,
But many and many are the happy years we spent in that house of sod.

Together we rocked the cradle upon its earthen floor,
Together we fought the famine, when the wolf was at the door,

And our children grew to manhood beneath the family tree
And through many a storm and blizzard it sheltered
you and me.

But the wheels of time turn onward and its walls were in the way;
To make room for better improvements, I tore them down to-day.

Now our acres are numbered by the hundreds, our cattle by the score,
Our granaries are bursting with a thousand bushels or more.

But better than all the riches which we toiled for years to get,
And the sweetest of all God's blessings, is this, we are sweethearts yet.

ROBERT A. HUNTER.—Industry in labor, and faith in his community have been contributing factors in the success of Robert A. Hunter, who, after years of participation in farming, stock-raising, and ranching in Custer county, is now residing in comparative retirement at Broken Bow. Mr. Hunter was born February 25, 1855, at St. Louis, Missouri, a son of Robert and Elizabeth (Anderson) Hunter, natives of Scotland.

Robert Hunter came to the United States when thirty years of age, and shortly after his arrival he married Miss Elizabeth Anderson, whose mother was a member of the famous Scotch publishing-house family of McMillan. She was eighteen years old when she came to this country, and after their marriage she and Mr. Hunter located near Litchfield, Illinois, where they engaged in farming and stock-raising, accumulating large holdings in land and stock. They were faithful members of the Presbyterian church, in the faith of which Mr. Hunter died in 1890, at Walshville, Illinois. Mrs. Hunter survived until 1903 and passed away at the home of her son Robert A., at Broken Bow. They are survived by four children: Mary J. is the wife of Peter W. Davenport, a veteran of the Civil war, a Republican, and a member of the Christian church and the Woodmen's lodge; Robert A. is the subject of this sketch; James A., a retired ranchman of Alliance, Nebraska, is a Woodman and a Republican; and Martha is the wife of A. L. McPhail, a farmer near Litchfield, Illinois.

Robert A. Hunter attended the public schools and Lebanon (Illinois) College, and he remained on the home farm until his marriage, March 14, 1877, at Walshville, Illinois, to Martha A. Beck, a daughter of Moses and Emily C. (Barlow) Beck. Mr. Beck, who was a pioneer farmer of Illinois, was an elder in the Presbyterian church, belonged to the Odd Fellows, and was a Republican. Not long after their marriage, Mr. and Mrs. Hunter came to Custer county and located six miles north of Broken Bow, on an undeveloped ranch, which Mr. Hunter named Sunny Dell. They lived in a little sod house and their early struggles for a start were ones that taxed their energies to the full, but both possessed determination and persistence and in the end they triumphed over all obstacles. Mr. Hunter had the utmost faith in the community which he had selected as his home, and during the drouth years of 1890 and 1894, when other settlers were discouraged and were leaving for their former homes in the east, he bought all the land adjoining his own. When his small capital was exhausted he borrowed money, often paying as high as three per cent. a month interest, but his faith was vindicated, and he has lived to reap the reward of his confidence. He still owns his original homestead in Custer county, besides other property, and while he is now partly retired and living in his comfortable home at Broken Bow he still supervises the operations on much of this land.

For many years Mrs. Hunter has been one of the most prominent women in Custer county. During the early days, when her husband was struggling hard to make ends meet, she secured a position teaching school, and for five years, during nine months out of the year, drove daily from five to seven miles to take care of her classes, taking with her her two daughters. In addition to this service she did all of her own housework at the ranch, and did not think it any hardship. Even when prosperity came, and the family moved to Broken Bow, she continued for a time to teach in the public schools here. For many years she taught a young men's Bible class in the Sunday school of the Presbyterian church, and she has always been active in the work of religion and temperance. She was the first president of the Custer county Women's Christian Temperance Union, has given numerous lectures at public meetings in behalf of temperance, and was a charter member of Chapter S, P. E. O., subsequently serving as vice-president of the Nebraska grand chapter of the P. E. O. She was a member also of the women's board at the Trans-Mississippi Exposition, held at Omaha in 1898. In 1915 she published the "Story of the Four Gospels," for boys and girls, and a temperance drama entitled "Weighed in the Balance," both of which met with immediate favor. She has contributed numerous short stories and other articles to different periodicals. A woman of splendid talents and utmost sincerity, it is her wish to serve her day and generation and to merit her Master's: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant."

JAMES N. PEALE.—Of the men who have lent dignity of character, excellence of labor and largeness of general co-operation to affairs in Custer county for a considerable period, none is held in greater esteem than is James N. Peale, the proprietor of a grocery, fruit, and feed business and a creamery station at Broken Bow.

Mr. Peale was born November 4, 1863, at Harrisonburg, Rockingham county, Virginia, a son of Anderson N. and Martha (Bushnell) Peale. Anderson N. Peale was born at Cross Roads, Rockingham county, Virginia, a son of Jonathan Peale, the original ancestors having come from England, and for many years Anderson N. Peale was a school teacher in the Old Dominion state. In 1883 he came to Custer county, Nebraska, where he located near New Helena and began to teach school, but after a few years he located at Westerville and established himself in the hotel and meat-market business. His death occurred at Colorado Springs, Colorado, in 1896, he having removed to that city several years prior to his demise. He was a Presbyterian and in politics was a Democrat. Mrs. Peale was born at Reidsville, North Carolina, a daughter of Henry Bushnell, a leading civil engineer and during his day considered one of the best mathematicians of the south. He was a Democrat and a member of the Baptist church.

The mother of James N. Peale died when he was fourteen years of age, near Harrisonburg, Virginia, and following that he had no real home. He managed to earn small amounts of money by collecting bones, which were ground into fertilizer, and by selling such old iron as he could find, but he did not make much progress until the spring of 1880, when he came to the west, in company with E. N. Bishop, their destination being Grundy county, Iowa, a community which they eventually reached. One month later, with a pair of plug horses and an emigrant wagon, they came to Gates, Custer county, Nebraska, taking sixteen days to make the journey, and young Peale hired out to James L. Oxford, who was proprietor of the Oxford ranch, on Lillian creek. He worked there about four years, attending the district schools in the winter months, and subsequently he went to Westerville, where for three or four years he clerked in mercantile establishments. During President Cleveland's first administration he was appointed postmaster at Westerville, and he also conducted a mercantile business at that point. From that time to the present there has not been a period of more than several months' duration that he has not been actively engaged in mercantile pursuits. His talents seem to be naturally adapted to barter and trade, and at the present time he is the proprietor of a splendidly successful enterprise on the north side of the Public Square at Broken Bow, handling staple and fancy groceries, fresh fruit, feed, etc., and conducting a creamery station, under the style of J. N. Peale & Company. Mr. Peale has an excellent reputation in business circles—a man of industry and energy, enterprise and spirit, and he is noted for his strict integrity and the manner in which he lives up to his business obligations.

Mr. Peale was married July 4, 1888, at Broken Bow, to Miss Mattie S. Bond, daughter of Benjamin Bond, a farmer of this community, and of the children born to this union, two are living,—Sherman C., who is the proprietor of a feed and fuel business at Los Angeles, California; and Walter N., who is telephone-order clerk for the great wholesale grocery house of H. Jevne Company, at Los Angeles. Mr. Peale is a member of the Methodist Episcopal church and is a staunch Democrat in politics. He is fraternally affiliated with the Odd Fellows and the Knights of Pythias.

WILLIAM BOEKING.—Numbered among the homesteaders of 1882 in Custer county who are still the owners of their original properties, although now retired from active labor, is found William Boeking. Mr. Boeking was for years a successful farmer and stock-raiser of Custer county, but in the spring of 1916 he took up his residence at Litchfield, where he is the proprietor of an implement business.

Mr. Boeking was born in Westphalia, Germany, January 15, 1860, and is a son of Henry and Kathryn (Krum) Boeking, the former born in Germany in 1837, and the latter on January 16th of that year. They were married in their native land and resided in Westphalia until coming to the United States, in 1868, in which year they settled in Livingston county, Illinois. During the next eleven years they were engaged in farming in that county, and then, in 1879, they started out in a wagon for Nebraska. After a long and tedious journey they arrived at their destination, in Sherman county, where the father filed on a homestead. Through his industry and good management he became well-to-do, and when he died, on his homestead, in 1885, he was one of the substantial and highly respected men of his community. He was a Republican in politics, and he and his wife were faithful members of the Evangelical church. They were the parents of five children: William of this sketch; Henry, who died at Grand Junction, Colorado; Albert, of Strathcona, Alberta, Canada; Mary, the widow of William Ruland, and a resident of Litchfield; and John, on the old home farm in Sherman county.

William Boeking was given his education in the public schools of Illinois, to which state he had been taken as a lad of eight years, and he accompanied his parents to Sherman county, Nebraska, in 1879. He resided there three years, and then, with his possessions, which consisted of a team of horses, a wagon, and two dollars in cash, he came to Custer county and settled on a homestead. When others, less determined and sturdy, gave up their land under discouraging conditions, he held grimly on to his property, and in the end his perseverance was rewarded, for his property developed productiveness and value and its ownership eventually made him a wealthy man. He carried on general farming, in addition to doing considerable stock-raising, and from time to time he added to his holdings, until he had 560 acres. In the spring of 1916 he turned over the strenuous labor of the farm to younger hands, although retaining its ownership, and removed to Litchfield, where he engaged in the hardware and implement business. In 1918 he traded the hardware store for a farm in Sherman county, but he still owns the implement business. Mr. Boeking has made a decided success of his career, during which his transactions have always been honorable, fair, square, and above-board. He has served as assessor of his county three years and has always discharged the duties of citizenship in a conscientious and creditable manner. His political support is given to the Democratic party, and his religious faith is that of the Methodist Episcopal church, to which the members of his family also belong.

In 1883, the year following his arrival in Custer county, Mr. Boeking was united in marriage with Miss Emma Fienhold, who was born at Peru, Illinois, and they became the parents of twelve children, of whom nine survive: Albert, who carries on operations on his father's farm in Sherman county, Nebraska; Mary, who married Harry Douglass, of Custer county; Kate, the wife of Ned Perry, a farmer of Buffalo county, Nebraska; Ed, who entered the United States army in 1917, and later entered active service in France; Bertha, who married George Paterson, a farmer of Custer county; Harve, a student of the State University, at Lincoln, where at the time of this writing he is taking a course in radio work, having enlisted in the United States service; and George, Mildred, and Grace, who remain with their parents.

SYLVESTER McWORTHY was born in Carroll county, Illinois, July 21, 1854. His father, Peter McWorthy, was born in one of the eastern states, of Irish descent, though for many years the family had been residents of the United States. When a young man Peter McWorthy settled near Quincy, Illinois, where he became a farmer and where his marriage occurred, the maiden name of his wife having been Hicks, and she having been born near Quincy, Illinois. From that locality they moved to Carroll county, Illinois, becoming early settlers there, and in that county they spent the remainder of their days.

Sylvester McWorthy, the subject of this record, was reared on a farm in Illinois and in 1883 he came to Custer county, Nebraska, where his boyhood friends, the Thomas boys, had settled but a short time before. Mr. McWorthy secured a homestead of 160 acres—the southwest quarter of section 19, township 18, range 21. He had the usual experiences of the early settlers of Custer county, and a sod house was his home until six years ago, when he erected the present frame structure. This farm has always been his home since he came here, thirty-six years ago, and for many years he carried on general farming, though he now rents his land and practically lives retired. Mr. McWorthy has a host of friends in the community, though he has not a relative in the state, and he has chosen to live in single blessedness, as one of the popular bachelors of the county in which he has long lived and labored and of which he is a sterling pioneer citizen.

HENRY T. BARRETT. — Among the early settlers of Custer county who have helped to bring about present-day conditions, mention should be made of Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Barrett.

Henry T. Barrett was born in Jackson county, Iowa, October 20, 1860. His parents, Hercules and Susan (Hawke) Barrett, were natives of Cornwall, England, where they were born within six miles of Land's End. While still young people they came to America, and they lived in turn in Wisconsin, in Illinois, and in Jackson county, Iowa, their last days having been spent in Cass county, that state, where both passed away, he at the age of seventy and she at the age of seventy-six years.

Henry T. Barrett was reared in his native state and when a young man came to Custer county and took a somestead of 160 acres, in section 22, townssip 17, range 22. He built a sod house, proved up on the claim, and recently he deeded the farm to one of his sons.

In 1885, in Custer county, was solemnized the marriage of Henry T. Barrett to Sarah E. M. Cass, who was born in Jackson county, Iowa, and who is a daughter of John and Orpha (Hill) Cass, natives of New York state and early pioneers of Jackson county, Iowa, where they passed away.

In 1884 Mrs. Barrett, before her marriage, came to Custer county and secured a homestead in section 22, township 18, range 22. Here she was married and since that event she and her husband have made this their home. They occupy a nice frame house, and the improvements are in keeping with present-day development.

Mr. and Mrs. Barrett have two sons: Alonzo, who was graduated in the Merna high school, as a member of the class of 1912, is at home and is assisting in the operation of the farm. He recently married Miss Minnie Foerst. Grant, who was graduated in the Merna high school, class of 1915, was a member of the United States Army in France at the time when the great war came to a close.

Mr. and Mrs. Barrett are among the pioneer settlers of Custer county, have contributed their full share to the progress and development of the community in which they live, and are people of genuine worth.

AMOS O. ALEXANDER was born February 27, 1871, in Nebraska City, and he is a son of James O. and Sarah E. (Standley) Alexander, who were honored pioneers of Nebraska, and from whom Amos O. inherited the characteristic traits that have made his life career very successful. There were these children in the family of James O. and Sarah E. Alexander—Phineas W., Sarah J., Finley, James M., Luella A. Spegal (deceased), Addie E. Flower (deceased), Amos O., (the farmer and business man of whom this sketch is written), and Lillian M. Andry. Through the mother, this family was connected with the Methodist church. The father was a stock raiser and farmer by occupation, and his farm was situated seven miles northwest of Nebraska City, where he died when his son Amos was but five years old. It should be made a matter of record that the late James O. Alexander was one of the valiant band of territorial pioneers in Nebraska. He came to Nebraska Territory in 1855, prior to the time when railroads had been constructed through this section of our national domain, and he lived up to the full tension of frontier life during the period of his early residence in the now prosperous and opulent commonwealth of Nebraska. He was a man of strong character, commanded unequivocal confidence and esteem and was affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

At an early age Amos O. Alexander began looking for ways by which he could earn money. When eleven years of age he worked for his brother. His brother permitted him to plant a small tract of ground with corn, and when, at maturity, the product was sold, it brought five dollars. This first five dollars looked bigger to Amos than many times that amount would to-day. He worked at home and went to school whenever opportunity offered until he was thirteen years of age. By this time his older brothers and sisters had married, and this left him at home with his mother and a younger sister. The situation challenged his strength and manhood. He must contribute to his mother's support. This he did by working on the farm, and from that time until the day of her death he charged himself with the care and support of his mother, who passed to the life eternal on March 29, 1918. The mother's farm was sold in 1892 and with her two younger children she came to Custer county and bought 160 acres, southwest of Arnold. As soon as Amos O. was of age he took a homestead on the same table, nine miles southwest of Arnold, where he made his home until he moved to Arnold, three years ago.

July 11, 1894, at North Platte, Nebraska, Mr. Alexander married Cora A. Dourte, of Nebraska City. Mrs. Alexander is a daughter of John and Cordelia (Barnum) Dourte. In her father's family she was the only daughter. She had three brothers, Edward J., Sanford B., and Myron J., and also three half-brothers, LeRoy G., Carl P., and Harley O.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Alexander was enlivened, as the years went by, with five children—four boys and one girl. Warren, at the time of this writing, is somewhere in France, as a member of a supply company of the Fourth Infantry, American Expeditionary Forces. He is a graduate of the Arnold high school. H. Nolan is a graduate of the Arnold high school and is now teaching near Arnold. He makes his home with his parents. Alva H. also is a graduate of the Arnold high school, is a mechanic by occupation and is working at home with his father. Ralph E. is a freshman in the high school. Constance, six years of age, is the pampered idol of the home. The home farm of the Alexanders, on Garfield Table, comprises 480 acres, with all necessary equipment and improvements. At the present time they have retired from the farm and have a comfortable home in Arnold, where Mr. Alexander is building a new garage and machine shop, of brick and cement. The dimensions of the new building are 60 by 112 feet, with an upper story 60 by 60 feet. This gives over 10,000 square feet of floor space and when it is finished the commodious building should insure a profitable business. Mr. Alexander is considered one of the "live wires" of the community, is an Odd Fellow by social connections and his high standing in the community will insure him a splendid business in his new enterprise. His wife enjoys the same distinction and esteem in the community.

WILLIAM R. YOUNG, M. D.—The career of Dr. William R. Young is strongly entrenched in the history of the medical profession in Custer county. The thriving community of Ansley, to which he came in 1897, offered a promising field for the young physician, and the citizens who have watched his uprising have never had cause to regret the faith they placed in his energy, enthusiasm, and ability. He has grown into his opportunities, has fashioned his resources to his needs, and has reflected dignity, sincerity, and genuine worth upon a profession for which he is singularly and admirably equipped.

Dr. William R. Young was born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, September 8, 1868, a son of Thomas and Jane E. (Rutherford) Young. His parents were natives of England, his father immigrating to the United States alone, in young manhood, and his mother coming with her parents when a child. Thomas S. Young was a farmer by vocation, an occupation which he followed for a number of years in Pennsylvania, but later he moved to the vicinity of Williamsburg, Iowa, where he passed the rest of his life in agricultural pursuits, his death occurring there in January, 1917, when he was eighty-three years of age. Mr. Young was a Republican in his political views and for a number of years served as postmaster at a country office. He was a Mason and was a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, as was also Mrs. Young, who died in 1913, when sixty-four years of age. They were people who were highly esteemed in their community, noted for their charities and their unfailing kindness and hospitality. They had four children: William R., of this notice; and Mary, Nellie, and Jennie, all of whom reside at Williamsburg, Iowa.
